The Polish nation understood better than any other the far-reaching Soviet aims. The Polish soldier fighting at the gates of Warsaw in 1920 knew that a moment was at hand which would decide about the life or death of the Republic. Backed by the entire nation's intransigent will to battle the enemy, the Polish soldier summoned his strength for the supreme effort which saved his country and brought a magnificent victory. In keeping with its age-old tradition, the Polish Nation once again saved Europe from the barbarian deluge from the East. As she had done so often in her history, Poland again in August 1920 was true to her role of bulwark of Christianity and bastion of democracy.

The historic miracle on the Vistula halted the eastern aggressor in his attempt to bring enslavement to Poland and the world. The fate of Europe hung in the balance in that memorable battle. The whole world realized this fact at the time. Much was written and said about what was then going on in Poland. But the United States was not content with mere words. From the very moment in which Poland had regained her independence, America had been sending economic aid to the renascent republic. But something more had now become needed. The Polish soldier fought the Bolshevik invader with intrepid valor. But Poland had no airplanes. The Kosciusko squadron came into being in the United States. Its very name—a symbolic one—indicated that Americans remember their debt of gratitude to Poland and this great Polish patriot. Soon afterward a squadron of 12 American planes landed in Poland. Thirty years ago 12 airplanes were a great number. All of the members of the American squadron had volunteered. Their leader was an American—Maj. Cedric Fauntleroy. The American fighters for freedom were fighting for a common cause, arm in arm with the allied Polish nation.

According to the testimony of Polish military authorities, the American Kosciusko Squadron rendered invaluable service to the Polish cause. Out of 12 American aviators, 3 were killed on Polish soil while several were wounded. The second in command of the squadron, Capt. Marian Cooper, had to make a forced landing and was taken prisoner.

The then Polish Government expressed the nation's gratitude by decorating the American fighters with the Virtuti Militari. And so, during the period of the miracle on the Vistula, when through its unflinching will and courage the Polish nation tipped the scales of victory in favor of freedom and civilization—Americans came to its aid not only with words but with armed deeds.

Today, in a Poland governed by Moscow agents, the anniversary of the miracle on the Vistula is passed over in silence. There is nothing strange in that, for this date recalls that Poland is a bastion of Christian western culture and that she has never renounced her role. This date recalls the role Poland has played and will continue to play in the battle with the barbarian imperialism of the East.

But in exile, Polish soldiers and all Poles solemnly celebrate the anniversary of the miracle on the Vistula just as they used to celebrate it in free and independent Poland. Because of the friendship of the American Nation for the Polish people in days of glory and in days of enslavement as well, this anniversary is also a memorable date in America. And when on this day our thoughts go out to Poland, we do not even for a moment cease to believe that Poland will again be free and independent.

The Big Sleep

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the tragic consequences of New Deal blunders are pouring in upon us day by day. Those who have voted for these blunders are now very sensitive to criticism. The time has come, however, when this kowtowing to New Deal propaganda, much of it on the Russian-Communist order, should not deter the Representatives of the people from airing the truth. Now that we can see what is happening as a result of wasted defense money and playing politics with the lives of our boys, there must be a forthright challenge on the part of the people to those who are responsible for the holocaust, the end of which, and the consequences of which cannot be known until a terrific price has been enacted in the way of human lives.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal of August 15, 1950:

THE BIG SLEEP

We have gone from war to war again in the space of 5 years because, as four Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee so truthfully state, two administrations—Roosevelt's and Truman's—slept the big sleep. Today is simply the tomorrow of Yalta and Potsdam.

But there is a bitterer and more important truth. That is that the people themselves were lulled by a magic potion called bipartisanism. The Republicans themselves seemed drugged by it. For too long a time there was no one to cry out that the sentry slept.

And now, once more, there is talk that we should drink it again. Those who venture to criticize the past or present conduct of our affairs, as these Republicans have done, are accused of playing politics; we should once more swallow the questions and the criticism, keep the war out of politics, and be bipartisan.

Nothing could be more dangerous. And for the proof of it we need look no further than the sorry state of affairs today.

What made Yalta and Potsdam possible? They stemmed first of all from the hallucination that the Communists were pleasant, peaceful people whose only desire was to join the fellowship of nations; and secondly from the nation that foreign affairs were a field forbidden to the people, that what the experts and the great leaders did must be accepted without question lest we destroy unity.

Both were blunders. But what reason did the people have for doubting them at the time? During the war and its aftermath there were few with the courage to strike at the illusion of Communist Russia or to question the wisdom of the great leaders. And the few who did speak were discredited and swept away with the easy slander that even to question was to play politics.

A man ran for President of the United States in the middle of a war and the plans for peace, yet, in the name of bipartisanism, he would debate neither the war nor the peace. The war won, distinguished and capable men still held to a moratorium on the use of one part of their critical faculties for fear of the fetish of bipartisanism.

The overt blunders, it is true, were committed by Democrats. But where, one may ask, were the Republicans? The Democrats were at least carrying out their function of proposing policy, however ill-chosen the policies. The Republicans, as the minority representatives, were not even carrying out their one and only function, which is to examine, to question, to criticize, and upon occasion to oppose.

All these things the Republicans did on domestic matters. But on foreign affairs they slept the sleep of bipartisanism. And then one day be awakened to find that the pleasant opiate was a Mickey Finn.

Neither the men in Korea nor the rest of us can now escape the consequences of past blunders. But it would be insanity to return to the drug that made them possible, to recommit our destiny into the unquestioned hands of the men who made them.

As never before we need, in the phrase of the four Senators, "to scrutinize relentlessly"—not only what was done but what is done and what is proposed to be done. Our greatest hope is that the four awakened Senators will awaken others and that the people will not again swallow this thing called bipartisanism. Else from the next big sleep we may be suddenly aroused by terrors unimagined.

Surplus Foods

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Herald, Boston, Mass., Sunday, August 6, 1950:

HUGE FOOD SURPLUS NOT FOR ARMY, NAVY—UNITED STATES WON'T GIVE IT TO SERVICES; EVEN INDIANS WON'T TAKE IT

(By George Minot)

The whole Government policy of buying food and taking it off the market to keep prices high was preposterous before Russia gave the Koreans the order to march. Now it is obsolete as well as being absurd.

Yet while the administration is pleading with people not to hoard, it is continuing to do the same thing itself. The consequences border on the ridiculous. In no other one thing in the tangled series of contradictions, uncertainties, and confusions that have characterized our domestic policy have our elected officials looked as pitiful.

If you were looking for anything on which to base your battle cry of "Let's throw the rascals out," you couldn't choose better than to take the whole silly matter of crop supports and food surpluses.

It was virtually unnoticed in the excitement that followed the treachery in Korea, but President Truman made one of the most extraordinary about-faces in a career that has been characterized by such incidents. That was when he asked Congress for authority to put these billions of dollars worth of surplus foods back on the market.

PRESIDENT DOES AN ABOUT-FACE

Under his proposal, sales of the Government-hoarded food would be made to wholesalers, thus presumably checking the rise in food prices. This would end price support by Government to the extent that Mr. Truman would exercise the authority he asked for.

This is a major change in policy here at home, just as we have changed our mind on what to do in Asia. In the past Mr. Truman has been for more and more support of crops and this policy has paid him big dividends in the farm States. He undoubtedly was less surprised than anybody else when Congressmen from the South and West would have nothing to do with his proposal. Most of them are up for reelection this fall and they want the farmers to love them as they did in 1948.

And you probably noticed that the happiest hoarder of them all, Secretary Brannan, scorned any proposal to dispose of food when he went before a Congress committee. Under the law, most of these surpluses of butter, dried eggs, potatoes, cheese, wheat, and corn, among others, can be sold only at 5 percent above the support price. This should be removed.

It is better to go along with the newest idea of the President and make it possible to unload the hoarded food at the price the Government paid, not only to halt scare buying, but to get rid of a lot of the stuff that is spoiling.

CAN'T UNLOAD THEM

Brannan asked Congress only for $50,000,000 to repackage and transport some of the spoilable surpluses now piling up.

He is having a terrible time giving them away to overseas organizations in the welfare field, to persons on relief rolls and for consumption in the school-lunch program. Nobody wants them, but the Government under the law has to go on losing millions in order to keep the prices up. Even the Indians who are on the schedule for the free handouts have sent word to Washington that they have had enough.

While the storage and refrigeration bills are piling up for the Department of Agriculture, the Defense Department is trying to figure out how much extra money it is going to need to buy butter, eggs, cheese, and dried milk for our expanded fighting forces, both in camps in this country and overseas.

Do you think the Army and Navy can have any of those millions of tons of surplus food Brannan has stored all over the country? Now don't be silly. Of course not. That is not the way this Government does business.

POLITICAL HOWL

Of course it is all owned by the Government, and you, the taxpayers, bought it. To a sensible person, it would seem to be logical simply to turn over a few hundred thousand pounds of surplus butter to our fighting forces. But you have forgotten one thing. That wouldn't be good politics.

There would be an awful howl from the farm belt, and it was those States that used to be in the Republican column that carried the Democrats to victory 2 years ago. You wouldn't want to offend those farmers in an election year, would you?

Even if Mr. Truman would like to change the price-support program he can't get the other Democrats to go along with him—either in Congress or in the Agriculture Department. Instead, Secretary Brannan is trying to explain that all his hoarded food has been "a stabilizing factor to counteract sudden inflation of food prices."

In asking for his $50,000,000 to repackage and move some of the stuff, Brannan revealed how rapidly this perishable food has been piling up. For instance, in the year ending the middle of July he bought 208,000,000 pounds of dried eggs, 228,000,000 pounds of butter, 609,000,000 pounds of dried milk and 94,000,000 pounds of cheese.

STORY ON GRAIN

Nobody really knows how much of this stuff he had a year ago, but Brannan realizes there is danger of a $281,000,000 loss if he can't find a way to dispose of a lot of it now—that is, as long as the Army and Navy doesn't get it.

Hoarded grain isn't quite as embarrassing to the Government, but the support price of feed works a terrible hardship on Massachusetts farmers who produce poultry and dairy products. They are dependent on the feed they must have through shipments from the West and this is kept at an artificially high price while the Government bins literally are bursting with the surplus.

Senator SALTONSTALL pointed out the other day how the local farmer is caught in the squeeze and how the Government is working against his best interests.

In 1949, 6¾ dozen eggs would buy 100 pounds of feeds. This year it takes 9¾ dozen to buy the same thing. A year ago it required 11$^{3}/_{10}$ pounds of poultry meat to buy 100 pounds of feed. Now it takes 21 pounds. In 1949, 100 pounds of milk would buy 123 pounds of grain. Now it will buy only 112 pounds.

CUT IN HALF

Thus it isn't surprising that since the middle of 1949 our poultry farmers' returns over feed costs, in the sale of eggs, have been about half those received the year before.

But SALTONSTALL added he was even more interested in the consumers, who are getting the rawest deal out of this whole silly support program. In a Senate speech just before the outbreak of the present emergency, he put it better than perhaps it had been put before:

"The consumers of my State have repeatedly written to me that they cannot understand why the taxpayers' money is used to buy farm commodities which are then stored out of reach of the consumer, in many cases until they are unfit for human consumption. This the people of Massachusetts cannot understand. They believe it to be foolishness. * * * Could there be a greater paradox than exists in this situation? The American taxpayer and consumer is being asked to pay money in taxes for price support on the one hand so that he may have the doubtful privilege of paying excessively high prices for his food on the other."

If Mr. Truman wants to reverse himself now and if he is sincere in asking Congress for authority to get rid of his tons of surplus, for goodness' sake let him. And then see if that can't be the opening wedge in ending the whole foolish program. Pretty soon the Department of Agriculture is going to have 65,000,000 bushels of new potatoes on its hands that nobody wants. Then we start all over again.

Investigations of the Buchanan Lobby Committee

OF
HON. E. E. COX
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, the Buchanan Lobby Committee announced that, in the course of its investigation of the Civil Rights Congress, it had examined the records of the Amalgamated Bank, of New York.

It is to wonder whether the Buchanan committee learned the facts concerning the payment of Gerhardt Eisler's defaulted bond—defaulted when he left the country on the Russian vessel Batory to assume his present position as chief propagandist for the Soviets in the Russian zone of Germany.

Here are the facts:

Eisler's defaulted bond was paid with a certified check drawn on the Amalgamated Bank, of New York, drawn against the Civil Rights Congress' bail bond fund; and that certified check was delivered to, and accepted by, the clerk of the District Court of the United States in and for the District of Columbia.

The check was drawn by the trustees of the Civil Rights Congress' bail bond fund which, it would seem, must have been created to provide bail bonds for other Communists than Eisler, as the name of the fund would seem to imply.

These facts may be verified by inquiry of Harry Hull, Esq., clerk, District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The Amalgamated Bank of New York, along with several others of the same name, is owned by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union, which union also owns and operates many other commercial businesses throughout the country, including a chain of four frequency modulation radio stations, licensed by the Federal Communications Commission. A few years ago, that union represented to the FCC, in writing, that its commercial concerns represented investments of more than $81,000,000.

One of the union's frequency modulation radio stations—WFDR, of New York City—has a working arrangement with a Washington, D. C., frequency modulation station, namely, WCFM, the officials and stockholders of which have somewhat questionable backgrounds and connections for being in the radio business.

Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union was headed by Sidney Hillman—of "clear it with Sidney" fame—during the lifetime of that labor leader.

Let us hope the Buchanan committee develops the facts of these matters, and reports them to the House.

Universal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a pointed and challenging editorial, Universal Service, appearing in the Boston Post, Boston, Mass., of August 11, 1950:

UNIVERSAL TRAINING

For a long time this country has resisted the idea of universal military training. The atmosphere of compulsion, intrinsic in such a system, does not mix easily with the air of free democracy which we are used to breathing. As a peace-loving nation, we would much prefer to have our young men preoccupied with planning useful careers for themselves than to start them off with a tough, hardening course in war tactics designed primarily to teach them how to fight and kill.

But, the world situation being what it is these days, we are coming to the realization that we cannot always have things as we like them. The Korean war, for the second time in less than a decade, has taught us a lesson on the cost of the lack of preparedness, and the international crisis, as it goes along, seems to get worse instead of better. Certainly there is no easy solution on the horizon, and many in positions of authority believe there will not be for years to come.

The course of events is forcing us to a decision that will have to be faced soon, regardless of how the fighting goes in the Far East, for this is a basic issue that goes deep into the family fabric. How it will be settled will affect virtually every American to a greater or lesser extent. It will have far-reaching consequences on our way of life for years to come.

Congress has long shied from taking a stand. But now it will have to do so. It was learned yesterday, through a spokesman for the Defense Department, that a bill for universal military training is already in process of preparation and will be presented in short order. It will require training for all youths of 18 and 19.

Contrasted with the draft, this will not be a rush job. It will not even go into effect until after the Korean war, regardless of whether it wins early passage or not. It is designed to bring our country up to snuff on a long-term basis in conformance with the uncertain days that lie ahead.

It will be hard to argue against the need of such a measure in these times. It will be a step toward stability in a field where we have blown hot and cold in the past with costly results. Certainly we do not intend to let our military machine rust after the Korean war, as we did after each of the two World Wars, only to be caught by surprise again, with consequent heavy loss of life at the start and an immeasurably harder job to be done than if we had been ready in the first place.

There is much to be said for UMT also on the grounds of responsibility and education. The training, under such a program, would not be all for war. Its instruction would be mental as well as physical, with many facets reaching into courses of college caliber. It would provide openings for many boys that might not otherwise have a chance to develop their talents. And it would indoctrinate in all a sense of duty and responsibility toward their country that would make them better citizens the rest of their lives.

Our better minds are all for such a program. A special committee of civilians 3 years ago recommended that it be adopted. President Truman has said that he is in favor of it. Now the final word rests with Congress.

That it will be expensive, quite aside from the human angle, goes without saying. At the start it will cost an estimated $600,000,000 a year, rising to a possible $2,000,000,000 later. It will involve 900,000 youths annually, as well as 200,000 military men who will be needed to train them.

The project is of great magnitude, indeed. But so are the stakes of the international game in which it will strengthen our hand.

Well Done, Tribute to American Red Cross

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to express my personal gratitude and the thanks of my people in Minnesota's Ninth Congressional District to the American Red Cross for the aid it furnished during the Red River Valley floods this spring and summer.

The disaster services of the Red Cross county chapter chairmen in the disaster area—Paul Hanson, Kittson County; Clarence B. Johnson, Marshall County; Philip A. Anderson, Polk County; A. H. Fikkan, Roseau County; and Oliver W. Poole, Clay County.

A report on the disaster flood-relief program of the American Red Cross as given to me in a letter dated August 8, 1950, by C. F. Rowland, assistant administrator, disaster services, American Red Cross, follows:

Washington, D. C., August 8, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
United States House of Representatives, Washington D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAGEN: The American Red Cross has just terminated its disaster relief program in North Dakota and western Minnesota which has been in operation since March 28.

We thought you might be interested in some of the statistics included in the final report of the operation as they affect the state of Minnesota. The director of this particular operation reports on the very excellent cooperation received from the Governor of the State and all the State agencies involved and also speaks most highly of the service rendered by over 450 volunteers who worked long hours over an extended period of time helping to relieve the suffering and assisting their neighbors who were unfortunate enough to be victims of this disaster.

This disaster covered a distance of approximately 700 miles, extending from Bowman County in the southwestern part of North Dakota to the Lake of the Woods in the northwestern part of Minnesota. We have operated in five counties in the State of Minnesota. There were no lives lost during the evacuation but four deaths were contributed to the disaster; one man in Marshall County was electrocuted when a high-tension wire broke and fell into the water near where he was standing. Two persons were killed in Crookston when their house was demolished by a gas explosion caused by the high water and one boy was drowned in Moorhead when he broke through the ice on the flooded area. We estimate that 3,150 families suffered a loss. Of this number 1,777 families requested assistance. One thousand four hundred and ninety-eight families were given emergency assistance in one or more of the following services: Mass feeding, mass shelter, transportation and feed for livestock. In addition, 241 families received individual assistance. There were 153 houses repaired and 3 houses built. We also repaired 14 and built 22 barns and other buildings.

The total amount spent for relief was $81,349.35, and was distributed as follows:

Rescue, transportation, and shelter	$25,327.10
Food and clothing	7,594.26
Rebuilding and repair	33,721.11
Medical, nursing, and sanitation	1,482.21
Household furnishings	11,794.06
Farm supplies, livestock, and equipment	1,430.61

Minnesota

Kittson County	$15,229.96
Marshall County	18,392.82
Polk County	44,616.16
Clay County	2,088.39
Roseau County	1,022.02

Our statistics covering estimated property damage caused by this flood in Minnesota are as follows:

Number of homes destroyed	27
Number of homes damaged	240
Number of other buildings destroyed	133
Number of other buildings damaged	1,040

Very truly yours,

C. F. ROWLAND,
Assistant Administrator, Disaster Services.

Lay Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as some publications, like the Washington Post, and some individuals, like the Roosevelts and President Truman, have over the years regarded communism as a heresy, not a conspiracy, and its exponents and advocates as superior individuals, superintellectuals, exercising the right of free thought, speech, and press, even though the net result of their efforts, if successful, would be the overthrow of our Government, now that communism and its disciples are being recognized for what they are, a conspiracy to overthrow our Government, either by force or subterfuge, let those who have criticized, attempted to intimidate and silence, all who over the years have been attempting to expose and eradicate communism and its adherents, lay off.

America is now reaping a harvest of thorns and thistles as the result of their sowing. The least they can now do is to cease to claim the right to tell us where we should go from here.

An editorial from the South Bend Tribune of August 11, captioned "Great change," reads as follows:

GREAT CHANGE

As the Christian Science Monitor expresses it the American tradition up to June 25, 1950, was "more or less willingness to consider communism at home a heresy, not a conspiracy." To a marked extent that tradition was primarily official, not popular. Most Americans at least sensed that communism actually was a conspiracy instead of a mere heresy and were inclined to approve of protective measures in conformity with the conspiracy situation. In Washington, especially in the executive branch, the attitude toward Communists was essentially unrealistic.

Communists and fellow travelers made the most of the opportunities provided for them by the official attitude in the war years. Since 1945, even while the revolutionary, conspiratorial nature of communism was becoming plainer every day, avowed Reds and persons who were pro-Communist while refraining from actual Communist membership have benefited by official tolerance. By waiting until the war in Korea developed to act in accordance with the long-plain fact that communism is a conspiracy the Truman administration forfeited public acclamation for forthright, realistic action against the Reds in this country.

Now President Truman is recommending extension of the Foreign Agents' Reservation Act to cover Communists and impliedly fellow travelers. A Federal judge in San Francisco, convinced that Harry Bridges is one of the most important Communist figures in America, has ruled that the alien longshoremen's union leader is ineligible for bail. It looks as if much damage has been done by the prolonged official pretense that communism was a mere domestic heresy. Many Americans are relieved by the signs of a more realistic official attitude from now on.

But it is not enough that communism be stamped out here. There is no reason at all why those who tolerated it and by their tolerance encouraged it should now be accepted as guides pointing the way out of the potentially disastrous situation in which we are involved.

Let us have some concrete evidence that their apparent repentance is sincere, a cessation of their efforts to tell the rest of us what to think, say, and do.

Address by Senator Martin at American Legion Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me at the annual convention of the American Legion, Department of Pennsylvania, held at Philadelphia on August 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR EDWARD MARTIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, DEPARTMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT PHILADELPHIA

It is always an inspiration to attend the meetings of the American Legion.

Since it was organized in Paris 31 years ago, the Legion has worked ceaselessly to spread the gospel of real Americanism.

Not only has the Legion preached patriotism and loyalty to the flag, but it has exerted all its powerful influence toward building American strength as a bulwark of peace and freedom in the world.

Through all its existence the American Legion has been guided by the sacred principles formulated here in the city of Philadelphia 174 years ago.

Grave problems confronted the founding fathers when they met in the Old State House to establish a new Nation.

They had no thought of personal safety when they defied the armed might of the British Empire.

They knew that the struggle for American liberty would be long and perilous.

They knew that victory would not be achieved without blood, suffering and sacrifice.

But they faced the future with faith, confidence and courage. In signing the Declaration of Independence they proclaimed their "firm reliance in the protection of Divine Providence" and pledged to each other "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor."

We of the American Legion meet here today in the shadow of Independence Hall. We meet at a time when the United States faces problems just as grave as those of 1776.

To preserve American freedom and to have the world from Communist slavery calls for the same courageous spirit of sacrifice.

Again we are called upon to pledge "our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor" in the cause of freedom.

To every member of the Legion and to every other loyal American those soul-stirring words have the same meaning as they did 174 years ago.

It should be perfectly clear to everyone that the Godless philosophy of communism aims to conquer and dominate the world.

It should be perfectly clear that we face a well organized and strongly equipped offensive which hopes to overrun and destroy every nation where human rights are recognized.

It should now be perfectly clear that the conflict in Korea is not just a little war to be fought and won in a short time by heroes on the front line.

We would be lacking in patriotism if we closed our eyes to the fact that the blazing battle line in Korea may spread into the fury of world war III on many fronts in the Far East and in Europe.

How many previous American lives must be lost before we fully understand that the future of civilization hangs in the balance and that the outcome will be decided by the measure of American military and spiritual strength?

I believe most Americans are aware by this time that we are headed for a final showdown.

It may not come immediately. Will it come this year, next year, or within the next 10 years?

It is not within the power of any of us to answer that question. But I am firmly convinced, and I am sure my comrades of the Legion agree with me, that the showdown is coming and we must be prepared.

To the everlasting credit of the Legion it must be said that it was among the first to warn against the dangerous course we were following.

Long before World War II the Legion demanded that we be prepared to meet any threat from fascism or communism or any other alien philosophy which sought to destroy freedom.

The Legion advocated that we build up our Army into the most powerful striking force in the world, that we strengthen our Navy on every ocean and that we give our Air Force complete superiority over that of any potential enemy.

The Legion sought support for universal military training so that Uncle Sam would have a reservoir of men ready for service in any emergency.

The Legion advocated industrial preparation so that when necessary the tremendous productive capacity of the United States could be converted immediately to war production.

The Legion demanded that every Red and every fellow-traveler be removed from positions in the Government where many held places of trust and importance.

If your plan of an adequate national defense and 100 percent Americanism had been heeded there might have been no Pearl Harbor and no South Korea.

The Legion program for national defense was not popular but it had my complete support. Back in May of 1947 I had the honor of addressing the national convention of the Legion in Indianapolis.

In my speech I said, and I quote:

"While war with Russia may not be imminent we must be ready for any eventuality—strong, alert, and united at home. We've got to keep America a powerful enemy and a powerful friend abroad.

"Our national defense must be based upon the ideals of a republic. That means equal obligation as well as equal rights for every citizen. In the kind of world we live in today, in which things happen swiftly, equal obligation means to me universal military training. That is the only way to be ready on time when an emergency occurs.

"I stand for, and I know the American Legion stands for, a highly trained Regular Army, backed by a well-organized, properly trained civilian reserve.

"We should have the best and strongest Navy and the best and strongest Air Force we can conceive.

"We had them in the recent war. Only fools would think of surrendering them now.

"No matter how hard we hope and pray, this world and this Nation have not yet finished with conflict for all time.

"Until the aggressor nations agree to lay down their arms and prove they want to live at peace with us, let us keep our muscles hard.

"An America gone soft and flabby is an America inviting attack.

"Behind the front line of steel and fire we must keep our industry, our labor, and our agriculture ready."

But we failed to keep our muscles hard. And today we are paying the price of our unpreparedness with the lives of American boys who are fighting against heavy odds in far off Korea.

Why do we find ourselves in this critical situation?

Why are we faced today with nearly all of Asia and a large part of Europe under Communist domination?

Let me tell you why. It is because we sold out one country after another—at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam—in the hope of appeasing Joe Stalin.

Because our leaders threw in the ash can the recommendations and the warnings of Gen. Pat Hurley, General Wedemeyer, and other real Americans, and followed the advice of fuzzy-minded pro-Communists in the State Department like Alger Hiss.

Because the Truman-Acheson policy in the Far East was responsible for one blunder after another.

Because our Government announced publicly that we would not defend South Korea or Formosa, giving the Communists a formal invitation to take a free ride.

Then, when President Truman suddenly reversed that policy, we found ourselves outnumbered and outgunned in Korea, completely unprepared to stop the Communist-trained and equipped North Korean divisions.

It was shocking to learn that of the $90,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress for defense during the last 5 years only nine billions were spent for new aircraft, ships, tanks, and other weapons.

That figure and the developments in Korea make it perfectly clear that we are totally unprepared now to meet a formidable foe.

It was estimated recently by Winston Churchill that Russia today has 175 active divisions and that within a few months she could put 300 divisions in the field. Of the active divisions one-third are mechanized or armored.

What do we have to match that strength.

If the Communists should strike tomorrow in western Europe, using half of their divisions, the defending forces of the United States, England, France, and Belgium combined would number only 12 divisions, of which only two are armored.

Well, my comrades, the big question now is, What are we going to do about it?

I can't answer that question because Washington today is a bedlam of political confusion. The administration in control apparently has no definite plan of action. There is delay, hesitation, and pussyfooting at a time when decisions of paramount importance must be made.

Playing for political advantage, whether by Democrats or Republicans, is too dangerous when the safety and welfare of the American people are at stake.

Politics should have no part in the defense of the United States.

The American people should be told now that the present situation calls for immediate and complete mobilization of all our forces, military, labor, industrial, agricultural, financial, and spiritual.

We must arm to the hilt—now—because this time there will be no one to hold off the enemy while we get ready as our allies did in World War I and World War II.

We must do everything possible to stabilize our economy and to prevent inflation.

This calls for rigid control of materials needed for war production.

It calls for immediate freezing of prices and wages to prevent a race between earning and the cost of living. Price control cannot be effective without wage control.

All Government spending not connected with national defense must be cut to the bone.

The American people should be told, completely and honestly, the dangers that may be encountered on the road ahead.

They should be told, fully and fairly, the sacrifices they may be called upon to make if we are involved in total war.

They should be told about the sharply increased burden of taxation they will be called upon to assume to pay the cost of our Nation's defense.

The people should be given this information now. It should not be delayed until after the November election.

When the American people are honestly informed they can be trusted to make whatever sacrifices may be necessary, willingly and patriotically.

If we are to retain our freedom as we Americans know it, we must pay for the cost of this war as nearly as possible out of current revenues.

When are comrades are giving their lives in battle no patriotic American should be thinking in terms of increased profits, bigger dividends, or higher wages.

We have come to a time when everyone of us should be willing to push all his chips into the game.

All that counts is victory.

During World War II, we observed how certain selfish and unpatriotic men enriched themselves by profiteering and in black-market operations.

There was tax dodging, price gouging, hoarding, artificial scarcities, and other illicit practices which sabotaged the war effort.

Some became millionaires overnight, so to speak, at the expense of their fellow citizens, while the flower of American youth gave their lives for their country on foreign soil.

This time it must not happen. It will not happen if an aroused public puts patriotism first and cooperates to prevent such dastardly practices.

Those who take advantage of war for their own personal enrichment while their fellow Americans endure the hardships and tragedies of war deserve the contempt of every real American. They belong behind prison bars. They are traitors to their country.

While we are preparing to defend freedom in the world against Communist aggression overseas, let us not relax our vigilance against the spread of communism at home.

Every enrolled Communist is an enemy of the United States. They advocate the overthrow of our Government by force. They are traitors to the country which has given them freedom, opportunity, and protection.

Steps should be taken to revoke the citizenship of those who have been naturalized and they should be deported. All native-born Communists should be placed where they can do no damage to our American institutions.

There is no group in the United States with such an important part to play in this crisis as the American Legion.

We may have a hard road to travel. But Americans in every generation have endured defeats and hardship to gain liberty and to sustain it.

Our forefathers fought for freedom. They carried their flintlock rifles, with fixed bayonets, in order to gain that freedom.

In subsequent wars all over the world men have carried their rifles, with fixed bayonets; they have fought on every sea; they have battled in the air; and they have gone under water in order to protect those freedoms.

Regardless of the brutal hand of the Reds in Korea, this is no time for hysteria in the United States.

We must not be dismayed. We must tighten our belts and work and fight harder.

We must have courageous leadership. We must have willing discipline. We must move forward with our flags flying.

The American flag in this crisis must be the banner of 100-percent freedom of the individual. It must be 100 percent for tolerance and 100 percent against bigotry. It is the flag of 100-percent Americanism.

We will welcome the flags of all nations, who believe in God, in individual freedom, and tolerance.

All those flags can wave gloriously together, symbolizing faith in our ideals, faith in ourselves, and faith in our God. With these ideals in our hearts, we will come forth victorious.

Formosa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., Thursday, August 10, 1950:

Before another day passes the American people should come to grips with the tremendous decision they face in Formosa. The statement of Averell Harriman following his hurried trip to Japan makes it clear that if there is to be a change in policy, the people will have to press it upon the Government.

At this moment the United States stands on the brink of a far graver danger than Korea. It faces the possibility of war with China. It would enter such a war not only without United Nations sanction but without allies and even against the desires of its best friends in Europe and Asia. It risks, indeed, not only war but the turning of Asia to communism.

Why? To defend the principle of nonaggression, as in Korea? No. Formosa is involved in a civil war in China, with no line crossed and no indictment of an aggressor. To obtain a vital military base? No. Formosa is less than vital if America strongly holds Okinawa and the Philippines.

Why then? Because emotionally, politically, and financially certain groups in the United States are committed to the Chiang Kai-shek regime. Many Americans have become accustomed to regard it as the best agency for American efforts to check Cominform plans in Asia. Others greatly admire the long struggle of Generalissimo and Madame Chiang against Japan and the Reds.

But has not America fulfilled its obligation to the Chiangs? Will not continued support of them harm the struggle to save Asia from communism and from Russian domination? Can anyone cite impartial testimony which holds that Chiang can rewin the confidence of the Chinese people or defeat the armies of Mao? Are not the anti-Communist forces in China more likely to form around new leadership, free from the record of corruption, incompetence, and unpopularity which clings to the Chiang regime?

What are the likely results of continued support of the Chiangs? Embroilment with the Chinese Reds. That is the Chiangs' best hope—as it is Stalin's. Moscow doubtless counts also on such a course promoting Russian and Communist influence by further alienating Asian opinion—plainly stated by India—which supports the United Nations in Korea but not America in China.

The decision announced on June 27 to interpose the American fleet between Formosa and the mainland was a reversal of earlier refusals to intervene in China's civil war. It aimed at neutralizing Formosa and leaving its future status to negotiation and possible determination by the UN. But the commitment appears too small to insure protection of Formosa and too great to avoid entanglement.

There should be no glossing over of the ugly features of an alternative policy. It would risk Red China's conquest of Formosa. The American people should face all the implications of that risk. They should also recognize that the present policy does not escape it. And they should count the positive advantages of freeing themselves from all the risks entailed by continued involvement with the Chiangs—including the possibility of war on the Chinese mainland.

Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I have here a clipping from this morning's New York Times which demonstrates conclusively the urgent need for the passage of the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston Communist registration bill, S. 2311.

This clipping tells of a prominent Canadian clergyman, editor in chief of the United Church Observer, a periodical which reaches 2,000,000 people, who signed the phony Stockholm peace petition, and has now repudiated his signature.

He said he signed the petition in good faith on the ground that the appeal was one to which any peace lover might honestly subscribe. Subsequently, he discovered his picture spread across the Toronto Communist newspaper, the Canadian Tribune, revealing the close tie-up between the Communist and this phony peace petition.

"Had I known of the tie-up between the petitioners and the Communists," he declared, "I would certainly have had nothing whatsoever to do with it."

Mr. President, hundreds of thousands of well-wishing people have been similarly deluded by the cunning front strategy used by the Communists.

It is precisely for the protection of these people that S. 2311 provides for the complete identification and registration of Communist conspirators. Innocent people, busy with their daily affairs, do not have the skill or the facilities of following the Communist cunning and strategy. For their protection there is required careful criteria, expertly administered by competent Government authorities, to expose Communist-front strategy.

This protection is provided by S. 2311 which ought to be passed at once.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SIGNER CONDEMNS STOCKHOLM APPEAL—EDITOR OF CHURCH PAPER WARNS CANADIANS AGAINST PETITION AS LINKED WITH REDS

(By George Dugan)

TORONTO, August 14.—One of the signers of the so-called Stockholm peace appeal warned Canadian clergymen and churchgoers today to refrain from adding their signatures to the controversial petition, despite their "passion for peace."

The warning was voiced by the Reverend Dr. A. J. Wilson, editor-in-chief of the United Church Observer, in the leading editorial of the periodical's August 15 issue, out today.

The Observer, published in Toronto, is the official organ of the church, which claims a membership of nearly 2,000,000 persons.

Dr. Wilson said he had signed the petition "in good faith" several weeks ago on the ground that the appeal was "one to which any peace lover might honestly subscribe."

Shortly thereafter, he wrote, "My picture was published under a six-column banner heading in the Toronto Communist paper, the Canadian Tribune. This demonstrated a close tie-up between the sponsors of the petition and the Communists."

APPEAL IS CONDEMNED

Subsequently, Dr. Wilson added the central committee of the World Council of Churches, meeting here, warned church members that the Stockholm appeal must be regarded as a "strategy of propaganda rather than a genuine peace proposal."

With that judgment "I am, in the light of my experiences, in full accord," he declared.

"Had I known of the tie-up between the petitioners and the Communists, which the hurried publication of my picture in the Tribune and the subsequent news release have established beyond the shadow of a doubt, I would certainly have had nothing whatsoever to do with it."

The editorial was written, Dr. Wilson noted, after he had received a query from the Montreal Gazette asking confirmation of an announcement from the Canadian Peace Congress that he had signed the appeal.

Dr. Wilson said he was publishing the exchange of correspondence "to make clear to our readers the views of the editor, and to warn ministers and members of the church what they may expect if their passion for peace should lead them, as it led us, to sign the peace petition, which is widely circulated and has come to be known as the 'Stockholm Appeal.'"

OUTLAWING OF BOMB URGED

The Stockholm appeal was issued last March by the Congress of Partisans of Peace. It demanded the outlawing of atomic weapons but without "effective" international inspection and control.

At a press interview this afternoon, the Reverend Dr. Toyohiko Kagawa, Japanese evangelist, said that he had expected the outbreak of the Korean war. The Japanese clergyman is here to address the World Convention on Christian Education, now in session at the University of Toronto.

He predicted that even if the North Koreans were driven back to the Thirty-eighth Parallel they would continue to be a threat.

Asked if the Korean conflict might lead to a third world war, Dr. Kagawa replied that the crisis in that country was a "continuation of the Second World War."

He discounted the possibility of an increase in Communist strength in his country.

Secretary Brannan's Zeal

OF
HON. ROBERT A. TAFT
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Secretary Brannan's Zeal," published in the New York Herald Tribune of August 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY BRANNAN'S ZEAL

It is strange to find Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan so disturbed about the recent rises in some commodity prices. He is the campaigning Secretary who has developed a whole Federal program to maintain farm prices at a high level. But since the Korean emergency, with its resultant stimulant to prices, he has been militantly seeking out speculators on the several commodity exchanges with intent to bring legal action against them if he possibly can. He has succeeded in arousing some public sentiment against speculation as though it were something reprehensible and had no place in the economy of the Nation, though, for the volume of energy he has expended in this direction, the interest is relatively pathetic.

There is more than concern for the administration's useful little people in this outcry from Mr. Brannan and his speculator-probing Commodity Exchange Authority. Pending before Congress is the administration's bill for economic controls and in it is authority for the Secretary of Agriculture to fix margins on futures trading in the seven commodities under the Commodity Exchange Act. These commodities—wheat, soybeans, cottonseed oil, lard, eggs, wool tops, and cotton—account for 90 percent of the trading. This would give the politically operated Department of Agriculture strong control over the market places of the Nation's commodity buyers and users.

Unlawful speculation is policed at all times. It is hard to get away with anything which violates the letter of the Exchange Act. Because commodity prices rose after the Korean incident, it should not indicate anything more than is indicated by the price rises in other goods and services. The use of futures trading to hedge against price fluctuations is an old, honorable device to maintain equable operating costs throughout the year and assure stable retail prices. Without the speculator there would be no futures market in which to hedge. Care should be taken by Congress to see that nothing is done to upset the established and natural function of this important center-cog of the Nation's economic machinery. Mr. Brannan has done little to show he would be able to administer commodity trading any better than those who do it now under a free system.

Will Farmers Be the Goats of a Wartime Inflation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Will Farmers Be the Goats of a Wartime Inflation?" I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in full, and also the table, which was prepared by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, which was released in May 1950, together with the figures thereon.

There being no objection, the article and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Farmers Union Herald of St. Paul, Minn., for August 7, 1950]

WILL FARMERS BE THE GOATS OF A WARTIME INFLATION?

Farmers have been squeezed since the end of World War II by falling prices and increasing costs. Will they be the goats again of inflation if prices are frozen or rolled back?

Here is the record of what farmers have received in terms of wages. Will the freeze be at two bits an hour or on a par with labor and industry?

Type of farming	Hourly wage, 1937 to 1941	Hourly wage, 1948	Hourly wage, 1949
Spring wheat, wheat roughage, livestock	$0.25	$1.57	$0.64
Corn Belt cash-grain farmer	.35	1.62	1.07
Corn Belt farmer, hog, dairy	.24	1.02	.81
Spring wheat small-grain farmer	.28	1.65	.95

The above figures are from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, released in May 1950.

The figures represent what you get when you divide all your net earnings by the number of hours of all labor used on your farm.

Farmers demand stability at full parity.

Improvement of Our Intelligence Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following interesting article. This letter appeared in the column of the Boston Sunday Herald, Boston, Mass., August 13, 1950:

FORMER ZACHARIAS AIDE QUESTIONS SET-UP

To the EDITOR of the HERALD:

I have just read Senator SALTONSTALL'S plea for support of our countrymen in Korea, Bill Cunningham's analysis of the Korean situation, and your splendid editorial entitled "Prophecy of Peril," in which you analyze my former associate, Admiral Zacharias' forthcoming book, Behind Closed Doors.

In view of the above it is interesting to recall some suggestions we made in 1944. At that time I was serving as a special assistant to Admiral Zacharias, who was then deputy director of naval intelligence. We had just completed a personnel audit of the United States Naval Intelligence Service, for which work we were ostracized and divorced from intelligence activity. (Incidentally, the Earl Report on the United State Naval Intelligence Service, which has never been declassified as a secret document to my knowledge, might make interesting reading for some of the brass in Washington now.) Admiral King, who was one of the really great naval officers of all time, thought that our intelligence activities could be improved. We agreed and set out on the task of doing it.

Generally it was our notion that we would have to sharpen to razor keenness our real and partially developed skills of intelligence and psychological action. We felt that it was important to do this so that we could prevent war and win the peace. It seemed to us that intelligence soundly conceived, properly organized, and well administered offered the most fruitful avenue along which to proceed toward peace.

We felt rather strongly that the force of ideas, proven time after time, of tremendous effectiveness during the war was undeniably an area of effort which needed further methods, although necessary in some areas were felt to be about as important as the massed infantry attack, and, about as effective. It seemed to us that psychological action so effectively developed by the Russians could well be the mechanism by which we could lose the peace, and perhaps the very things we were fighting for.

Unfortunately for this country our notions fell on deaf ears, or our writings commanded the eyes of men who could not read. All except one, and that one, a great man, and a strong one, Jim Forrestal. He agreed with us. Admiral Zacharias' broadcasts to the Japs resulted. These were practical manifestations of what we meant by ideological intelligence activities.

Our stupid national policies soon caught up with our efforts. There was the larger problem of the unification of our armed services. Intelligence was shelved. Knowledge of what a potential enemy was going to do was again relegated to the "cookie pusher." To all intents and purposes effective, dynamic as opposed to static, intelligence activities went by the board. There seemed to be a feeling pervading our national thought that the usefulness and necessity of psychological action agencies, and dynamic intelligence organizations terminated with the cessation of hostilities. How fatal this kind of thinking has been is known only to our dead and rotting countrymen in Korea.

The future security of this country depends largely on an objective and scientific approach to the basic functional problem of the most propitious use of our intellectual faculties.

Although the present outlook is grim and very grave, I for one have faith and a firm belief in the inherent ability of our leaders finally to focus their attention on problems that need attention and with fairness to all and spite toward none clearly and intelligently solve those problems. I hope they don't wait too long before focusing on it.

The Russians, our present opponents are students of the psyche (the mind), and have long known to be, they have perfected this form of warfare to a point where it is as effective as the blitzkreig first was. It seems to me that we had better perceive this and understand the characteristics of the people with whom we have to deal and provide a mechanism which can deal with them.

You imply that Admiral Zacharias has a few axes to grind, including by implication the sale of his book. I associated personally with Admiral Zacharias for more than 3 years on and off, and since for upward of 10 years in all. He is absolutely of sterling integrity. There is no finer naval officer in the country today. There is no better informed man on intelligence activities. His treatment by the United States Navy is shocking, perhaps as shocking as his book is. He is a great American, a true patriot, a man who has unselfishly taken on the mission of trying by his books and lectures to teach the uninformed something about the finer arts of intelligence activities. If by these activities he is able to better promote the mission, I say praise God, for we are pretty nearly in the position of being desperately in need of divine guidance.

It seems to me that the time has come when we had better do a little hard and clear thinking.

ELLIOTT EARL.

Aid to Franco Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials from the St. Louis Post Dispatch, one dated August 3 and the other dated August 4, pointing out the significance and seriousness of the Senate action recently in voting aid to Franco Spain. The editorials express the opposition and the concern of many people and groups in connection with this action, and urge the House of Representatives to rectify the error of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 4, 1950]

FIFTEEN SENATORS VINDICATED

President Truman displayed leadership by his prompt and direct opposition to the O'Mahoney amendment to the foreign aid bill. This amendment attempts to order the Export-Import Bank to lend $100,000,000 to Franco for his limping regime in Spain.

As Mr. Truman says, such an amendment is entirely out of place in the foreign-aid bill. It should be removed. If the Senate does not rescind its ill-considered act, the job will be one for the House. The bill should not be sent to the White House with this out-of-place amendment tacked on.

Secretary of State Acheson also pointed out the impropriety of a shotgun order from Congress to the Export-Import Bank for a Spanish loan. Thus, this 65 to 15 vote in the heavily Democratic Senate has now been repudiated by the two officials most responsible for American foreign policy, the President and his Secretary of State.

The sponsor of this headlong amendment was Senator O'MAHONEY of Wyoming and its supporters included Senators MCCARRAN of Nevada, O'CONOR of Maryland, and MCCARTHY of Wisconsin.

Since the side of the 15 opposing Senators has now been upheld by President Truman and Secretary Acheson, this small band deserves to be saluted for its courage. They did not know they would have such high-placed support. They voted against the Franco amendment because they believed it was bad business. Their constituents deserve to know who they are:

Republicans: MORSE, Oregon; ECTON, Montana; FLANDERS, Vermont; and WILLIAMS, Delaware.

Democrats: ANDERSON, New Mexico; BENTON, Connecticut; BYRD, Virginia; DOUGLAS, Illinois; FREAR, Delaware; GRAHAM, North Carolina; GREEN, Rhode Island; HILL, Alabama; HUMPHREY, Minnesota; LEHMAN, New York; and THOMAS, Utah.

Delaware has the satisfaction of knowing that both of its Senators voted "no."

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 3, 1950]

AND NOW FRANCO

Secretary of State Acheson's opposition to the proposed $100,000,000 loan to the Franco dictatorship in Spain is qualified, but it is welcome however limited. Surely the House will now give more thought to what is involved than did the Senate when it passed the loan bill by the headlong vote of 65 to 15.

Before the Truman administration directs the Export-Import Bank to send a loan to Spain's Fascist overlord, somebody around the White House should count the terrific cost of such a step. And this cost needs to be reckoned, hardly at all in terms of money, but in the good will of democratic people and peoples aspiring to be free around the world.

Franco was set up by Hitler and Mussolini. The Axis dictators used the little Fascist's war against the Spanish Republic as a proving ground for World War II. They tried out new weapons, new tactics, and put armed forces in as though they were taking part in maneuvers. Without the support of the dictators in Berlin and Rome, Franco's armed rebellion would have lasted only a few weeks at the most.

As it turned out, El Caudillo was the only one of the despicable trio who survived popular wrath. By a series of good fortunes, if such they can be called, he has managed to hang on, though the financial basis of his iron-handed rule is and has been shaky for a long time.

A loan to Franco would do the United States a vast amount of harm among distant peoples whose support we should be very eager to have. It would amount to official notice that we will support any dictator, no matter how repressive his regime, if we think it is to our advantage—or if some influential pressure group is able to put that idea across.

Just how many police state characters do we in the United States intend to tie up with? We gave our backing to such a small-scale dictator in South Korea's Syngman Rhee. Now we are having to explain that the United States went to the defense of peace in the Orient and not to uphold Rhee and his reactionary, strong-arm methods.

After backing Chiang Kai-shek much too long without obtaining a change in his dictatorial and corrupt rule, the Truman administration finally decided it had poured money down Chiang's rat hole long enough. Now because of the possible relation of Formosa to our military operations in Korea, General MacArthur is talking about all-out defense of Formosa. That could involve the United States in a war with Mao's Chinese government which has driven Chiang off the continent of Asia. Naturally Chiang would like nothing better than to unload his lost war on us.

Indochina and Greece also come to mind and the list could be extended. In too many places we are seeming to back the unpopular dictators or puppets against whom communism has been able to present itself as a people's movement.

Why do we need to lend more color to this by sending $100,000,000 to Franco to bolster up his sagging economy? If this is a military move, let the Joint Chiefs of Staff say so and let the case, if there is one, be presented for it on that basis. If it is merely the economic shot-in-the-arm which Senator MCCARRAN of Nevada and other Franco apologists have been trying to arrange, then let that be no less clear.

And if the loan is proposed as a military measure Washington should reflect on its inevitable effect on all of western Europe above the Pyrences Mountains. Is it our wish to serve notice that France, western Germany and the Low Countries all are written off in advance?

Franco is against democracy just as much as Stalin is. All he wants of us is our money. We should have as little as possible to do with him and his denial of the human rights we cherish.

Address by Edwin S. Lanier Before the Kiwanis Club of Durham, N. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Edwin S. Lanier, mayor of Chapel Hill, N. C., delivered before the Kiwanis Club, of Durham, N. C., on August 10, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMUNISM IN CHAPEL HILL

Figuratively we in Chapel Hill dwell in glass houses. Nearly anything that happens in Chapel Hill has enough State-wide interest to give the newspapers a chance to splash it across their pages.

For Chapel Hill I beg you and the other people in North Carolina who may have done so to quit ridiculing and speaking unkindly of us just because we are cursed from time to time with the temporary presence of some transient, lying, rattlesnake Communist and a few of his loud-mouthed, moronic sympathizers. Because two of them now happen to get their mail through the Chapel Hill post office and some of their propaganda lie sheets through the local express office (although they do not live in Chapel Hill and are rarely seen on the streets of Chapel Hill), still we get branded throughout this State for being a spawning and breeding ground for Communists and circulators of the communistic Stockholm peace petition.

One of those traitors, we believe, is the one who recently slipped around town under cover of darkness scattering handbills denouncing your Judge Wilson. That rag was signed by an anonymous, crowning lie.

Percentagewise, what town in North Carolina of 20,000 or more people can guarantee that it has less Communists than we have in Chapel Hill?

Still we are ashamed that we have had or may now have a single one there. The people of Chapel Hill despise a Communist and his fellow travelers just as much as any of you do. We hold the termitic traitors to our country in nauseating contempt and begrudge them the free air they breathe. I don't believe there is a community anywhere in this country more alert and more diligent than Chapel Hill to get the facts about Communists and communistic activities and to report those facts to the FBI.

There is not an official file or governmental agency personnel folder in Chapel Hill that is not readily available to the FBI and the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities.

We are not Klu Kluxs, and we will not take the law—or the lack of needed law—into our own hands. We have done, and we will earnestly continue trying to do, in Chapel Hill, as we all everywhere have been directed to do by J. Edgar Hoover—report all the facts we can get to the FBI.

Furthermore, we will continue pleading to Congress and the Supreme Court to declare Communists to be what they actually are, and to strip them naked of the protections of our Constitution which they hide behind while they fanatically seek the use of every decent and trick their pathetic, sordid, twisted minds and imagination can concoct to overthrow and destroy the Government based on that Constitution. We have not refrained from enacting legislation against burglars for fear that thieves would go under ground, nor against bootleggers on the theory that legislation against bootlegging would make all of them law-abiding citizens. Because I have subscribed to constitution of humane treatment to animals does not prevent me from dealing decisively with a bedbug or rattlesnake which I may find in my home. Everything in me rebels when I see a picture of a young husband and father leaving his family to face death at the hands of Communists in Korea and on the same page the picture of 2 of the 10 Communists who for 10 months heaped contempt and insults on a Federal court judge during their trial for advocating the overthrow of the American Government.

If we stop our personal efforts to combat communism when we have reported facts to the FBI and then stand around burning out the wires of our nervous system denouncing communism, we have overlooked one of the most effective weapons of defense.

We are grossly and densely ignorant about communism. The truth about communism would frighten every one of us—and all of the people of these United States—as much as scales frighten an overweight person.

Comparatively few people in the United States, other than members of the Communist gang, really know and understand what communism is driving at and what it has done wherever it has succeeded in dividing, conquering, and enslaving.

Not a dozen 1950 graduates of the Durham High School, or the Chapel Hill High School, or any other high school in North Carolina, can write two factual and intelligent paragraphs about communism. How many of us in this room could stand up and from his own knowledge cite three points set out in the Communist manifesto, or give the barest sketch of the history of the Communists from Karl Marx to date?

Just as we will continue living in elemental fear of polio until we learn its secrets and how it paralyzes, we will live in fear of and face the dangers of communism until there is wide knowledge among all people of the facts about communism. Be not deceived—communism, regardless of all its slobberings about civil rights and the imperfections of a developing democracy, is aimed at and relentlessly and fanatically pushed toward one over-all objective, namely, the complete annihilation of personal freedom, the complete overthrow of representative government, and the smothering out of every expression of faith in God and the practice of Christianity.

Ohio Soldiers in the Capture of Manila

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter to the New York Herald Tribune dated July 24, 1950, and published in that newspaper under date of July 27, 1950. The letter deals with the part taken by the Thirty-seventh Division in the capture of Manila.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THOSE PRESENT AT MANILA

ROWAYTON, CONN., July 24, 1950.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

If we're going to set the record straight on who took Manila, let's really set it straight.

Mr. Milton MacKaye writes to point out that the Eleventh Airborne Division did much of the dirty work that enabled the First Cavalry to drive the initial column into the Philippine capital. He makes a passing reference to the Thirty-seventh and Twenty-fifth Divisions, which deserve a good deal more than that, especially the Thirty-seventh. As a war correspondent who at one time or another was with all the divisions named, I can attest to the statement that the Thirty-seventh "Buckeye" Division, an Ohio National Guard outfit, bore the brunt of the Manila fighting. Coming down the Luzon plains from Lingayen Gulf, it ran into the toughest opposition and made possible the last-minute dash of Brigadier General Chase's First Cavalry column. The latter indeed reached Manila first and liberated the Santo Tomas prisoners, but the Thirty-seventh actually took Manila in force hours later and then had the dirtiest job of cleaning out Jap snipers.

There has—Mr. MacKaye is right—been some exaggeration of the First Cavalry superiority. Nevertheless, it was and is one of the best in the business. It did the most dashing work in Luzon, as elsewhere, and has therefore been the most publicized. The all-around teamwork in the Luzon campaign, involving a half a dozen divisions or more, has never been fully appreciated and is, in the final analysis, a tribute to General MacArthur's leadership and strategic genius.

The Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Peace—It Could Be Wonderful" published in the Jewish Veteran, monthly newspaper of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE—IT COULD BE WONDERFUL

Even while it was getting ready to wield a big stick in Korea, communism was talking loudly of peace on March 19 of this year, when a covey of red-tinted doves lit on Stockholm for a meeting of the World Congress of Partisans of Peace.

From this temporary cote there emerged the Stockholm resolution, a straight-faced expression demanding prohibition of atomic weapons, strict international control of the atomic bomb, and condemnation of the first government to use atomic weapons as a war criminal.

The gimmick in this seemingly noble statement of principle was that the strict international control advocated for the production of atomic weapons was the Soviet plan rejected by the United Nations as unenforceable because it failed to provide for the United States-backed principle of inspection of atomic plants.

On May 31, less than a month before North Korean troops were to surge across the thirty-eighth parallel, the partisans of peace claimed 100,000,000 signatures to their resolution. In the United States, the busy little bees on the Daily Worker began promotional activities and the soliciting of signatures in major American cities. In no time at all, the wares of the partisans for peace were on display at the Peace Information Bureau in New York and the National Labor Peace Conference. This September something called the National Peace Congress is to convene in New York.

There is a strangely familiar lift to the paeans sung to peace in Communist circles these days. The tune differs in minor details from the melody intoned by Hitler at Munich in September 1938. There is also a new fiddler calling the tune, a musician named Stalin. But at the bottom, there is the war in Korea just as in 1939 there was the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

Peace, it is generally agreed, could be wonderful. But on the terms set forth by Communist-petition backers the buzzard would replace the dove as the bird of peace.

The peace petition, aimed at inveigling all people who have a genuine desire to see tranquillity restored to this quivering planet, reveals nothing of the intentions of its Communist authors. For those, one must turn to Soviet deeds as reflected in communism's past record and in its naked aggression in Korea today.

The pattern of Communist behavior until now gives no encouragement that Soviet cries of peace bear any closer relationship to the cause of man's freedom than when Molotov and Ribbentrop signed a peace pact in 1939.

Hungry Horse Kelly

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the news stories and editorials, I included with my remarks on the passing of Harry Kelly yesterday, I have today received the following on the passing of our beloved friend.

Under unanimous consent granted to me, I am inserting a front-page editorial from the Times-Monitor, of Kalispell,

Mont., Harry Kelly's old paper; a news story from the same, both dated August 10, 1950; and an editorial from the Daily Missoulian, of Missoula, Mont., dated August 9, 1950:

[From the Kalispell (Mont.) Times-Monitor of August 10, 1950]

HARRY J. KELLY

Everlastingly in western Montana the stature of Harry J. Kelly will grow. His lifetime ended at 3:15 Monday afternoon, quietly and mercifully. Sadness pervades us now—but we know that Mr. Kelly fulfilled every design of God or man during that span. Life had no more rewards than those bestowed on him in a 1-month period just 2 years ago. On July 10, 1948, he rode as grand marshal to the scene of the first blast and formal beginning of construction of Hungry Horse Dam. On August 4, the same year, with his family (for whom he lived) around him, he and Mrs. Kelly entertained hundreds of friends on their golden wedding anniversary.

Endowed with indomitable spirit and a sense of right, allied by a persuasive charm, Mr Kelly became the most influential weekly newspaper editor in the State of Montana. An analyst, even more than a man of vision, his arguments almost indisputable in the minds of other farsighted men who gradually and wholeheartedly enlisted their aid in western Montana's greatest development—Hungry Horse Dam. We here today can yet only visualize the benefits which will come in the form of power, flood control, irrigation, large and small industry—benefits which were clear in Mr. Kelly's eyes 25 years ago. The turning point came when the President of the United States, impressed by the personal charm and clear portrayal of the need and feasibility of the project as recited by this man, turned and said: "Hungry Horse? Well, I guess we'll have to give it some hay."

From the day the project was assured, Mr. Kelly looked forward. He advocated greater diversification of crops which would assure the success of small processing plants in the valley and a more stable income for a greater population here.

Backed by lesser resources, nevertheless Harry J. Kelly was a man of the full O. S. Warden-Rufus Wood stature. He defended his principles stubbornly, but pettiness or prejudice had no part in his speech or his writing. Montana has lost one of its most loyal and useful citizens. We of this office have lost our stanchest friend and wise and trusted confidant.

[From the Kalispell (Mont.) Times-Monitor of August 10, 1950]

H. J. KELLY PASSES AWAY MONDAY

Harry J. Kelly, for 20 years editor and publisher of the Flathead Monitor before his retirement 6 years ago, passed away at his home in Kalispell Monday afternoon. He was born in Prairie du Chien, Wis., October 6, 1869, and with his parents moved to Omaha, Nebr., while a child. He attended Creighton University, learned the printing trade, and came to Montana in 1888, establishing a weekly paper in Missoula. He later worked at the printing trade in Butte, returning to Missoula in 1895 to conduct the Bitter Root Times during the capitol fight. In 1896 he was married to Miss Mary See, a native of the Bitter Root Valley.

For a short time Mr. Kelly operated a newspaper at Hamilton and was sergeant at arms in the State legislature during the famous sixth session when the "war of the copper kings" was at its height. In 1905 he and Tom Stout started the weekly Fergus County Democrat at Lewistown. Later they purchased the Daily News and founded the present daily paper in that city. He was appointed registrar for the United States Land Office at Lewistown and served until after World War I.

Mr. Kelly sold his interest in the Lewistown paper and came to Kalispell in 1924, purchasing the Flathead Monitor. Determining the feasibility of a multi-purpose dam on the South Fork of the Flathead River, he devoted 20 years of influence and energy to the project. Kelly served as president of the Montana Press Association in 1943, and retired the following year after 54 years of newspapering in Montana.

Surviving are his wife, four children, Mrs. E. P. Peterson, of San Francisco; Miss Margaret A. Kelly, of Kalispell; Harry J. Kelly, Jr., of Seattle, and William G. Kelly, former postmaster here and now operating the radio station at Lewistown; and an only grandchild, William Patrick of Seattle.

Requiem high mass for Mr. Kelly was celebrated at St. Matthews Catholic Church Wednesday morning, with Rev. Father James Sheerin as celebrant. Burial was in Conrad Memorial Cemetery. Pallbearers were T. W. Elliot, F. O. Williams, Harry E. Lay, Jack Burg, Henry Lokensgard, and Howard Miller.

[From the Daily Missoulian of August 9, 1950]

HARRY J. KELLY

No other man is more responsible for the great project of the Hungry Horse Dam than Harry J. Kelly, veteran Montana newspaperman, who has just reached the end of his life. Mr. Kelly, once sure in his own mind of the value of the enterprise, devoted much space in his Flathead Monitor, published at Kalispell, to propaganda for it, until he was known as Hungry Horse Kelly. He was indefatigable in this promotion for almost a quarter century, retiring from his newspaper a few years ago with the satisfaction of knowing that the project was assured.

Harry Kelly was of the best type of printer-publisher, an expert at his craft and a wise man in the editorial part of the newspaper business. He left the marks of his ability and enterprise in several Montana cities and, since 1888, had a share in the progress of the State. He was one of the best of the old-timers.

Internal Security Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Security Legislation," published in the Albuquerque (N. Mex.) Journal on August 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECURITY LEGISLATION

President Truman in a special message to Congress asks emergency legislation to protect the Nation from Communist spies, saboteurs, and fifth columnists.

But it will perplex many Americans as to why the Chief Executive at the same time denounces pending legislation known as the Mundt-Nixon anti-Communist bill which would require all Communists and members of the Communist-front organizations to register.

The President brands the Mundt-Nixon bill as repugnant to our traditions and so vague in its terms as to endanger the freedoms of speech, press, and assembly as protected by the first amendment.

The President says he is in the main interested in a law that will tighten present laws covering espionage and registration of foreign agents, added protection for defense installations, broad authority to the President to establish security regulations for military bases, and other Defense Establishments.

One wonders why the President urges compulsory registration of spies and subversives, yet frowns upon a blanket law covering all members of the Communist Party.

If the Communists in this country, in the main, are not spies and subversives, then why are we so concerned about them?

FBI Chief Edgar Hoover only this week labeled the Communist Party in this country as a Trojan horse of disloyalty, coiled like a serpent in the very heart of America.

Hoover further declared that the Communist infiltration of United States heavy industry is the greatest potential sabotage danger facing America.

The President's request for spy and sabotage legislation is timely but it is doubtful whether he goes far enough in covering the Communist menace.

We wish the boys now fighting in Korea could voice their opinion on this vital subject.

Tax Status of Cooperatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, under special order on July 31, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] addressed the House on the question of taxing the untaxed. In the course of that address he undertook to establish, in addition to several other things, that the cooperatives in the United States were escaping taxes in large amounts, and that this tax advantage somehow brands them as unpatriotic, if not un-American institutions. I think the RECORD should be set straight.

The gentleman includes in his remarks a report of the amounts of taxes which the Government is failing to collect because of certain tax exemptions. The figures which he refers to, as the result of careful research by Homer E. Marsh, of the National Associated Businessmen of Washington, D. C., and by Lovell Parker, former Chief of Staff for the Joint Committee on Taxation indicate that these so-called tax-exempts hold 29 percent of our total national resources. I think it important that we examine this list to determine which are cooperatives, and also in that examination to remember that the National Associated Businessmen's organization, together with the National Tax Equality Association, spend approximately a half million dollars a year in attacking the cooperatives. These figures are in the lobby files of the Clerk of the House.

These are Mr. Marsh's figures:

Life insurance companies (most all are mutuals and pay some income tax)	$50,000,000,000
Foundations	2,500,000,000
Mutual savings banks	20,000,000,000
Building savings and loan associations	12,000,000,000
Government pension trust funds	35,000,000,000
Educational institutions	2,500,000,000
Federal Government corporations	23,000,000,000
Cooperatives	2,500,000,000
Mutual fire and casualty insurance	2,000,000,000
State and local retirement funds	2,500,000,000
Municipal and REA utilities	2,000,000,000
Postal savings	3,500,000,000
Total	157,500,000,000

Actually in this table the cooperatives make up less than 2 percent of the resources my colleague refers to as tax-exempts. Yet he devotes almost his entire attention to the 2 percent and neglects the other 98 percent.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue reports that only half of the rural co-ops took advantage of the minor tax exemption provided in section 101 (12) of the Internal Revenue Code, because of the strict compliance provisions. The rest paid taxes just like other businesses. Yet, my colleague would have you believe that co-ops are tax-exempt. As I have indicated, co-ops are not tax-exempt. In his discourse he implied that co-ops, among all the others listed, are unpatriotic. Profits of cooperatives, after regular business taxes are paid, are returned to the members, who pay income taxes upon them, under the personal-income-tax laws of the country. Propaganda spread by the enemies of cooperatives has left a false impression. Members of cooperatives are certainly not unpatriotic, nor are cooperatives un-American. The State of Minnesota has long been famous for its cooperatives. We count the members of cooperatives as among our finest citizens.

The slogan, Tax the untaxed, has been developed principally as an instrument to be used against the cooperatives. Let me set the record straight by giving you the facts on the tax status of cooperatives.

Jerry Voorhis, a former distinguished member of this body who served five terms, is now executive secretary of the Cooperative League of the United States of America. In testifying before the House Finance Committee on the tax bill some months ago, he pointed out that—

The alleged tax advantages which co-ops are supposed to enjoy today vanish into thin air upon any fair examination of the facts. The truth is that, with one exception adopted long ago by a conservative Congress as an aid to agriculture, co-ops today are subject to tax under the same laws and the same regulations as any other business. The further truth is that even the bitterest opponents of cooperatives have declared that the one exception, namely, section 101 (12), makes no real difference and that its repeal would add hardly a drop of revenue to the Treasury.

Cooperatives in America can no more make for themselves taxable income without paying full tax on it than can any other business. If cooperative members receive any funds as a result of dealings with their cooperative which would constitute taxable income to anyone dealing with any type of business, then the co-op member is subject to tax thereon right now. We would not have it otherwise.

All the fuss and furor about cooperatives and taxes results from a basic misinterpretation of the facts. The central position of the cooperative is this. If one business, a cooperative, deliberately binds itself to forego the making of profit in order to benefit its patrons, it should no more be subject to income tax on income it doesn't receive than a profit business is subject to tax on profits it fails to make.

With our contention that cooperatives have today no tax advantage, a long series of Congresses and an unbroken succession of court decisions have agreed. The House committee, in preparing the bill before you and the House in passing it, has confirmed once again this basic truth.

If any institutions in our country are typically American, cooperatives are so. True cooperatives cannot exist in a totalitarian country at all. Their very chance for existence depends on the maintenance of free institutions, political and economic. The essence of cooperation is free voluntary association of free people.

On the other hand, the very essence of a true democracy is participation by the people, by all the people, in every phase of its life. This means not only political participation but social and religious and economic and every other kind of participation. The very basis and essence of economic participation is a share in ownership. The very basis and essence of economic participation is a share in ownership. For a share in ownership carries with it a share of responsibility for what we own. And with that kind of responsibility, and probably only so, there develops a readiness to take the still more basic responsibility for meeting one's own problems and those of one's neighbors by one's own efforts. If America means anything it means a country that encourages that sort of thing—that wise participation by the people in ownership and responsibility.

Well, that is precisely why we have cooperatives. It's what they exist to do. The whole net effect of the organization and operation of a cooperative is to spread ownership and with it responsibility for their own economic welfare widely among millions of people who would otherwise not be participants in free enterprise to any significant extent at all. I therefore simply ask the question as to whether cooperatives should be confronted with an organized, highly financed campaign of misrepresentation against them or whether they do not deserve the full moral support of every thoughtful person who sincerely cares about the future of democracy in America.

We come before this great committee—

in no spirit of supplication or appeal for a single special consideration. We come here with our heads high and our hearts thankful to point out that participation by the people in every phase of its life is the very genius of a vital democracy and to point out further that it is to promote such participation that cooperatives basically and primarily exist. We are in business for one primary reason—to spread private ownership and with it responsibility among the people more broadly than can be done in any other way and thus to shift back to the people again responsibility for their own welfare. Since we know this is what you too desire in our country, we confidently solicit your continued interest in and moral support of cooperatives in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize what Mr. Voorhis said about cooperatives being democratic. Here is a movement that is rebuilding democracy as we have knowr it in the past. Here is the very essence of democracy, not only in politics, but in every other phase of fruitful living—economic, religious, and social. Cooperatives have no tax exemption as cooperatives. Certain co-ops have an available exemption given to them as farmer organizations to encourage agricultural production. If we face that issue and face it squarely, we may find out that that assistance given to them as farmers is not enough. I hope we, as lawmakers, never yield to the force of this campaign of misrepresentation being conducted by the highly financed group of self-seeking interests whose objective is to destroy the cooperatives so that they will have no competitive force to check them in their drive for unlimited profits. There, gentlemen, is the issue in this case.

Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it is to me a matter of pride that an agency so vitally concerned with our financial welfare and so important to the confidence and safety of 104,000,000 depositors in this great Nation should be so efficiently managed as the record indicates is the case with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

It is now more than 6 years since any insured bank failed or since the depositors of any insured bank sufferced a penny's loss. Bank difficulties continue to happen and they will probably never be eliminated, but we have arrived finally at the goal of every supporter of the independent dual-banking system and the satisfaction of every depositor in an insured bank. Banks may continue to get into difficulty, but depositors will suffer no loss. That is what makes the situation different from the years before FDIC.

During the sixteen-plus years of its operation, only 413 insured banks have required FDIC financial aid. That is fewer than the number that failed during any one of the years from 1923 through 1933.

The record of the FDIC has been the subject of much editorial praise from the Nations's newspapers. The Ironton (Mo.) Register and several other papers editorially had these things to say about the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation:

[From the Ironton (Mo.) Register of April 13, 1950]

Banker praises New Deal. Did you ever think you would live to see the day? The following is an excerpt of a letter from Chairman John S. Wood, of the board of the Manchester Bank of St. Louis, written to Representative MELVIN PRICE (Democrat, Illinois): "I was chief national bank examiner at St. Louis from 1920 to 1930. During 1930 I became chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank at St. Louis and in that capacity directed the operations of the examining department of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis. From 1921 to 1933 I saw a number of commercial banks in the United States decrease from approximately 30,600 unit banks to fewer than 14,000 banks. The public lost confidence both in banks and bankers. The FIDC (Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, a New Deal agency established in 1934) restored public confidence both in banks and bankers. It is gambling with fate to, in any degree, diminish the fund that enables the FDIC to promptly take care of the depositors of any insured bank that may get into an unsafe condition."

[From the Fresno (Calif.) Bee of May 15, 7, 1950]

WHY THEY WEREN'T SCARED

The Westphalia State Bank at Westphalia, Mich., must have been an unusual financial institution. It has had trouble. Its assets have been taken by another bank, and it will hereafter operate as a branch. This bank's troubles seem to have been brought out in the open when Government investigators disclosed irregularities reaching about $300,000. Nobody was accused, or has been accused of taking anything, but it must have been a rather friendly institution. If a depositor knew the bank well enough, he could overdraw almost at will, and he did. Thus, when investigators began their work, they simply found the bank's money tied up in overwithdrawals. Townspeople were resentful when the Government's inquiry disclosed this condition, and maintained full trust in the bank. They were even resentful when the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation offered to throw in a million dollars to save the institution, if this became necessary. Everybody in Westphalia seems to have overdrawn, but nobody was scared.

And why were they not running up and down Main Street, wringing their hands, and why were they not afraid? They knew their deposits were safe, because of the guarantee of bank deposits. And the bank deposit guarantee was one of the pieces of legislation put on the books during the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

[From the Fresno (Calif.) Bee of May 15, 1950]

BANK DEPOSIT INSURANCE HAS PROVED ITS WORTH

Individual bank accounts up to $5,000 have been insured by the Government against loss since 1933 when an amendment to the National Banking Act established the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

It was one of the first of the important New Deal reforms.

Recently the Senate approved a bill to raise the maximum individual insurance from $5,000 to $10,000; and the House Banking and Currency Committee shortly is expected also to recommend favorable action on the measure.

There is a reason.

When the insurance system was set up in 1933, the $5,000 provision covered 98½ percent of all deposits then in commercial banks.

But such is no longer the case. Because of the greater amount of money in circulation and the increase in incomes during the war and postwar years, only 45 percent of deposits now are insured.

So present coverage fails to achieve the basic objective of the law—full protection for the individual depositor.

It is a tribute to the manner in which FDIC has been operated that it has built up a fund more than adequate to support the higher level of coverage.

In its 16 years of operation, FDIC has accumulated from assessment receipts and other earnings a surplus of $1,100,000,000. In the system are 13,440 commercial banking institutions.

The FDIC has been compelled to go to the aid of only 407 banks. Most of these were merged with stronger institutions through assistance from the FDIC. Actual losses to depositors have been less than $2,000,000.

What a contrast to the 1930–38 period, when 3,643 banks failed and total losses to depositors amounted to more than $1,000,000,000.

FDIC is one reform that even the most hardshell conservative knows is here to stay because of its manifest benefits.

[From the Salt Lake City (Utah) Telegram of May 15, 1950]

A GOVERNMENT AGENCY THAT ACTUALLY MAKES MORE MONEY THAN IT SPENDS

One of the most successful of the innovations of the Roosevelt administration was the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, established 15 years ago to safeguard depositors in commercial banks against loss. The FDIC has not cost the taxpayers a penny. Through the payment of one-twelfth of 1 percent of total deposits by the banks, the corporation has had enough money not only to pay off all losses resulting from bank failures or financial troubles, but it has paid back the capital contribution made initially by the United States Treasury and the Federal Reserve banks and it has a $1,100,000,000 reserve.

It is true there has been no major economic crisis during the existence of the FDIC to test its ability to withstand real financial trouble in the Nations' banking system. But the fund is believed adequate now to meet any crisis, no matter how severe. The reserve is approximately equal to the total of reported losses of all depositors in the 1930-33 debacle. Of course, deposits have increased since then, and losses today could be proportionately greater, but on the other hand the very existence of the deposit-insurance program should avert the panic which helped to make for heavy losses.

It is astonishing what an excellent record the FDIC has had through the years. There have been 407 banks which have required FDIC assistance of one kind or another since the Corporation was established. In settling their affairs the FDIC has paid off all insured depositors and taken a total loss in the process of only $25,000,000.

Because deposit insurance only is extended to a maximum of $5,000, some larger depositors did suffer losses in these bank failures. Those losses amounted to about $2,000,000. There is now a proposal before Congress to increase the $5,000 maximum for insurance coverage to $10,000. A bill to make that change has been passed by the Senate and is now being studied by the House Banking and Currency Committee. The increased coverage could, it is said, be easily extended without placing any very great added burden on the FDIC.

In view of the change in the value of the dollar since 1934, and the sound condition of the deposit insurance program, it seems only right that the maximum be increased.

At the same time there might be a reduction in the assessment levied against participating banks. The Corporation has a reserve which should be enough to guarantee it against any financial crisis short of a catastrophe which would destroy the Government itself along with any such governmental agency as the FDIC. It actually gets enough from earnings on this reserve and miscellaneous sources of revenue to pay its way without any further assessments at all on the banks of the Nation.

It is in any event a cheering thing to have one agency of Government give such a demonstration of efficient operation that it actually makes more money than it spends.

[From the Mamaroneck (N. Y.) Times of May 11, 1950]

RAISING THE INSURANCE

It was back in 1933 that Uncle Sam, to restore public confidence and protect against banking failures, initiated Federal insurance of bank deposits. The new law provided for insurance to depositors against loss for deposits up to $5,000. Observers say that the proportion of depositors fully insured is now about 96 percent.

But inflation, rising prices, increasing wages, have set new standards in money. The average size of deposits has increased, and at present only about 45 percent, or $62,000,000,000, of the total dollar amount of bank deposits is insured.

Accordingly Uncle Sam now proposes to take another step in this direction. The Senate passed the new law in March and the House is expected to hold hearings. The new law will raise the amount of insured deposits to $10,000.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in its 15 years of existence has now accumulated from its assessments upon banks and from other earnings $1,100,000,000, which approximates the total reported losses of all depositors in the crisis of the early thirties when banks were bursting like popcorn all over the Nation. Also the 13,440 insured commercial banks are paying in assessments at the rate of about $120,000,000 a year. Such assessments are one-twelfth of 1 percent of total deposits.

Apparently the FDIC fund is in a sufficiently healthy condition to justify the new step. Bank suspensions have fortunately been rare and bank-deposit losses insignificant in the 15-year period. During this time, as a matter of fact, the FDIC has lost only $26,000,000 and actual losses to depositors have been less than $2,000,000.

The new law should create even greater public confidence and security.

[From the Ogden (Utah) Standard-Examiner of April 27, 1950]

TOWN BANK IN TROUBLE, BUT CITIZENS CALM, PROTECTED

Although a State bank was in trouble in Bruneau, Idaho, because of shortages and there was a rash of rumors and other excitement, no depositor will lose any money and the bank will continue to operate for the benefit of the community.

Thanks to the operations of the Federal deposit insurance law, depositors were calmed as soon as they were reminded that their savings were guaranteed by the United States Government.

We should be accustomed to these quiet reactions that follow news that a bank is in trouble, because the deposit insurance program has been in operation for a long time, but some of the older citizens, remembering unhappy panics in the past, still blink their eyes a few times in pleased amazement as they murmur, "It was not like that in the supposed good old days."

The Liberty Bell—A Symbol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, my friend, Harold Dempster Cullen, editor of the Bertie Ledger-Advance, Windsor, N. C., recently had an editorial in his paper that strikes a keynote for all Americans. Under leave to extend my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to include this timely editorial:

THE LIBERTY BELL—A SYMBOL

The visit of the replica of the Liberty Bell to North Carolina towns has brought again to our attention the fact that the freedom and prosperity we enjoy should go to the credit of our founding fathers—those men of democratic beliefs and the daring to put them into effect in the face of opposition that seemed insuperable. It is well for us to think sometimes of the problems those men had to face. The world was against them. The greatest and strongest nation in the world at that time was to be faced in warfare, if they made the decision that their consciences endorsed. Their own welfare and prosperity would undoubtedly be the price to be paid if they went through with their intention of declaring their freedom from foreign rule.

But they had the courage and the daring to lead their people into the field of freedom. They fully recognized the risks they ran. They knew that their own lives would be forfeit if their struggle should fail. But they unflinchingly proclaimed to the world their determination to become free people, along lines that had never been tried in the world before—with the people themselves as the final arbiters of their own welfare.

The peal of the Liberty Bell announced to the world that the struggle for freedom would be undertaken.

Their challenge was accepted. The mother country made its best effort to subdue these recalcitrant children. But through 8 years of struggle and sacrifice and death they clung firmly to their beliefs—and finally emerged victorious.

Today in America we face a similar challenge, but on a far larger scale. The freedom of the entire world is at stake. The leaders of the world face the challenge that the Continental Congress faced in 1776. The lines are being drawn from day to day.

Have we the courage to march into a struggle that might mean slavery instead of freedom? Have our leaders and our people the fortitude of the founding fathers and their followers? It is altogether possible that the present struggle may be confined to Korea, but we cannot tell.

Are we in America willing to make the sacrifices and undergo the suffering necessary, either by war or by peaceful means, to assure the world of freedom, as these United States were assured of freedom 174 years ago? The challenge faces us, with our 150,000,000 people and with the 2,000,000,000 people of the world, no less than it did the 3,000,000 people that lived along the Atlantic coast of this country in 1776.

The Potato Dump

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEAN P. TAYLOR

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is time to call a halt. In these perilous times, when the Congress is exploring every potential source of revenue and is calling upon individuals and corporations to ante up more and more taxes in order that this country may meet the demand for greater and greater expenditures, we learn of the travesty which permits the harvesting of a bountiful crop of potatoes and the leaving of them in the fields to spoil. The finest crop of potatoes ever grown in New Jersey will never reach hungry mouths, simply because the potato farmers, on instructions from the Government, have already dug and spoiled 40 percent of the crop.

Not so long ago an ad appeared in a newspaper in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., which advertised a bid for potatoes for the armed services of the United States. Only a few days ago, Secretary of Agriculture Brannan appeared before the House Committee on Agriculture and requested $50,000,000 to be used to pay transportation costs of a half billion dollars' worth of foodstuffs which were in danger of spoiling. What justification, other than planned economy, is there for this ruthless destruction of needed food? Our armed services could use everything in surplus and thereby obliterate great expenditures of dollars.

If the planners of our economy continue to pay for foodstuffs that are only raised and destroyed, we will not only bring ourselves closer and closer to bankruptcy, but we will at the same time thwart nature. If it comes to pass that nature concludes we no longer welcome her bounty, nothing on earth will ever save us.

There was a time when the Government paid for pigs and corn that were never raised, but even that crazy philosophy was better than the philosophy adopted by the Department of Agriculture in the present instance where manpower, seed, gasoline, and equipment were used to raise potatoes that were dug and sacked and then permitted to spoil.

I beseech all Members of Congress to take cognizance of this situation and join with me in insisting that this practice be immediately suspended.

Views of Mr. D. D. Wright, Guin, Ala., With Reference to Our Relations With Russia, and So Forth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, as per the request of Mr. D. D. Wright, a citizen of Guin, Marion County, Ala., that I make available to the Senate and the House his views with reference to the United Nations, Russian aggression in Korea, and atomic warfare, I am including his letter to me dated August 5, 1950, and his letter of the same date addressed to the Senate and House at Washington, D. C.:

GUIN, ALA., August 5, 1950.

HON. CARL ELLIOTT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter received and contents noted. Will say that if it is not asking too much of you, read the enclosed letter to House and Senate.

Your friend,

D. D. WRIGHT.

P. S.—Bomb Russia. They outnumber us in tanks, planes, submarines, etc.

GUIN, ALA., August 5, 1950.

To the SENATE AND HOUSE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: I have kept close after the United Nations organization since its beginning. Also, I have tried to keep up with Russia's vetoing and objections to everything practically that all the other nations favored. You have tried with all means to get them to work with you on the right terms for the last 5 years, but it seems the impossible. Now, you can't deal with a gang of atheists and bandits for any right cause. As possibly you noticed the Gallup poll that was taken over this Nation this week. A large majority of the people want the A-bomb used. Russia started this Korean war, as you know. They have no A-bombs to amount to anything. If they had, they would be the last country in the world to want it outlawed. You are calling our boys from 18 and up to service, to go over there and be slaughtered by that gang of bandits.

It will cost this Nation billions and multiplied thousands of our boys who have never got anything out of life. Russia has millions of men that they can keep sending as recruits to the North Korean Army and to other countries that they will strike later. They are working as slave labor, possibly a million men trying to build up a stockpile of A-bombs, planes, tanks, and other war equipment. If they win or don't win in this struggle, Russia will back up another start in some other country over there. They want to get all of our manpower possible, planes, tanks, and war equipment over there, and 2 years from now they will have their stockpile of bombs and will blow the face of the earth in America. They would have done been here if they had had any bombs.

I think you Representatives of this Government should listen to what a large majority said about the A-bomb. As you noticed the poll taken, a large majority said drop the A-bomb. The two bombs dropped in Japan or nearby brought that war to a close. Now I think that our commanders should give the American Army and the South Korean Army a night secret fall, backed with all equipment, and by dawn have three of the greatest concentrated places in that North Korean Army and drop three A-bombs, 20 to 30 miles apart, and hit Moscow at the same time with two A-bombs, and your war is ended. There is no use to spend billions of dollars and lose multiplied thousands of lives thinking that they might quit.

Yours truly,

D. D. WRIGHT.

Crusade Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE L. HAYS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks,

I include extracts from a letter written by Jan J. Erteszek, a naturalized American who was born in Poland and received the degree of doctor of laws at the University of Cracow. This article was published as an editorial in the August 18 issue of the United States News and World Report, and David Lawrence, editor, says that Mr. Erteszek's descent and background give him an understanding of the Slavic mind. This, together with his Americanism, enables him to make a convincing presentation of the faith needed to combat world communism.

Mr. Speaker, I have been saying almost exactly this same thing, perhaps in different words, ever since my return from the iron-curtain countries last fall. I believe that this article sums up and points up that the crusade against communism in which we are engaged is basically the old battle of God versus the Devil. I think it is worthy of the time of everyone to read this article:

The main difference between communism and our philosophy of life is of a spiritual character and revolves around beliefs pertaining to the nature and destiny of human beings. Thus, it is in the realm of faith that our conflict must be fought out.

We might defeat the Russians by force of arms alone but never will we defeat communism by force of arms alone. If we lose the spiritual battle, we will have gained nothing except chaos and spiritual vacuum.

The main precept of our philosophy of life is not democracy, but our faith in God—consequently also our belief in sovereignty of the soul and dignity of human beings. As believers we follow, obey, and seek God. Our founding fathers have thought democracy to be the best system of Government to fulfill the spiritual objectives and aims for which they have come to America.

Communists, on the contrary, live without and against God. Our lives are determined by morality—theirs by expediency; ours by belief in the higher destiny of the human being—theirs by contempt of his limitations; ours by hope and faith—theirs by material gain and human greed; ours by brotherly love—theirs by class hatred; ours by trust—theirs by cunning.

Democracy is a system of government—the best that has been known to civilized people, but it is not the common denominator of all righteous peoples of the world.

Only to the American has the word "democracy" an emotional appeal. For better or for worse, it is absolutely meaningless to the great mass of little people in the rest of the world. If they are sufficiently educated, and most of them are not, it will be at best for them an intellectual or political term. I can assure you, however, that the Polish peasant the Russian worker, the South American peon, or the Hindu untouchable does not emotionally react to the term "democracy."

No system or way of life has survived once it was satisfied to limit its efforts to its own preservation. We must not be content just in preservation of our way of life alone. We must have an ideal which in free interplay of social and spiritual forces will find its prophets, its zealots, its missionaries, and its converts.

Our great moral cause must be an expansive, positive, universal ideal. On behalf of this ideal, we must be ready to crusade among all the peoples of the world, to rally universally the masses to our standards and lead them to a better and nobler tomorrow.

God only, and our trust in Him, is the great moral cause in which we differ from the Communist. God, and trust in Him, is the common denominator between us and all peoples of the world.

One cannot serve God and communism at the same time. When one chooses to serve communism he has made a decision to sell his soul, either for material gain or other advantage. He has decided to trade his freedom for whatever gain he has been promised individually or for a group. The Communist chooses to become a spiritual, and in due course, a physical slave. Once he becomes a slave he is at the mercy of his masters who do not deem it necessary to keep their promises to their slaves. Thus, he serves the cause of evil.

It is God against devil, as basic and simple as that. There is no choice in between. All the people, humble and mighty, educated and simple, know where God is, and where evil is. One does not need for this intellectual speculation. There is a divine spark in every human being no matter on which side of the fence he is, and it can be kindled into a great fire against evil and for justice under God, for peace, brotherly love, freedom, and equality, for a nobler and better tomorrow.

If we truly believe in godly justice, we must find a solution for human ills, for privation, for race and class hatred. In the economic field, we must support a thorough land reform in all agricultural countries. We cannot close our eyes to the plight of millions of land-poor and landless peasants. We must provide them with tools to pursue their endeavors. For the rest of the people we must give assurance of the right to work at a decent wage. Land reform and the privilege to work for a decent wage will not destroy the capitalistic system of economy but, on the contrary, will remove its greatest weakness—the fear and frustrations of the contemporary man. It is the frustrated and fearful men who are the Communist's prey.

The Red horde is on the move, the time is running out fast. If we do not win this spiritual conflict, nothing will matter. Let's take the banner and lead the fight.

San Angelo (Tex.) Chamber of Commerce Makes Clear, Concise, Unanswerable Statement Showing Error of Supreme Court in Texas Tidelands Case

OF
HON. O. C. FISHER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by the San Angelo (Tex.) Chamber of Commerce regarding the recent Supreme Court decision in the Texas tidelands case. The statement is one of the clearest and most forceful I have seen on the subject, and I submit it for the RECORD:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

On June 5, 1950, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a 4 to 3 decision which attempted to give title to the Federal Government of the tidelands off the shore of Texas. In 1845 the United States Government entered into a written contract with the people of Texas which specifically provided that these lands would remain the property of Texas after the Republic of Texas became a State. This decision of the Supreme Court, if allowed to stand and become effective would be a clear-cut breach of this contract. Today, more than ever before, the United States is looked upon over the entire world as the example of a democratic country which keeps its obligations and treaties faithfully and to the letter. The United States of America should not allow the world to witness it breaking a contract, which its representatives made in good faith, and has stood for over 100 years. In writing its decision, the Supreme Court refused to allow the attorney general of Texas to present and develop the multitude of evidence it had regarding this case. In making its decision the Supreme Court completely ignored the historical facts which are relative to this case. The entire citizenship of Texas is greatly disturbed and insulted by this action. The documented facts of history stand, regardless of the varied political interpretations which come and go with the generations of time. We, the people of Texas, ask you to look at the facts:

1. After winning its independence from Mexico on the battlefield of San Jacinto in 1836, the First Congress of the Republic of Texas fixed its limits by a boundary act of December 19, 1836, as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Sabine River, and running west along the Gulf of Mexico 3 leagues from land, to the mouth of the Rio Grande * * *." Thereafter, in 1837, President Andrew Jackson advised the Congress of the United States as follows:

"The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence."

2. On April 12, 1844, after formal negotiations, a treaty was signed between Texas and the United States, providing for the annexation of Texas. In this treaty Texas was to give up its public land and public property. The United States was to assume the public debt of Texas and was to annex Texas as a territory. On April 32 1844, President Tyler sent this treaty to the Senate of the United States, which on June 8 voted and defeated the treaty by a vote of 36 to 16. One of the main reasons stated on the floor of the Senate for the defeat of this treaty was the allegation that Texas' lands were "worthless" and would never amount to enough to pay the indebtedness of that Republic. One Senator said: "Let Texas keep her lands and pay her own debts."

3. Accordingly, the same Congress submitted a counterproposal to the Republic of Texas for annexation. From December 10, 1844, until February 14, 1845, 17 drafts of a counterproposal came before the United States Congress. Some of these had provisions which would have required Texas "to cede its minerals, mines, salt lakes, and springs," and to give up its land and mineral rights. None of these proposals passed. Finally Representative Milton Brown, of Tennessee, who had previously introduced a resolution stipulating that Texas cede her minerals, offered again the general proposals of his original resolution, but omitted the ceding of mineral clauses, which his earlier resolution had contained and which had just been defeated in the rejection of an amendment of Representative Burke, of New Hampshire, which stipulated that Texas cede its minerals and mines. Brown's revised resolution was adopted by a vote of 120 to 98. Thus the claim of the United States to the minerals of Texas was considered and rejected by the House of Representatives in its formation of the resolution which was submitted to and accepted by the Republic of Texas as the basis of its admission to the Union.

This House resolution that finally passed contained two paragraphs; the first proposed that Texas should be admitted to the Union as a State, with a republican form of government adopted by the people of Texas and approved by the Congress of the United States. The second paragraph specified the details of the annexation; namely that the constitution of the new State must be submitted to Congress before January 1, 1846, and that new States, not exceeding four in number in addition to the State of Texas might be formed out of Texas. The most important of these specific provisions was that Texas was to retain its public debt and was to retain title to all of the vacant land and unappropriated lands lying within the limits of the Republic of Texas. Nothing was in these first two parsgraphs about "equal footing" with other States.

The United States Senate amended this resolution and added a third paragraph which gave the President of the United States the option at his own judgment and discretion to negotiate the annexation of Texas by treaty which would admit Texas into the Union "on an equal footing with the existing States," instead of submitting to the Republic of Texas the proposals of the first and second paragraphs as prepared by the House.

President Tyler chose not to exercise this option to negotiate by treaty, and instead submitted the provisions of only the first 2 paragraphs of the joint resolution. President Anson Jones of Texas submitted this to the Texas Congress, which unanimously approved it, and then called a convention of the people of Texas to prepare a State constitution and to ratify the acceptance by the Texas Congress. This convention passed an ordinance of acceptance which states, "—We, the deputies of the people of Texas, do ordain and declare that we assent to and accept the proposals, conditions, and guaranties contained in the first and second sections of the resolution of the Congress of the United States." On December 29, 1845, James K. Polk, President of the United States, signed a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, which referred to the offer by the United States and the acceptance of Texas of the provisions of the first and second paragraphs of the initial joint resolution of March 1, 1845, which made the offer, and declared that effective upon December 29, 1845, and upon those terms, Texas was a State in the Union. Thus, although the President of the United States was authorized by the third paragraph of the resolution, at his own discretion, to offer Texas an opportunity to come into the Union on "equal footing" by treaty, he instead submitted the alternate proposal which outlined specific provisions allowing Texas to retain her lands. The proposal actually submitted to and accepted and ratified by Texas contained no mention of the "equal footing" idea. One of the specific proposals, conditions, and guaranties offered by the United States in good faith and accepted faithfully by the people of Texas was that Texas was to retain the public domain which had belonged to it while it was an independent nation. These lands consisted of an estimated 237,906,000 acres of public lands which extended to 3 leagues off shore. The new State of Texas retained the General Land Office, which had been established by the Republic to administer the ownership of these lands. And for over 100 years Texas has had possession of these lands and has administered them accordingly, and its ownership has been recognized by all parties, including the United States Government.

These are the facts of history. It is not the romantic imagination of Texas, nor is it a wishful dream of ours. It is true, pure, and clean factual history. To violate this written contract made in good faith by both parties and kept by both for over 100 years is to cast a dark shadow of dishonor upon the whole of American life, public and private, which rests upon the integrity, the faithful observance of agreements.

Four members of the Supreme Court of the United States, less than a majority of the full nine-member Court, have ignored the provisions of the annexation contract by which Texas retained these lands and minerals. In justification therefore, these four members have cited and relied upon the alternative "equal footing" provision which was never submitted by the President of the United States to Texas and was never considered, accepted, or agreed upon by the Republic of Texas. It was contained in none of the proposals to or negotiations with Texas except the above-mentioned alternative and rejected third paragraph. The result is that an alternative proposal which was rejected both by the United States and Texas has been allowed by the Supreme Court to control over the proposal specifically submitted by the President of the United States and accepted by the Congress and people of Texas, and which provided that they retain all lands "lying within its limits."

THE RULING OF THE SUPREME COURT SHOULD NOT BE ALLOWED TO STAND

As Chief Justice John Marshall said, suits involving constitutional issues and treaties should not be decided by less than a majority of the full Court. In no event should four members of the Court, over the protest of three dissenters, be allowed to break a provision of the solemn contract between the United States and the Republic of Texas and take away from the State 2,680,000 acres of land which has been in its possession for over 100 years. If the Court persists, then Congress should remedy the injustice.

Since it was a joint resolution of Congress which established the provisions of Texas' affiliations with the United States, we, the people of Texas, appeal to you whose high privilege it is to make the policies of this Nation, to uphold the dignity of our great country by enforcing the agreements made by your predecessors over 105 years ago. Today, the United States is the leader of nations in the fight to uphold the high moral principles of honor, and good faith in government. Now, while its representatives are negotiating treaties and agreements with nations all over the earth, is no time for the Government of the United States to exhibit to the world that it will stoop to the depth of regarding a written document made in good faith by two nations as a "scrap of paper." The people of Texas cannot accept such a conduct of Government. We respectfully urge that the Eighty-first Congress by a joint resolution uphold the honor and dignity of the Twenty-ninth Congress and support the provisions of its annexation agreement with Texas, and declare that all right, title, and interest in the public domain of Texas, including its tidelands, 3 leagues into the sea, remains and is vested in the State of Texas.

Passed by the board of directors of the San Angelo (Tex.) Chamber of Commerce this 10th day of August 1950.

H. C. CHARLESS,
President.

The Poorest Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Evening World-Herald of Omaha, Nebr., on August 9, 1950, carried an editorial on Government controls. The editorial is especially timely since this issue is now before the Senate. I ask unanimous consent for its insertion in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POOREST POLITICS

Of all methods yet proposed for handling the economic problems arising from the Korean War, the Senate Banking Committee this week voted for the worst.

It gave unanimous approval to what is called the home-front mobilization bill.

For all practical purposes, this is the bill which President Truman asked for. Among other things, it authorizes him, whenever he may consider that the time is ripe, to take any or all of the following steps:

1. Set up wage and price controls.
2. Provide a system of rationing.
3. Establish machinery for settling labor disputes.
4. Devise a system of allocations and priorities for handling critical materials.

Obviously this plan would give the President the authority of a dictator over the American economy. For the duration of the emergency (which is anybody's guess) one man would carry vast and arbitarary powers under his hat.

Why is such a step necessary? Why should Congress delegate instead of legislate?

We don't know. Congress isn't going any place. If the world crisis grows increasingly severe, it will be in session or on quick call from now on. It will be in position to pass any important bill within the scope of 2 or 3 days—which certainly is fast enough for a bill dealing with economic matters.

Politically, of course, the bill as now phrased has considerable appeal—especially to Congressmen who are running for reelection. No matter what might happen or fail to happen, they would be able to say: That's the President's fault. We gave him the authority he asked for, and look what he's done with it.

Mr. Truman himself appears to have no qualms. He seems convinced that he will be able to handle the powers conferred on him in this bill to the satisfaction of the pressure groups which have supported him in the past.

And he may be right. Which is another reason why Congres should reflect long and earnestly before it delegates those powers to him.

In one other important respect the Congress, thus far, has completely abdicated its responsibility.

When the Korean war broke out some 6 weeks ago, the national budget already was about $5,000,000,000 out of balance. Since that time President Truman has asked for extra appropriations of $16,500,000,000, and Senator BYRD, of Virginia, predicts that huge new requests are in the works.

So despite the higher tax rates (which so far are only talk) and higher tax collections (as a result of war activity) a huge deficit is in prospect for the coming year. It may run anywhere from $10,000,000,000 up, depending on the size of the extra military appropriations yet to come.

In the face of a deficit of that size, no power on earth could prevent inflation. Only the tightest controls could temporarily, maybe, restrain the effects of inflation.

Yet hardly anybody in Congress pays much heed.

A week ago Senator BYRD offered a plan for cutting $10,000,000,000 out of nonmilitary spending. That plus an adequate tax increase would have put the rearmament program on a pay-as-you-go basis. It was the only realistic anti-inflation measure yet proposed. But it fell with a dull thud.

Nobody can see ahead to the end of this cold-hot war. But of this much the American people can be certain:

It will be a tough war against resolute opponents, and if it is to be won by our side it will be won by responsible men who, at home or at the front, are not afraid to do what the times demand.

Too many Members of Congress thus far have not acted the part of responsible men. On issues of the greatest importance they have hedged and evaded and, for the sake of political security, sought to delegate their constitutional responsibility.

If they do not mend their ways they may discover that today, when America's sons again are headed for the wars, politics-as-usual is the poorest politics of all.

Wiley Blasts Wisconsin People's Progressive Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we of Wisconsin are disgusted that there has crawled out of the woodwork in some few parts of our State some intellectual vermin who parade under the title of People's Progressive Party. These "characters" slavishly back the policy of the Soviet Union in its aggressive war on the South Korean people through the North Korean satellite troops.

I note that the candidate for Governor in Wisconsin of this misnamed People's Progressive Party announced his backing of the statement of the national committee of that party against America's fight in Korea and against Mr. Henry Wallace's recanting of his former position.

The best way by which the people of Wisconsin can meet the challenge of the People's Progressive Party and other Communist-front groups is by:

First. Informing each of our neighbors, friends, and acquaintances of the vicious character of these Commie groups.

Second. Refusing to be provocated into any physical violence or illegal action against these groups.

Third. Refusing to give them undue attention which they thrive on.

The recent incidents in certain Wisconsin's factories at which circulators of peace petitions were manhandled was 100 percent the wrong way of dealing with Commies, fellow travelers, and misguided individuals who have swallowed the Red line.

I have in my hand two articles:

First. One from the Friday, August 11, issue of the Wisconsin CIO News. This is a straight-shooting frank piece entitled "Don't Help the Commies," giving some horse sense advice to CIO members on how to avoid falling into the Red trap.

Second. I have also in my hands a copy of the Communist publication, The People's Daily World, showing the tremendous extent to which the Reds have gone in circulating the misnamed Stockholm Peace Petition in my State.

I believe that this latter article describing the circulation of the Stockholm pledge in Mosinee, Wis., and elsewhere, will serve as a warning to every Wisconsinite, particularly members of minority groups and students for whom the Reds are especially putting out their bait.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this article from the CIO paper and from the People's World be printed in contrast to one another in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wisconsin CIO News of August 11, 1950]

DON'T HELP THE COMMIES

For those who are so inclined, there are a number of ways to help the Communists. You don't have to be a party member and pay dues. You can be of great help to the Communists in many other ways.

For example, you can be active in Communist-front organizations. The CP will appreciate any help it can get in its front activities. You can be a member, and pay dues, or you can just help out now and then.

Or you can support Commie newspapers, or front newspapers or magazines such as the National Guardian or the Daily Worker. It will be appreciated by the Stalin stooges.

But that doesn't end the list of activities a friend of the Commies can engage in. He can sign Commie petitions—such as the phony Stockholm peace petition. That helps the Commies

Or, if you are not sympathetic to the Communists, you can still be of help. You can help them, indirectly, by giving them publicity. The Commies go on the assumption that any publicity is good publicity. And they'll spare no pains to get publicity—even if it means provoking violence against themselves.

On very reliable information it was learned this week that Communists in Wisconsin—the very few of them that are still around were very pleased with all the publicity they got recently as a result of the incidents at Nash. They were so pleased that, according to this information, they are planning to provoke some more incidents in other parts of the community.

So if you don't want to help the Commies get publicity, watch out for their shady tactics. You might be one of the people to receive a peace petition in the mail, asking you to circulate it. You might be one of the people to be approached on the street, in the shop or in a bar to sign a petition, or on some other Communist phony.

If you don't want to help the Commies, then throw that peace petition in the waste basket and forget about it. Because what the Commies want you to do is to get in an uproar about it so you'll holler good and loud, and maybe sock one of their stooges to boot. That's what they want you to do. So if you don't want to help the Commies, don't fall for their tricks.

But if you do give the Commies satisfaction—if you do help them get their name in print, to get more publicity than they've already gotten in the daily newspapers, then don't expect us to sympathize with you when the smoke has cleared.

[From the People's Daily World]

MOSINEE WELCOMES SCROLLS FOR PEACE

MILWAUKEE, July 2.—Mosinee, Wis., population 1,800, is in the news again. This time for peace.

A month ago the name of Mosinee was blazoned from coast to coast as the scene of the hippodrome red coup stunt staged by the local Legion post. Americans recall that the mayor and minister died of a heart attack as a result.

But most residents of Mosinee cannot be tarred by the local Fascists.

Peace crusaders, here Sunday, got a hearty welcome as they went door to door with petitions to ban the A-bomb. A hot Sunday, 90 in the shade, many were out swimming or at ball games, but 100 of those at home signed.

This in a town of 1,300. The peace crusaders were greeted in many homes with a "God bless you." They report there was no opposition and no red-baiting.

The surge of peace is strong in this Midwestern State. Seventy-five young peace crusaders got 3,000 signatures Sunday in Milwaukee, and over 2,000 at the University of Wisconsin, just before the summer vacations began.

A Milwaukee Croatian fraternal union picnic Sunday signed up 300 for peace. On one beach in this city nine crusaders got 450 names in an hour and a half. In a Negro church the minister called on the congregation to take petitions and circulate them, and to sign at a table put up by the church for that purpose.

At the Greenfield Park trailer camp at West Allis, which was the scene of an attempt to evict a Negro family by mob violence a summer ago, over 350 names were gotten by a group of West Allis peace workers Saturday and Sunday. The 600 trailers are occupied by veterans and their families.

Last Thursday 15 women invaded the Wisconsin Avenue district on shopping night, collected nearly 400 signatures and aroused great interest throughout the city.

Friday, six canvassed the Waukesha shopping area with similar results. All this despite the violet red-baiting press campaign against the World Peace Appeal.

The Baruch Plan for Youth at 80

OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 17, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the New York Times, magazine section, of August 13, 1950]

THE BARUCH PLAN FOR YOUTH AT 80—HIS ONLY RULE IS TO LIVE IRREGULARLY AND HIS MAIN HABIT IS TO BREAK HABITS

(By Burnet Hershey)

Bernard Mannes Baruch, who will be 80 years old next Saturday, is entitled, perhaps, to feel that he has earned a rest from public duties. But right now he is busy in official hearings, public statements, and private conversations trying to impress on the American public the need for all-out economic controls and full mobilization. For Mr. Baruch the state of retirement appears to be as remote as it was 30 years ago.

"They mentioned rest after World War I," he says, smiling. "I was 50 then. Supposed to be middle life, 50 is, but it's just plain youth. Didn't have time to think about rest. Sounds too much like a rut, anyway. Ruts are hazardous to intellectual keenness, and they're death on quick perception and youngness of body."

After each period in which the elder statesman played out his active role, there has always come the suggestion that now it was time for him to let go, to sit the next one out. He never has. After his service under Woodrow Wilson, on the Supreme Economic Council of the Versailles Conference, he devoted himself to harmonizing industry and agriculture. His name and ideas are stamped on civic undertakings of the three subsequent decades—projects like the National Transportation Committee plan of 1933, the rubber-defense program of 1939, the manpower shortage relief plan, a medical research foundation to aid thousands of handicapped peoples, and the atomic-energy plan which formed the basis of the United States proposals to the UN Atomic Energy Commission.

If some geriatrician were looking for the perfect specimen of vigorous old age, he would be hard-pressed to find one better than Mr. Baruch. He is a handsome man, his white hair standing out in contrast to his pink, kinetic face. He is tall and straight, and his physical ease is especially noticeable; he seems to be moving around incessantly, with the graceful fluid stride of one who genuinely enjoys activity.

Mr. Baruch sums up his habits in a playful way: "It's a habit of mine to break habits. I like to make the area of contact with all phases of life as large as possible; to spread out in many directions, mentally, sympathetically, and to penetrate deeply in some, or at least in one. I have no rules, except a belief in the unswerving regularity of irregularity. I gave up smoking when I was 64 simply because it didn't agree with me any more. I take a cold bath every morning. I've cut down on my drinking, and today take very little except an occasional toast or congratulatory highball, because it doesn't agree with me.

"But there just aren't any rules. That's because old age is not inevitable. Although what we call the year-period, that is, the years' succession, may be advanced, old age is a state of mind that often happens to the middle-aged and sometimes to the old."

Mr. Baruch does admit to a couple of habits, but he deplores them. The more vexing of those is sleep. He agrees with Oscar Wilde, a contemporary of his who died some 50 years ago, that "no civilized man should ever go to bed the same day that he arises."

"Generally I'm a late stayer-upper, but sometimes I go to bed early just to start coping with the problem of going to sleep. If you've got a problem you might as well face it. And going to sleep is mine."

Eating is another habit for which he chides himself mildly, but not without a certain pride. "I'm always hungry. I eat like a young boy. Certainly I've been on diets, but that was when I had gout. A man should learn self-control. I never have."

He feels that he has learned other valuable practices, however, which may compensate for this deficiency.

"Men often don't pace themselves well," he observes. "They drive too hard toward breakdowns, toward the wear and tear of their tissues, and then, suddenly, they drop. Mind you, again, there's no rule, not even here. Some men might do their best this way. But the idea of frequent short vacations is a good one. Only if it suits—never if it doesn't.

"Of course, I don't mean week-enders. They wear themselves out. I'd rather stay in New York week ends. I go down to my farm in South Carolina, mostly in winter, from Thanksgiving to the 1st of March. There I'll go shooting wild birds up to the limit that the law will allow. You know, I can still sit in the saddle for from 2 to 4 hours and follow the dogs. But that's because I like it—not because I think it's healthy. The minute I stop liking it, I'll stop it."

Mr. Baruch looks upon all the aged in the world as his friends and contemporaries and has made their problems one of his chief concerns. He has been busy of late helping revaluate the potentialities of the Nation's oldsters toward insuring their useful participation in the life of the community. With noted gerontologists and with the Federal Security Agency of the Government, he has sought to define the nature and extent of the old-age problem and to seek their solution.

"The economic problem of the aged," Mr. Baruch points out, "is increasing. Down through the ages, there have been every kind of pills, theories, treatments, to avoid old age. The old-age fight is as old as the history of man. The ancient Greeks believed in rejuvenation by waters. I read just recently how the wealthy of the Middle Ages thought that pure gold was the greatest kind of rejuvenator, and rich men would swallow a few ounces a day.

"In our country and in our time, we don't need these weird ideas. Science and American organization have easily added 20 years to man's life expectancy. Today, any man can look forward to 20 more years of physical vigor than he could two generations ago.

"As I see it, there are two major issues to be faced. First, we must throw out our depression-born philosophy of forcing older workers out of jobs just because they are old. Broadly speaking, it is unwise to judge a man by his years, when his faculties are as keen as those of younger men. We are creating a vast human waste material here, with some tragic portent. And second, we must check all forms of inflation, because if we don't our plans for old-age benefits, private annuities, and even savings, will be useless when the time comes to use them.

"Any form of so-called economy that saps the value of pension money, savings, or annuities is the enemy of those who expect to grow old. And this includes just about everybody, doesn't it?

"And last, but most of all, we must remember never to become too statistical where human beings are concerned. The problem of what to do about the aged is primarily one of recognizing them first as individual human beings, full of fears, hopes, despairs, and appetities. We can't regulate them according to meters. Our problem now is to make industry understand them, and absorb them, for we are definitely entering upon an era of a new kind of old age."

The greatest contributing factor to the increased lifespan of the average American of today, Mr. Baruch feels, is private enterprise.

"A man who is free can mold his life, just as a nation that is free can mold its life—even control, to an extent, the building forces of his body and brain just as we can today control great forces of nature in electronics, dynamics, and atomic energy."

State Tidelands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a memorandum by District Attorney L. H. Perez, of Plaquemines Parish, La., appearing for the State of Lousiana, as special representative for the Attorney General of Louisiana, before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 195, dealing with State tidelands, on August 14, 1950.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 195 by Senator O'MAHONEY would complete the nationalization of the State tidelands by giving to the Secretary of the Interior full control and power over all operations for oil and other mineral production in offshore submerged lands in all coastal States of the Union.

ALL POWER TO SECRETARY

By the provisions of this resolution the Secretary of the Interior would be substituted for all the coastal States in the control and power over development of the tidelands for mineral purposes. For a period of 3 years he would be authorized to grant mineral leases for a term of 5 years, or as long thereafter as oil or other minerals may be produced from the area in paying quantities.

All revenues collected by the Secretary under existing State leases, or under leases issued by him under authority of this resolution, would be deposited in a special fund in the United States Treasury pending legislation by Congress respecting their disposition—which could be ordinary appropriations of Congress—and not legislation regarding the ownership of tidelands and their resources.

The Secretary of the Interior would be authorized to issue such regulations as he may deem necessary or advisable in performing his functions under this resolution—a blanket authority for the Secretary to issue regulations which would have the effect of administrative law, without enactment by Congress, and in substitution for all State laws and authority regarding the development of their natural resources in State tidelands, including all coastal submerged lands and waters within their boundaries.

The resolution affords no relief to inland States by providing that the United States is not claiming (as of now) their water bottoms, without a quitclaim or recognition of their proprietorship.

STATE SOVEREIGNTY DESTROYED

The States, with respect to their ancient and historic ownership of their own tidelands would be reduced to the status of puppets of a domineering, grasping, imperialistic Federal Government, with the Secretary of the Interior placed in the position of absolute czar of their erstwhile sovereignty lands which the States have always held for the benefit of their people in their united sovereignty.

This resolution would effectively destroy sovereignty of State governments over their public properties, which they have owned and operated by regulation of their State legislatures since the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776, the provisional Treaty of Independence between the Original States, through the Congress of the Confederation and the British Crown, on November 30, 1782, and the final ratification thereof with the British Crown, on April 11, 1783, by which the British Crown relinquished to the Original Thirteen States, by name, as free, sovereign and independent States, "proprietary and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof" and fixed the boundaries of the Original States into the sea, "comprehending all islands within 20 leagues of any part of the shores of the United States."

STATE OWNERSHIP SECURED BY TREATY

The right of State proprietorship of their tidelands, as a result of the Declaration of Independence and the Treaty of Independence which was wrung from the British Crown at the expense of incalculable sufferings and hardships and the shedding of the blood of our patriotic forefathers, has been adjudicated upon time and again by the highest court of the land.

In the interim between the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the Treaty of Independence in 1783 and the adoption of the United States Constitution by the people of the Original States in 1789, a Federal Government was set up under Articles of Confederation, article IX of which provided that—

"No State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States."

In the first recorded decision by the United States Supreme Court in 1827, Harcourt v. Gaillord (12 Wheat. 523), the United States Supreme Court held:

"There was no territory within the United States that was claimed in any other right than that of some one of the Confederate States; therefore, there could be no acquisition of territory made by the United States distinct from, or independent of some one of the States."

The sanctity of that Treaty of Independence with the British Crown was written into the United States Constitution, under article VI, clause 2, which provides—

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

In this connection, it should be pointed out that on Saturday, August 25, 1787, on motion of Mr. Madison, made in the Convention, article VIII (later made article VI by the Committee on Style and Revision) was reconsidered and after the words "all treaties made" were inserted the words "or which shall be made," with the explanatory statement that, "This insertion was meant to obviate all doubt concerning the force of treaties pre-existing, by making the words 'all treaties made' to refer to them, as the words concerned would refer to future treaties." (69th Cong., 1st sess., H. Doc. No. 398, p. 618.)

So it is, that the 1783 treaty of the Revolution by which the British Crown relinquished to the Original States all "proprietary and territorial rights" of the British Crown became, and is now, the supreme law of the land.

OFFICERS SWORN TO UPHOLD TREATY

The same article VI of the Constitution requires all Members of Congress, and State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States to support this Constitution, which makes said treaty the supreme law of the land.

If the plain provisions of the Declaration of Independence and the 1783 treaty with the British Crown require interpretation, the decisions of the United States Supreme Court furnish ample authority for the proprietary rights acquired by the Original States in all of the submerged lands within their boundaries.

STATE PROPRIETORSHIP, LAW

Over a hundred years ago this question of the right and title of the Original States to their submerged lands was passed upon by the United States Supreme Court.

In the case of Martin v. Waddell, reported in 16 Peters (41 U. S.) 367, decided in 1842, where the question of the ownership of submerged coastal waters in New Jersey was at issue, the Court held:

"When the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government."

The Court then cited approvingly a statement by Lord Hale in his treatise de jure maris, when speaking of the navigable waters, and the sea on the coasts within the jurisdiction of the British Crown, that the King is the owner of this great coast. The Court further stated that the lands under these waters were held by the King as a public trust for the benefit of the whole community, and that this dominion and propriety was an incident to the regal authority, and was held by him as a prerogative right, associated with the powers of government; and that when the people of New Jersey took possession of the reins of government, and took into their own hands the power of sovereignty, the prerogatives and regalities which before belonged either to the Crown or the Parliament became immediately and rightfully vested in the State.

The Court followed that decision consistently in holding that New Jersey, Maryland, Massachusetts, Delaware, New York, and other original coastal States on the Atlantic Ocean and Great Lakes had title to their navigable waters and soils under them.

The Court, in Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S. 1 (1893)), held:

"At common law the title and the dominion in lands flowed by the tide were in the King for the benefit of the nation. Upon the settlement of the Colonies like rights passed to the grantees in the royal charters, in trust for the communities to be established. Upon the American Revolution these rights, charged with a like trust, were vested in the Original States, within their respective borders, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States.

TIDELANDS NOT GRANTED TO UNITED STATES

Again, in Memford v. Wardwell (6 Wall. 423, 436 (1867)), the United States Supreme Court reaffirmed that settled jurisprudence of our country when it again held:

"Settled rule of law in this Court is, that the shores of navigable waters and the soils under the same in the Original States were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the several States and that the new States since admitted have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction in that behalf as the Original States possess within their respective borders.

"When the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign and in that character held the absolute right to their navigable waters and the soils under them, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution."

And as to the sovereignty rights over their tidelands and waters and their resources, the United States Supreme Court consistently has held that States since admitted on an equal footing with the Original States have the same sovereignty rights and proprietorship as the Original States.

In Pollard v. Hagan ((1845) 3 How. 212, p. 230), the United States Supreme Court held:

"By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First, the shores of navigable waters, and the soils under them, were not granted by the Constitution to the United States but were reserved to the States respectively; Secondly, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the Original States."

These positive decisions were reaffirmed scores of times by the Court, as witness again in the case of I. C. Railroad v. State of Illinois ((1892) 146 U. S., p. 43):

PROPERTY SUBJECT TO PARAMOUNT RIGHT OF UNITED STATES

"It is the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tidewaters, within the limits of the several States, belong to the respective States within which they are found with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States. This doctrine has been often announced by this Court, and is not questioned by counsel of any of the parties. (Pollard v. Hagan (44 U. S., 3 How. 212 (11: 565); Weber v. Board of State Harbor Comrs. (85 U. S., 18 Wall. 57 (21: 798).)

SAME RULE FOR GREAT LAKES

"The same doctrine is in this country held to be applicable to lands covered by fresh water in the Great Lakes over which is conducted an extended commerce with different States and foreign nations. These lakes possess all the general characteristics of open seas, except in the freshness of their waters, and in the absence of the ebb and flow of the tide. In other respects they are inland seas, and there is no reason or principle for the assertion of dominion and sovereignty over and ownership by the State of lands covered by tidewaters that is not equally applicable to its ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by the fresh waters of these lakes."

PARAMOUNT POWER OVER TIDELANDS

And, again, in Scott v. Lattig (1913) (227 U. S. 229, 242–243), as follows:

"* * * Besides, it was settled long ago by this Court, upon a consideration of the relative rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments under the Constitution, that lands underlying navigable waters within the several States belong to the respective States in virtue of their sovereignty and may be used and disposed of as they may direct, subject always to the rights of the public in such waters and to the paramount power of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and that each new State, upon its admission to the Union, becomes endowed with the same rights and powers in this regard as the older ones. (County of Ct. Clair v. Lovington (23 Wall. 46, 68); Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S. 324, 338); I. C. R. R. Co. v. Illinois (146 U. S. 238, 434–437); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S. 1, 48-50, 48); McGilvra v. Ross (215 U. S. 70).)"

At least 50 other cases could be cited and quoted affirming and reaffirming the same doctrine and the same settled jurisprudence of State ownership of its tidelands.

PARAMOUNT POWER OVER PRIVATE LANDS, TOO

The United States Supreme Court held and reaffirmed that, the same Constitutional paramount powers of the Federal Government apply to privately owned property, as, for instance, the Federal power of eminent domain over lands needed by the United States for governmental or defense purposes. (Kohl v. U. S. (91 U. S. 367, 23 L. ed. 49); Chappell v. U. S. (160 U. S. 499, 40 L. ed. 510, 16 S. Ct. 397).)

Even further back, in 1819, Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., at 403), held for the Court:

"If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this—that the Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action."

POWER NOT CONFISCATORY

However, in spite of the supremacy, the dominance and paramount character of the regulatory powers of the United States, construed within its delegated constitutional powers as far back as 1819, the same United States Supreme Court has held consistently for over 100 years that when the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government. And therefore, the Original States succeeded to the proprietary rights of the British Crown by the Declaration of Independence, confirmed by relinquishment of such proprietary and territorial rights in the 1783 treaty, which was made the supreme law of the land by article VI of the Constitution, and all States since admitted in the Union on an equal footing with the Original States, have the same proprietary and territorial rights to the beds of all submerged lands and tidewaters within the boundaries.

We repeat that the United States Supreme Court has consistently held that under the Declaration of Independence, under the Treaty of Independence with the British Crown, under the Articles of Confederation and under the Constitution of the United States, not only the Original States, but every State since admitted on an equal footing with the Original States, have ownership and title of all submerged lands and waters and their resources, including all tidelands within their boundaries, and that the States only granted to the United States Government regulatory powers necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States, which constitutional authority in the United States is the same over the inland navigable waters within each and every State of the Union.

This consistency recently was violated by the United States Supreme Court in the California decision in 1947 and, later, by the application of that same tideland grab ideology in the opinions rendered in the Louisiana and Texas cases in June 1950.

CANNOT ADOPT FOREIGN IDEOLOGY

The question for Congress to decide now is whether the foreign ideology adopted by the United States Supreme Court in these later three cases can be adopted as a national policy by the United States Congress.

Is it in the national interest, or is it conducive to rational international relations for the Congress of the United States to be importuned by Senate Joint Resolution 195 to ratify the foreign ideology adopted by the United States Supreme Court recently in the California, Louisiana and Texas cases, that the sovereignty of the States can be destroyed with impunity, that their public properties held in trust for their people in their united sovereignty can be destroyed, and their properties confiscated on the unconscionable pretense that the United States Government owes the responsibility of national defense, and such paramount power and dominion transcends those of a mere property owner, and by virtue of such paramount power, the United States has the right to appropriate the public property of the sovereign States, and to determine by what agencies, foreign or domestic, the oil and the other resources of the soil of the marginal sea may be exploited?

Can Congress adopt this foreign, grasping, imperialistic ideology as held by the Supreme Court, in its relations with the sovereign States of the Union, without damning its offer of defense, through the United Nations to other weaker sovereign states against communistic aggression?

Bear in mind that the Court refused to hold that the United States had proprietorship, or title, in the California case, and that the Court held that title was not an issue in the cases against Louisiana and Texas, but that the paramount power and dominion of the United States Government transcended bare legal title and entitled the United States to take and control the taking of mineral resources from the State tidelands

This pronouncement of such un-American ideology for the destruction of the sovereignty of our States is indeed frightful to the weaker sovereign nations of the world who are tendered protection and defense either through the liberality of the United States Government under its present administration or through the United Nations, with paramount power furnished by the United States, under its policy of international defense against aggressor nations.

SUPREME COURT DECREES UNITED STATES AGGRESSOR

But, here, who is the aggressor against the sovereignty and public property rights of our States, with an implication that the same destructive force of paramount power and dominion will extend to the destruction of private property rights?

No exception is made by the United States Supreme Court in its California, Louisiana, and Texas decisions that the paramount power and dominion of the Federal Government transcends those of a mere property owner who has only "bare legal title," without the paramount power to protect his possession thereof.

Certainly, the Congress of the United States cannot vote to adopt Senate Joint Resolution 195 and, by implication, adopt the foreign ideology of appropriation of property, or its confiscation, because of the exercise of paramount power and dominion of the Federal Government, or any government, without ratifying the aggressive, confiscatory acts and policy of the Kremlin.

The issue here far transcends the tideland grab or the power grab by some departments of the Federal Government.

Senate Joint Resolution No. 195, coupled with the Supreme Court decisions in the California, Louisiana, and Texas cases, are merely invitations to Congress to adopt a policy of appropriation and confiscation wherever the paramount power and dominion and the force of arms of the United States are used, supposedly for the protection and defense either of the States of the Union or the citizens thereof, or any other sovereign state or nation which accepts the protection and defense of its might and power.

To our shame, the Korean war situation is being used to liquidate our State sovereignty, and to put the clincher on the Federal tideland grab.

Congress certainly will support the Constitution of the United States and the supreme law of the land, the Treaty of Independence, and the rights of the States and its citizens flowing therefrom as the Members of Congress are sworn to do, and Congress will repudiate the suggestion of adopting a policy of appropriation and confiscation of property as a result of the use of this country's paramount power and dominion for national or international defense and, therefore, Congress must reject Senate Joint Resolution 195.

The Prayers-for-Peace Movement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, as the sponsor of Public Law 74, which calls upon the President to proclaim each Memorial Day as a Nation-wide day of prayer for peace, I am pleased to pay my respects to Mr. Hervé L'Heureux, who is doing splendid work in furthering the prayers-for-peace movement which he has sponsored.

As Members of the Senate know, Mr. L'Heureux is one of our finest Government career men, presently head of the State Department's Visa Division. He is one of the founders of the American Legion, and a wounded veteran of World War I. For the past 2 years he has been devoting himself to the prayers-for-peace movement in order that America might prepare itself spiritually as well as materially for the ordeal of these times.

Since this was the same premise which moved me to introduce the resolution to designate Memorial Day as a day of prayer for peace I am, as I say, most pleased to compliment Mr. L'Heureux on his fine work.

I ask unanimous consent that an article by Mr. L'Heureux entitled "Prayers for Peace" which was published in the magazine the Gold Star for May 1950, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

I also ask unanimous consent that excerpts from an address delivered by Mr. L'Heureux on July 19 to members of the United Action Committee for Expellees and of the Volksverein of Philadelphia be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Gold Star of May 1950]

PRAYERS FOR PEACE

(By Hervé J. L'Heureux)

My message is simple: Prayer, a minimum of 1 minute of prayer, daily, at noon, by every man, woman, and child in the United States, each in his own way, each according to his own faith, to seek divine guidance and assistance in securing world peace.

The original prayers-for-peace resolution, adopted at Manchester, N. H., October 28, 1948, is simple and self-explanatory. Here it is:

"Having complete confidence in the ability of our fellow men, with the aid of Almighty God, to establish a just and enduring peace in the world.

"We, the members of the Last Man's Club, William H. Jutras Post, No. 43, American Legion, do hereby unanimously resolve to pause for 1 minute in the midst of our daily task, at 12 o'clock noon each day, and raising our heart and mind toward God, ask Him to help us adjust our international differences to enable the nations of the world to secure an equitable and abiding peace; further

"We urge that this movement be endorsed by all the spiritual, civic, and business leaders in the United States, and that a similar resolution be adopted and implemented by every organization in our country to the end that this custom may become universal in effect."

Those of us who initiated this movement were actuated by a conviction that each and every person, regardless of his station in life, or his religious belief, can assist materially, through daily prayer, in achieving the peace which all of us desire so ardently. It was thought that a pause, in the midst of our daily work, at 12 o'clock noon, is an appropriate time to marshal the spiritual force of our Nation for peace, with the hope that such a custom might become universal in effect. The establishment of this practice generally would not only be a national acknowledgment of our dependency upon God, but it might also be a source of inspiration and encouragement to the masses of unfortunate people throughout the world who look to us for moral leadership, as well as for material aid. The prayers-for-peace movement is thoroughly patriotic, consistent with our basic philosophy of life and with the fundamental precepts upon which this country was founded. It is not pacifist in character; it is not a substitute for adequate armament, but an indispensable, spiritual component of adequate preparedness—in fact, a properly balanced preparedness. And at this point I should like to emphasize, if I may, that it need not be a question of enlisting God's aid in our defense only, but in the positive prosecution of our task as a nation, according to His will, whatever that prove to be.

While our potential enemies are straining every effort in preparation for total war, and we in the United States are taking necessary precautions to meet the challenge, why not unite simultaneously, at least in a national, if not in a world-wide mobilization of daily prayers for divine assistance and return to good morals and true Christian principles, with the hope of dissipating the causes for another world conflict? There is hardly a person who believes in God who, whether he goes to church or not, does not turn to God for help in times of peril to himself or to a loved one. Since this be true why wait until the eleventh hour? Why not seek God's graces now, before it is too late?

Occasionally, I am told that prayer will not deter those diabolical forces that are planning war. This, to me, indicates a lack of faith in the efficacy of prayer. It is hoped by those of us who sponsor this crusade that if we can muster a sufficient force of fervent prayers throughout the world, the balance might be tilted in favor of law and order. To this end some of us at least are dedicating every possible effort. Let us ask ourselves whether we, individually, are doing everything possible with the means God has given us to help avoid the horrors of another war. There has been a definite recrudescence of spiritual thinking in the United States in the past 20 years. Religion is on the march. Each of us should do our part to accelerate its pace. We must pray increasingly, in number and in fervor, if we hope to witness a millennium of genuine peace. However, each of us should daily and constantly endeavor to improve our individual behavior that we might be worthy of that which we seek through prayer. In the light of the moral decadence and selfishness which prevails in the world today, is it not too much to expect God to assist us in reconciling our differences and in securing world peace until through mass individual effort we shall have shown Him that we are worthy of His assistance?

As a clergyman has recently written to me from Los Gatos, Calif., "it may be that God demands more than an occasional furtive gesture of acknowledgement on the part of some of our governmental leaders, with the implied desire that He should, so to speak, leave the needed packet of divine assistance politely at our back doorstep and slip silently away."

The prayers-for-peace movement has no organized head; it calls for no financial subscription of any kind; its spread depends entirely upon the spontaneous and voluntary efforts of those individuals, and groups of individuals, who wish to interest themselves in this crusade of prayer. The individual effort required to pause daily for a 1-minute silent prayer, and to pass on the idea to a friend or to a group, is very little indeed. Yet, through such means alone, with the limited coordination I have been able to effect, the movement has made considerable progress since it was started in 1938. It has been endorsed by religious leaders of several faiths, including Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish. Many Members of our Congress have commented upon the movement in the House of Representatives or have brought it to the attention of their constituents. One governor and several mayors have issued appropriate proclamations. Some business firms have sent out printed literature with their monthly statements. The members of at least 920 groups and organizations in the United States have formally adopted resolutions of endorsement. I have received more than 13,000 letters. The practice of a 1-minute daily prayer at noon is presently being followed by unknown hundreds of thousands of persons, perhaps millions, in this country and in foreign lands. I wish I had the time to tell you about the development and spread of this movement outside our borders. I have received a large number of letters, from 16 different countries, requesting information concerning this movement, or relating what is being accomplished outside the United States.

Most of the 920 resolutions adopted in this country have come from individual units of veterans' and auxiliary organizations—542 of them. The others have come from service clubs, fraternal societies, sororities, student bodies, church groups, business firms, groups of Federal employees, and so forth. The following organizations have approved the idea on a national scale at their respective annual meeting during 1949:

1. The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States—convention, Cleveland, July 13, 1949.

2. Greek-American Progressive Association—convention, Milwaukee, Wis., August 5, 1949.

3 The Order of AHEPA—convention, Miami, August 9, 1949.

4. The Society of American Legion Founders—meeting, Philadelphia, August 27, 1949.

5. The Delta Theta Phi Law Fraternity—convention, Detroit, Mich., August 31, 1949.

6. Jewish War Veterans of the United States—convention, Miami, October 19-23, 1949.

7. The American Legion—meeting, national executive committee, Indianapolis, November 6, 1949.

Several other national groups are planning to take similar action at their respective, forthcoming, national conventions this year.

Among the readers of this message will be many whose sons, husbands, and fathers experienced the horrors of war and who have called upon God in their hour of need. Out of the tragedy of the loss of loved ones should emerge a great desire to do all possible toward the goal of world peace.

If you should find it practicable to adopt an appropriate resolution in any organization to which you belong, I would urge you to take the necessary steps so that the subject will be brought before your next national convention for similar action.

I feel that everyone should take part in this crusade of prayer, which has won the admiration and support of so many good people. Such support seems clearly to be our duty, and we should respond with unshakable and absolute trust. We need not know what form God's answer will take. In view of some of the factors in the international situation, we cannot know. But at least we should place our trust in God, as our forefathers have done, and hope for the peace upon which civilization itself seems to depend.

THE PRAYERS-FOR-PEACE MOVEMENT IN UNION WITH GOD, THE FREE NATIONS OF THE EARTH CANNOT FAIL

(By Hervé J. L'Heureux)

There frequently evolves something worthwhile and noble in the gathering together of men of sound mind and of good will for the accomplishment of a lofty purpose. On the night of October 28, 1948, a group of veterans of the First World War, assembled at Manchester, N. H., resolved to pause for one minute in the midst of their daily task, at 12 o'clock noon each day and, each in his own way, according to his own faith, to implore Almighty God to help us adjust our international differences with a view to enabling the nations of the world to secure an equitable and abiding peace.

The resolution, adopted by these veterans, included a plea that this movement be endorsed by all the spiritual, civic, and business leaders in the United States, and that a similar resolution be adopted and implemented by the members of every organization in our country to the end that this custom may become universal in effect.

This idea, of a 1-minute silent prayer at noon, has come to be known as the Prayers-for-Peace Movement. During the past 21 months, it has spread progressively throughout the United States and in several foreign lands. Although it is not possible to evaluate the growth of the movement outside the United States, it is known to be making substantial progress. Here in this country, at least 1,535 organizations and other groups, whose members embrace nearly every faith and creed, have formally endorsed the idea by passing resolutions. The following will give you some idea of the nature of these groups:

Veterans' organizations (individual units)	688
Veterans' auxiliary groups	99
Service clubs, including Rotary, Lions, etc	21
Fraternal societies, clubs and sororities	113
Student groups (schools, academies, colleges)	193
Alumnae groups	31
Church groups, including lay organizations	146
Business firms, professional offices, etc	185
Groups of Federal employees	18
Other groups and organizations	41
Total (as of July 15, 1950)	1,535

Here are some of the national organizations whose members have endorsed the prayers-for-peace movement:

1. The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States—annual convention, Cleveland, July 13, 1949;

2. Greek-American Progressive Association—annual convention, Milwaukee, Wis., August 5, 1949;

3. The Order of AHEPA—annual convention, Miami, August 19, 1949;

4. The Society of American Legion Founders, annual meeting, Philadelphia, August 27, 1949;

5. The Delta Theta Phi Law Fraternity, annual convention, Detroit, Mich., August 31, 1949;

6. Jewish War Veterans of the United States, annual convention, Miami, October 19-23, 1949;

7. The American Legion, annual meeting National Executive Committee, Indianapolis, November 6, 1949;

8. Catholic War Veterans of the United States of America, annual convention, Milwaukee, Wis., June 17, 1950.

In addition to these resolutions, the prayers-for-peace movement has been endorsed by many Government officials, including at least 20 Members of Congress, one Governor, several mayors, ecclesiastical authorities of different faiths and by business and industrial leaders. More than 14,000 letters have been received. Here are some of the comments, contained in one of these letters, from a patriotic, two-fisted American businessman in California. Referring to the movement, he wrote:

"It is simple and workable, perfectly free of all the familiar antipathies of the American mind (organizational propaganda, sectarianism and the like) and it is so exactly adapted to our personal and social necessities in this breathless hour of history, that it ought to spread like wild fire. If the twofold problem confronting our young Republic is to achieve a unity of spirit against the new barbarism threatening our civilization, and at the same time to forge that unity without destroying our own precious diversities, I know of no ready means to that end more happy and worthy than this beautiful proposal. It can become the Providential bond of unity among all men of good will, in whatever diverse tongues and idioms of belief, and nothing in our turbulent times is clearer than that the ultimate salvation of our western society, its faith and its culture, will only be won on the plains of reason with the sword of the spirit.

"The job now is to spread this movement through all the media of a mass organizational society without giving the idea itself the shape or character of another particular organization. God and our need of Him is a concept implanted in the nature of man, as we know, but it can be tragically smothered by our own petty prejudices, allergies and suspicions almost as readily as by sin. It is wonderful, really, how many groups (and how many anonymous persons) have already adopted this inspiration of yours, and many, many more will surely follow, as it spreads through our multiple and instant means of communication.

"But once let it be tagged as a specially sponsored program, however, unimpeachable the particular sponsor (American Legion, the Federation of Churches, the National Conference of Christians and Jews, etc.) and its burning appeal is promptly confined within fixed boundaries, and barricaded off from millions who need it and would otherwise eagerly adopt it. These groups, and many besides, will, I am sure, accept and urge it, but let them adopt it, not take it over; it should be kept as you have started it, an idea for one and all, conceived in faith and charity * * * 12 o'clock noon is a change of shifts for many great plants and whistle-time for virtually all. What an hour for a moment's prayer."

There is considerable food for thought in the remarks which have just been quoted. Also, there is considerable work yet to be done if the prayers-for-peace movement is to effect its purpose. The world has never been in greater need of prayer. The free nations need God's guidance in their efforts to stop the impending avalanche of armed conflicts in various areas of the globe; they certainly should have the benefit of His grace and His blessing in their common struggle to eradicate the communistic cancerous growth, with which the world is afflicted, and to restore natural law and order among the society of nations.

Our ignominious neglect of God and our failure to adhere to His divine law undoubtedly are responsible for most of the ills in the world. All too many of us, who have faith in God, are prone to neglect Him and to disobey Him. It may be that our poor mortal leaders have been playing the game of world politics alone altogether too long. Why not call in the Master Planner before it is too late?

It is here in Philadelphia, the cradle of American liberty that, as the originator of the prayers-for-peace movement, I suggest that our entire Nation be called to spiritual arms. In this dark hour in the world's history, let every leader—spiritual, civic, industrial, and business—and every newspaper, television and radio commentator take it upon himself to issue this call to all persons of good will, who believe in God.

Let us all unite daily, through the prayers-for-peace movement, in asking Almighty God to guide our destiny, to give our leaders the necessary wisdom and courage, to deter our enemies from carrying out their evil designs, and to bless our people and our associates in this crusade, to the end that, with the assistance of God, and the righteous efforts of the free nations of the world, liberty, justice, and charity might prevail once again, here on earth.

Let us proclaim our dependency upon God. Let us have complete spiritual mobilization. Then, with His guidance, and in union with Him, let us accept the challenge of His enemies. Let us not fear, for in union with God, the free nations of the earth cannot fail.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, those of us who are fortunate enough to own television sets were really afforded an opportunity on Sunday night last, to see a demonstration of truly representative government in action.

The program, Battle Reports From Washington, which made this possible was planned and projected by the Honorable John Steelman, assistant to the President. It was done in order to give millions of Americans an opportunity to see and hear top-flight officials here in Washington personally speaking on subjects of vital and of current interest to the American people. Politics were absolutely taboo.

The projected program will follow somewhat the type of White House meetings which have been conducted for some years past when national leaders in the field of agriculture, labor, finance, commerce, transportation, and trade were brought to Washington and given a so-called briefing or an intimate insight into what was the inside on public affairs as of that day and hour.

Last night's presentation—the first of a series of such telecasts—was positively captivating. It was opened by a forceful presentation as to the policies and purposes of the program, candidly, frankly, and eloquently presented to the American people by the Honorable John Steelman, assistant to the President.

Mr. Steelman was followed by the Honorable Steve Early, Deputy Secretary of Defense, and he in turn by Admiral John L. McCrea, Mr. Orris B. Wells, Senator Brien McMahon, and Mr. Averell Harriman, each of whom discussed the problem of the conflict in Korea as it affects their particular departments of Government here in Washington.

Senator BRIEN MCMAHON'S statement on the atom bomb, its peace potentialities as well as deadly effects in wartime, ought to be made a "must" reading for every Member of this House.

The entire program, monitored as it was by Robert McCormick, the well-known newspaper writer, war correspondent, and radio commentator, was beautifully and forcefully presented. Mr. McCormick's comments and excellently spoken introductions of the various speakers were clear, concise, and added striking continuity to the various statements.

Mr. Speaker, I carried to my bed the memories of the simple, honey truths so sincerely and eloquently spoken by John Steelman, the strong, rugged, courageous, and sagacious statements made by the able, experienced, and beloved Steve Early, the factual report of Mr. Averell Harriman, who has just returned from his visit with General MacArthur, and the interesting and fascinating talks on military personnel and food supplies made by Admiral John L. McCrea and Mr. Orris V. Wells, of the United States Department of Agriculture.

That last Sunday evening's telecast was of great import was evidenced by the fact that at its conclusion—and every few minutes thereafter throughout the evening—one would hear either on his radio or the television some news commentator making mention of the telecast and particularly of the statements made by Mr. Steelman, Mr. Early, and Senator McMahon. I noticed that the Monday morning papers carried a half-column report about the broadcast of the previous evening.

In order that all my colleagues may have an opportunity of informing their minds of the nonpolitical, disinterested, wholly unbiased, and informative telecast headed by the Honorable John Steelman, I am asking unanimous consent to insert the same into the RECORD:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. Exactly 8 weeks ago, North Korean tanks rolled across the rice paddies of the thirty-eighth parallel and bombs burst the peace in "the Land of the Morning Calm." As the cold war melts under the heat of guns into a hotter one, NBC television, inaugurating today a new series of teledocumentaries, turns its cameras upon the Nation's Capitol.

Washington—suddenly again not only the nerve center of the Nation, but the heart of the democratic world—bestirs itself to supply men and materials to fight a war 8,000 long miles away.

For a report on Washington, August 13, 1950—and a statement of the purpose of this series—here is the Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good evening, fellow citizens.

Tonight we begin a series of telecasts which we hope will bring your Government in Washington closer to you—and also to give you precise, authentic information on many national problems.

It is but natural that in a country as large as is ours, the Federal Government in Washington should seem remote to a large percentage of our people. We in Government, however, do not wish to be distant from you. We are working for you—the citizens of these United States. We are your employees. We want you to know what we are doing. We want you to see us, to hear how we are directing our efforts toward solving the many problems which face our Nation today.

Several years ago, I instituted a series of annual meetings at the White House, with various groups of leaders in labor and industry. At these meetings, Cabinet officers and the heads of independent agenices tell of their problems and what they are doing to solve them. These gatherings have become very popular and those who have attended have been quite lavish in expressions of appreciation. All, I feel sure, obtained a better understanding of the work which is being done.

The present television program is an extension of that activity. In this instance, we propose to discuss not alone labor, but agriculture, finance, commerce, transportation, and last but not least, the peace and security of our Nation.

Everyone hears rumors. Doubtless, you hear them every day. Someone who works for someone else might speak as if he knew the innermost secrets of high Government officials. The story he might tell—grows with each telling, and, of course, it is often difficult to obtain a clear picture of a given situation or even of a certain personality. By the medium of television you yourself can see the personality. We propose that you shall henceforth see and hear directly from the officials who are doing their part in administering the laws and carrying out the programs and policies of your Government.

Through the magic of television we hope to bring millions of our citizens in close touch with official Washington. On this program you will both hear and see the men who are working for you.

We hope that during these telecasts you will feel as if you are attending a meeting in a conference room in Washington, with Cabinet officers and other high-ranking officials. The agenda for these programs will follow the same pattern as the one used for the White House meetings I have mentioned. However, instead of attending an annual meeting, you will henceforth receive reports each week.

The officials whom you will meet during the weeks to come will speak very frankly. They will be reporting directly to you, as a citizen and a taxpayer. The information you get will be authentic. It will be altogether—the same facts and figures, which these officials use in making both their plans and decisions.

I think all will agree that these intimate meetings with the officials of the Federal Government can truly be called an exhibition of democracy in action.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. As American soldiers—now battling under the United Nations flag as well, carry the brunt of the war in Korea—and as the Nation, its complacency shattered by reports from the front, puts aside all hopes for a quick victory, 150,000,000 uneasy voices ask 150,000,000 uneasy questions of the men in charge of our military.

One such man is with us today. For 50 years he has been no stranger to the Washington scene. He has served under two Presidents. Though suddenly finding himself Deputy Secretary of Defense, he nevertheless remains an old newspaper man by instinct, still with a reporter's nose for facts. Let's hear the facts on our Armed Forces from Steve Early.

Mr. EARLY. I wish I could answer all of the questions the American people are asking about their Armed Forces, and especially about the fighting in Korea.

The American people can take the news—good or bad. As a reporter for many years, I learned that the American people want the facts. Here they are.

The last 50 days have seen the accomplishment of a military miracle. It is the first time in history—as far as I know—that any nation has made a successful piecemeal commitment of its armed forces in the face of a moving, hard-striking enemy army—and won the initial decision. I refer to the failure of the enemy to drive the American advance forces out of Korea. The Communists confidently expected to do this.

It is not the style of action Americans would have chosen. Normally, we would mobilize a sufficient number of troops to do the job; we would back them up with all the supplies and guns and ammunition and airplanes and bombs that they would need. And then, when ready, we would go to work. That's the way it happened in Normandy on D-day.

In Korea, that was not the case. When we spotted this invasion by the North Koreans as an all-out attack, we started to get out the American women and children. And they got out safely.

The President of the United States acted promptly. MacArthur never hesitated. A battalion of soliders flew to South Korea, got out of their planes, and began at once to fight the Communist enemies of that little country.

The South Koreans—out armored and out numbered—put up a terrific battle. And, I say this despite reports to the contrary. American soliders, sailors, and Marines and Airmen came to help them. And the nurses were there too.

It was the most valiant and well-executed rear guard action—stand, fight and retreat to stand and fight again—that modern arms has seen. Valiant battles went virtually unreported. They were the Bunker Hills of 1950.

We here started to build up supplies, and numbers of men. In 50 days a force has been rallied that equals the D-day effort on Omaha and Utah beaches in Normandy. And we have started local counterattacks to clean out the salients of a 140-mile battle line.

It has not been easy. Americans have died. Many have been wounded. Many more are missing.

It was from this one battalion that the forces today had to be built. They have stopped the advance and gradually will win back the territory that has been lost to the Communists.

That's the way it looks to this reporter's eyes. And, as the Deputy Secretary of Defense, I can assure you that that is about the same way it looks to our Joint Chiefs of Staff.

One thing has impressed me above all others. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have worked untiringly. Even more important, though, is the attitude of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They regard their problem—to a surprising degree—from a civilian viewpoint, never losing the broad perspective, never forgetting what each move means to their country. Much of this comes from the attitude of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—the GI general—Omar N. Bradley. He "carries the ball" between the Chiefs and the Secretaries and the President. You might like to know a little of the inside story of how he operates.

Early every morning, General Bradley is at his desk, checking on the latest reports from Korea and Tokyo. Exactly at 8:45, he is in Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson's office briefing us, bringing the recommendations on what should be done next. He helps to coordinate our efforts with those of the men out there on the battle fronts.

From Mr. Johnson's office, he goes to the White House and briefs the President. By 10 o'clock, General Bradley is back at his desk, ready to start a day's work that leads more often than not well into the night.

Americans have never been afraid to face the facts, and here is one of the facts we must face: This job in Korea is going to take time and effort, American troops and troops of other nations; it is going to have an impact on Americans, on the way we are going to live, for some time to come.

This is a fight for peace—for the United Nations—and for ourselves. The fight for peace will go on and on. It will not be easy, but Secretary Johnson, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the rest of us would like to have you know from this reporter that no effort will be spared to carry out the will of the American people and the orders of the Commander in Chief, our President.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. To gird ourselves, America, for the kind of war Under Secretary Early tells us we may expect, we are God-blessed with an agricultural bounty that before has nurtured us and our allies through two world wars. As the Nation gradually moves toward a war footing, as our defense forces siphon manpower from these farms, and war orders cut into the production of agricultural equipment—what will be the situation this time? Can we long have guns and butter, too, or what may we expect.

Mr. CLARENCE J. MCCORMICK. There never was a time in the history of the United States that agriculture was as well prepared for war as we are today. Before Pearl Harbor farmers had reached new production levels and large reserve levels. Today those production levels have been greatly extended. Farmers can now produce must faster than they could in prewar days and the total supply of food is larger than ever before in our history.

I would like to introduce to you Mr. Orris V. Wells, Chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, who will tell you more about our total supply of food. Mr. Wells.

Mr. WELLS. Well, Mr. Secretary, I think the simplest way to summarize the current food situation is to say that we have ample supplies of food in this country to feed everyone as well as they have been eating for the last 2 years or some better. Let's consider some of the facts or details about this food situation. Americans generally are now eating better than they were before the recent war. For the last 2 years average per capita food consumption has been running about 11 percent higher than it was in 1935–39. That is, people have been eating more meat, more eggs, drinking more milk, than they did before World War II.

When I say food supplies are ample to maintain this level of consumption or further increasing it, I am thinking first of all about the current prospects for food production this year. Most crops are now well into their growing season and on the basis of the August crop report which was released only last Thursday, it appears that total food production in the United States this year will be as large as it was last year. Production of some crops may be down slightly but we ought to have more livestock products this year than last.

Further, we have very large stocks of some of the more important food and feed items on hand. One of the interesting things about the current situation is the fact that a great many people who seemed excessively worried about surpluses only a few short weeks ago now realize the desirability of having reserves of such things as corn and wheat. Let's look at some of these stock figures for a minute. In the case of wheat, I suppose we would ordinarily think of normal or ordinary working stocks of around 150,000,000 bushels of old crop wheat on hand July 1.

This last July 1 we had about three times that much, or 450,000,000 bushels. This means that we have more than enough wheat to assure bread supplies in this country this year, to maintain or meet all export and military requirements that may be in sight, and to have large stocks of old crop wheat on hand at the beginning of the new crop year in July 1951. In the case of corn—and everyone who is interested in meat or milk ought also to be interested in corn because it is our principal feed grain for livestock—ordinary normal working stocks again might be thought of as around 300 million bushels of old stock corn at the end of the feed year. It now looks as though we will have three times this much, or around 900,000,000 bushels, of old crop corn on October 1. Further, the last crop report indicates that we have another bumper corn crop in sight for this year—a crop running well over 3 billion bushels.

Another item that might be of some interest is butter. Actually, farmers are producing more milk and dairy products than are now moving into the commercial market, dairy products have shown no appreciable rise in price since the Korean incident, and butter stocks at the present time instead of running around the 100 million pounds that they used to run before the war, are double that or around 200,000,000 pounds. In short, we are fortunate in having ample stocks of most of the storable agricultural commodities and we have considerable stocks of some of the more perishable commodities such as butter and other dairy products, including the dried milks and cheese. There has been some concern about food prices but I think the wave of price increases which occurred during the first part of July has been halted and farm prices at any rate have not shown any appreciable increases since about July 15.

Perhaps I should also mention some of the things which the Department of Agriculture has done during the last few weeks to help assure food supplies. Some three or four things come to mind immediately. First of all, the Secretary has taken immediate action with respect to sugar. The consumption quota—that is, the amount of sugar available to domestic consumers in this country—was immediately increased from 7,500,000 tons to 7,850,000 tons. The Department of Agriculture has also contracted for purchase of an additional 650,000 tons of Cuban sugar and is currently negotiating for some additional quantities from Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. Briefly, the Department has available an extra 1,000,000 tons of sugar if needed.

Second, the Department of Agriculture has announced wheat acreage allotments for the coming year equal to the acreage from which wheat is now being harvested. In effect this allotment is liberal enough so that in effect it is more of a conservation than it is a control measure.

Third, the Department of Agriculture is continuing to see that Commodity Credit Corporation stocks of various agricultural commodities—not only food commodities but also cotton—are easily available to the consumer market.

I am sure that all of you realize that food depends more than anything else upon what farmers do and I have already tried to say that the recent crop report indicates that farmers are holding food production at a high level this year. There are also some increases in prospect. For example, farmers have indicated that they intend to have more pigs this fall than last and for those people who like beef it should be comforting to know that our estimates indicate there were 34 percent more cattle on feed in the Midwest this July than a year ago.

In addition to the supplies of food on hand we are always concerned about the ability to produce more food. The present census is showing that our farm population is lower than ever before. In 1940 one farm worker produced enough food for a little more than 11 people. In 1950 one farm worker can produce enough for more than 14 people.

Due to the increased use of farm machinery we farmers are in position to produce not only faster but more efficiently. Rural electrification too has helped increase production through the use of many small machines on the farm that were never before available.

Today farmers have about three and one-half million tractors—twice as many as in 1940. We have three times as many corn pickers as we had in 1940, and about twice as many combines. These are the two great harvesting machines for corn and wheat and many other grains.

Milking equipment has also greatly increased—we have twice as many milking machines as we had in 1940. This would also be true of many other smaller machines that are used on farms.

Automobiles also play a large part in farm production as the car on the farm is used for the delivery of cream, milk, eggs, fruits, and vegetables to market. Farmers have about 25 percent more automobiles now than they had in 1940, and twice as many trucks as in 1940. Trucks are also used in delivery of farm products to market.

In addition to the large increase in the use of farm machines, it is important that we point out that even though we have this machinery it will be necessary that we do have fuel and repairs to keep it in running condition.

Other things that have added to the increase in production of agriculture include the use of fertilizers. We have doubled their use in the last 10 years and use 20 times as much lime as we did in 1933. This increased use of fertilizers and limestone means better pastures. Better pastures mean more and better livestock.

Speaking of livestock, through our research and experiment stations in the Department of Agriculture and State universities we have developed better breeds of hogs, dairy cattle, beef cattle, and poultry, and better methods of feeding and handling of our livestock. All of these things do make for increased production of meat, dairy, and poultry products.

However, it is true that no one can foretell the demands that may be made on agriculture in an all-out war. Drought, insects, or a shortage of labor may all make it difficult for a large production of agricultural products. But regardless of what the problem would be agriculture is better prepared to produce food than ever before in the history of our country.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. Not food for the stomach, but food for troubled thought is the mushroom that shaped itself over Hiroshima and Nagasaki * * * and whose secret is not in possession of the Russians, too. Already Washington realtors are advertising: This charming bungalow, outside the radiation area. Within the past 24 hours, a report on the effects of atomic weapons was released to the public for the first time by the AEC. And here, with some pertinent comment on that report is the chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, Senator BRIEN MCMAHON.

Senator MCMAHON. The vitally important report which reached the American people today does not describe how atomic energy can conquer disease and relieve human want. It is not a report telling how the atom will enrich your life and mine. Such might have been the nature of this report issued today—if the rulers of Russia were not striving to build a huge atomic war machine. Today's report might have dealt solely with putting the atom to work for the benefit and ennoblement of all mankind—if the rulers of Russia had not rejected our offer of effective worldwide control.

No; the report covers a different subject—not how to improve our homes and factories, but how to defend those homes and factories against atomic attack. In this fact lies the deepest and starkest tragedy of our time—a tragedy which threatens 10,000 times more casualties in an hour than all the heroic American soldiers who have fallen along the Korean battlefront.

We are given no choice but to study the atom used for destruction. The Kremlin and the Kremlin alone forces this grim project upon us. It is a simple, indisputable fact that Soviet Russia now possesses some atomic bombs. It is a simple, indisputable fact that her supply of atomic bombs will increase as the months and years pass. Not only our troops in Korea but every man, woman, and child on our home front live amidst growing danger. Regardless of what else happens, that danger will inevitably continue to grow so long as the rival stocks of atomic weapons in Russia and America are permitted to pile higher and higher.

Today's report on the effects of atomic bombs—nomimal atomic bombs of the old-fashioned Hiroshima and Nagasaki type—confines itself to facts. It is calm, dispassionate, and courageous—just as the American people can and will be themselves in confronting the peril of the future. This report has been in preparation for many months. The Atomic Energy Commission, the Department of State, the Department of Defense—all have worked on it; all have spared no pains both to guard national security and to give you the authoritative information you need for self-protection in an era of atomic crisis. The report is a major landmark in our efforts to establish a sane system of civil defense.

I still cherish the faith that the men of the Kremlin can be brought to their senses—that a day will come when reports on atomic energy deal only with the thrilling promise of a better world created by this elemental force. Until we solve the atomic crisis, nothing fundamental is solved—but when we do solve it, a new and noble life for all men everywhere lies ahead.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. So far, America, this has been anything but a push-button contest of rocket-borne atom bombs. To meet the demand for war's inevitable raw material—men—not only have draft boards blown the dust off the strange alphabet that begins with 1A and ends with 4F, but calls have gone out to members of the Nation's Armed Forces Reserves. Reporting on the Reserves picture—Vice Adm. John L. McCrea, staff director of personnel policy planning for the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. MCCREA. Recently, many military reservists—both as individuals and in organized units of the Reserve and National Guard—have been called to active duty. Many of you already have become aware of this firsthand, because the knock of the messenger of military service has come to your door—or soon is expected. These calls to active duty will continue as long as essential military manpower needs exist. The country is fortunate, indeed, to have available to it—and ready to render patriotic service—considerable resources of trained and experienced reservists from which these calls can be met.

Among our reserve personnel, there are many who possess critical civilian skills, or, who are in nationally vital positions which may make it more advisable—in the over-all national interest—to delay their calls to active duty for specified periods of time. The primary requisite of a reserve component is prompt availability for military service in emergency. However, the Department of Defense recognizes that the retention of a reservist in his civilian capacity may often contribute more effectively to total national security than would immediate service in uniform.

The Secretary of Defense has announced criteria under which calls to active duty of reservists critical to civilian purposes may be controlled. These criteria are designed to provide a basis for call-up which will cause minimum disruptions to the national economy without serious sacrifice to uniformed operations.

Normally, requests for delays will be initiated either by the employer of the individual concerned or by the individual himself. Requests will be given consideration—(1) if the skill appears on the Department of Labor list of critical skills, and (2) if the essential activity in which the reservist is involved is cataloged as such by the Department of Commerce, or, (3) if he occupies a key managerial post not otherwise accounted for, but from which his removal would cause material loss in production, service, or research necessary to the national health, safety or interest.

Responsibility for the interpretation and implementation of the Department of Defense policy governing the call-up of reservists is vested in the separate military departments for their own reserve personnel. It is the job of each department to reconcile the factors in each case and to determine whether the requirements of active military service or of continued civilian employment are paramount.

The military departments, under the overall Department of Defense policy, are collaborating closely with the other governmental activities presently charged with keeping the national manpower program of the Nation in balance. Through the joint efforts of all concerned, the most effective application of the manpower of the Nation in the interests of national security appears to be assured.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. Finally—as if to cap our report for today—the wheels of a constellation bearing W. Averell Harriman touched the runway at Washington airport this week. Disembarking at the end of a Presidential mission that took him half way around the world to the Far East, the President's special assistant on foreign affairs had some extra-special words for the home folks.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I have just come back from a quick trip to see General MacArthur at the President's direction. I left Tokyo Tuesday evening and arrived here Wednesday morning. That may sound like some kind of a record but actually when you think that there's 14 hours difference in time, the elapsed time is 29 hours, which in itself seems to me pretty fast. I spent a day, too, at Korea, and I was tremendously impressed with the confidence our people have in the South Koreans. That went all the way from the generals down to the GI's. These South Koreans have reformed into five divisions and are fighting bravely and courageously to defend their soil from the invaders from the north. Now, not only are they fighting with us, but they are supporting us in every way they can. They are unloading our ships; they are running the railroads; the local police are taking care of the situation—preventing sabotage in spite of the fact that there are many northern Koreans that have come down for no good purpose. That to me is extremely encouraging because it makes one feel that in the liberation of Korea, there will be people who can carry on with determination—determination to maintain a free life as was promised them by the United Nations. Now I saw Syngman Rhee, the president, and I saw Mr. Muccio, our Ambassador, and they all confirmed my impressions. The President asked me to discuss with General MacArthur all the political problems that there are in the Pacific and the Far East. I stayed with General MacArthur and that gave me an opportunity to discuss many matters informally and I have been able to report to the President General MacArthur's views, which the President was anxious to obtain. I found General MacArthur in complete support of the President. He considers the action of the President, quick action in bringing together the United Nations and recognizing that this Korean incident was a challenge to all free nations and one of the magnificent steps in our history. He believes that the President's policies are those which can bring us to success and believes that if we deal with these matters firmly as is outlined in the President's policies that we can find a way to peace—and it is the only way to find a way to peace.

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America, as top Government officials have come before you to report—musters its forces to meet the threat to our security and the headlines, still warm, that tonight reflect the seventh week of action.

Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another informative teledocumentary—this, then, against the background of battlefront Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your first battle report, Washington.

Russian Aggression Has Strengthened the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Thursday, August 10, 1950, issue of the Northwest Alabamian, of Fayette, Ala., dealing with the effect of Russian aggression on the United Nations:

RUSSIA'S ACTIONS HAVE DONE MUCH TO STRENGTHEN UNITED NATIONS

There are two diametrically opposed views concerning the origin of the Korean war. One is that it was stimulated by the Russians on the theory that the United States and its Allies would do nothing more than write formal letters of protest; that the North Koreans would overwhelm the ill-equipped South Korean defenders in a couple of weeks or so, and that another nation would easily be added to those within the Kremlin's sphere of influence. If that view is correct, the Russians could not have been more wrong.

The other view is grim. It is that Russia anticipated in advance what we would do, and that it was a deliberate, Kremlin-conceived trap. We would spend our resources in Korea, while Russia contributed nothing to the conflict except some equipment and top leadership. In due time, this view holds, the same will happen elsewhere—in Iran, Formosa, perhaps Europe. The west will be forced to spread itself paper thin all around the world. Eventually, it will be bled white, and then Russia, with her strength unimpaired, will move in for the kill.

That view is enough to send chills down any spine. There is no question but what a basic Soviet technique is to have other peoples do the fighting. The Asiatics are particularly useful grist in this kind of a mill. They are fatalistic and fanatical. Human life has small value in their eyes. Americans who have been at the Korean front have all been impressed by one dreadful fact—no matter how many of the enemy are slaughtered, they keep on coming in wave after wave.

However, a strong case can be made on behalf of the view that this time the Kremlin woefully misjudged the temper of the United States. The Korean war has done more than any single thing since World War II to cement the western nations. The United Nations is no longer just a debating society on the international level—it is a belligerent, and its flag flies in South Korea. The war is a UN, not merely a United States, operation.

The most encouraging thing that has happened so far has been the response to Trygvie Lie's appeal to the UN membership for substantial aid in Korea, including trained ground troops. An impressive list of countries has responded. In many instances, the size of the forces dispatched will necessarily be very small, but the total will be considerable. And, going beyond purely military considerations, the fact that many countries will be physically represented in the actual fighting in Korea must certainly cause some hard thinking in the Politburo. At least, the ranks of the anticommunist world—and it is most of the world—are gathering.

Some time ago Herbert Hoover proposed the creation of a United Nations without Russia and her satellites. This may come about through the force of events. Russia is still a member, of course, but she has small influence now. The great majority of members has served final notice that Communist aggression must stop.

The Democratic Party Is the Party of the People—the Republicans Represent Special Interests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 26, 1950

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, during my 16 years in public office, on two occasions I have had the experience of serving in legislative bodies while Republicans were in power. In 1931 and 1932 I served in the Michigan State Senate as the only Democrat in the Brucker Republican administration. At that time the Republicans and Hoover were in power in Washington. It was the time when the Republican depression hit the Nation. During that Republican administration 9 out of 10 families in my district were completely wiped out; jobless, homeless, bankrupt, hungry, and destitute. Hundreds of desperate men committed suicide. The Republicans at Lansing did nothing to help the hungry and depressed. They offered, instead, a large State police constabulary and a finger-printing bill to quell, subdue, and frighten the desponder and jobless citizens. Apple peddlers on every corner was the only plan that Hoover and the Republicans in Washington had to offer.

Some of you voters may have been too young to remember these old days under the Republicans. If so, just speak to your fathers and mothers and the older citizens. It was a cold and inhuman Government.

Then came Roosevelt, the Democrats, and the New Deal. I was elected to Congress and served with this vigorous and constructive Democratic administration. The big job of reconstruction and rehabilitation went forward. People went to work. Credits were restored. Factories began to hum, farms were restored and reactivated, new homes began to spring up like mushrooms. Then after several years of good Democratic administration people became sort of easy-going, forgot their miseries and misfortunes. The people began to take prosperity, employment, and good times for granted. They became self-satisfied, and even neglected to vote. So much so, that in 1946, 4 years ago, only 37 percent of the people voted. The Republicans were not asleep, however. They voted, and they obtained control of both Houses in the Eightieth Congress. Yes, by a small minority vote of the people the Republicans took over the Congress of the United States and immediately began to serve their masters—big business, big bankers, the trusts, and the profiteers and the gougers. They did this brazenly, openly. They did not even bother to hide or camouflage their intentions. A tax bill for the relief of the rich and the powerful; off came controls on food and necessities; RFC put out of business; and all credits and mortgage loans placed at the mercy of the big bankers; no slum clearance, no rental housing. Home construction down 40 percent; veterans denied loans—sabotage of the electric-power program, no minimum wage increase from 40 cents, no increase in social-security benefits, no extension of the civil-rights program, no aid to education, no health program, no strengthening of antitrust laws, and for labor they took a leaf out of Hitler's book and gave them the Taft-Hartley bill. They emasculated the Labor Department by cutting its appropriation by more than one-half.

In the brief period of 2 years the Republicans again exposed themselves as the party of the National Association of Manufacturers, of big business, the profiteers, the bankers, and monopolists.

In 1932 the Democratic Party was entrusted with responsibility, after 12 years of Republican neglect had blighted the hopes of mankind, had squandered the fruits of prosperity, and had plunged us into the depths of depression and despair.

The Democratic Party rebuilt a shattered economy, rescued our banking system, revived our agriculture, reinvigorated our industry, gave labor strength and security, and led the American people to the broadest prosperity in our history.

We introduced the spirit of humanity into our law, as we outlawed child labor and the sweatshop, insured bank deposits, protected millions of home owners and farmers from foreclosure, and established national social security. We Democrats reject the Republican principle that Government exists for the benefit of the privileged few. We Democrats believe that it is the duty of the Government to serve the interests of all, and not the few; to assure a world in which peace and justice can prevail; to achieve security, full production and full employment.

It is our first duty to provide leadership in the world toward the realization of the Four Freedoms. We believe that Democracy, when dedicated to the service of all and not to a privileged few, proves its superiority over all other forms of government.

We support the United Nations fully, and we give our wholehearted support to give it strength, growth, and development. We desire to see the United Nations established as a strong international organization that can and will prevent aggression and maintain world peace and security.

We have exerted every effort to bring peace. The road has been hard and rough. We shall not seek peace by appeasement, weakness, and a surrender of our national dignity. I believe that we shall attain peace by showing strength and national unity and by giving full and powerful support to the United Nations.

We offer to the people of the world peace, while helping them to reach their goal for better economic conditions without the loss of freedom and liberty. To all Americans the words "peace, freedom, and liberty" have a special meaning. We reject totalitarianism either from the left or the right. There can be no freedom and liberty when the individual must live in constant fear of the Gestapo or the NKVD.

Confusion in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, the President and his chief advisers, Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, and Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense, have led our land to the very brink of a serious crisis without military preparedness and without an understandable plan or policy.

I have recently made two short speeches on the radio dealing with this situation, one discussing the woeful lack of military preparedness, the second, the equally tragic lack of a coherent foreign policy.

With the consent of the House, I am including them now to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

PART I

WAR AGAIN—WITHOUT PREPARATION

Last week most of my short time on the air was devoted to the President's message, and some of the effects it would have in our own area. However, I did then suggest that again, as at Pearl Harbor, we were surprised by the action in Korea, and were wholly unprepared for it. I want to talk now about just how badly prepared we were, and some of the background for this state of unpreparedness—which, incidentally, is costing the lives and blood of our boys and is also losing face and prestige for us in the Orient, prestige which may never be recovered.

Of the scores of letters that I have received on this particular subject, I want to refer to an exceptionally thoughtful one from Henry P. Megargee, Jr., of Atlantic City, whom many of you probably know. His letter is typical of many others in that he confesses a groping sense of utter confusion regarding the present state of our military preparedness, or rather lack of it. When he says that, he can truly speak for all of America because we are all astounded and confused by the revelations of the action in Korea.

I wish time permitted quoting all of his letter. It is well worth it, but only brief reference to it can be made and perhaps some answers given.

For example, he says, "We were told that the mission of the Army Air Force, both strategic and tactical, made the naval air arm obsolete for all intents and purposes. And the opposition to this theory was squelched in a shameful and disgraceful purge of those officers who dared to raise their voices against it." He is right. The President, in his 1950 budget, called for the laying up of three attack carriers, three antiaircraft cruisers, and nine light cruisers, and halted construction on a supercarrier on which millions had already been spent. Seventy-two naval vessels were put out of use, and nine naval air stations, of which the great station at Pomona was originally one. (Fortunately it was retained in active status and it took a lot of doing to retain it.) In the 1951 naval budget there was a further reduction of approximately 1,500 naval planes, and by the end of those 2 years the naval air arm had been reduced approximately 40 percent.

A couple more fully equipped aircraft carriers in the Pacific right now would make all the difference.

Mr. Megargee goes on to say that the people were told the Army Ground Forces would carry out all functions heretofore performed by the marines, and that the marines virtually served no useful purpose. Again he is right. The Marine Corps was saved from virtual extinction in the Eightieth Congress, but nevertheless its strength has since been whittled down. For many years, indeed for decades, the Marine Corps almost alone maintained the prestige of this country in the Pacific and the Far East. Today, although Congress has authorized a strength of 107,000 men, its actual strength has been allowed to go down to 70,000. The corps was the spearhead of our successful amphibious actions in World War II. Our high command told us we wouldn't have amphibious action again; notwithstanding which on July 19 we again used a landing in Korea 60 miles north of the American held and vital port of Pusan.

Apparently we were prepared only to bomb Moscow and no lesser action was foreseen.

My correspondent goes on to say, "Only shortly over a month ago the President of the United States, speaking about the question of peace in the world, stated that we were closer to peace than at any time since World War II." Last June the Secretary of the Army, at the graduating exercises at West Point, told his audience that we now had defensive weapons that would make the whole concept of armored warfare, as we know it today, a thing of the past. "We have weapons so effective that we can repel any tank known to military intelligence," Megargee adds: "It must be a great comfort to the troops in Korea to know that these weapons are still on paper or in the experimental stage at the Ordnance Department's proving grounds."

What answer can we in Washington give him? He says he is shocked beyond words; so am I. He fears that we will never learn our lesson; I share his fears.

For more than 2 years, I, with a majority of Members of Congress, have been urging and appropriating for a 70-group Air Force. The President disagreed with us, and as a result the Air Force is inadequate.

In Secretary Johnson's report of March 1950 he told how he did not use $435,000,000 in funds that Congress had willingly appropriated. Add to this, if you please, seven hundred and thirty-five million in funds, appropriated for the Air Force by Congress, and which was not spent, and indeed was arbitrarily refused.

In September 1949, Congress provided over $10,000,000 in cash for military assistance to Korea. On June 25, the day of the North Korean attack, $200 of this fund had been used.

Three years or more ago, Congress passed the long-hoped-for unification bill. The man who was appointed to head the unified forces said a few weeks ago that if trouble broke out at 4 o'clock, the United States would be ready at 5 o'clock. He didn't say what year!

About 3 years ago, Congress established a Central Intelligence Agency. They faithfully reported the concentration of troops in North Korea weeks before the outbreak of trouble. The high command apparently paid no attention.

About 3 years ago Congress appropriated $125,000,000 for military aid to China to fight communism. Aid for China was opposed by the administration and although the China aid bill was signed in April 1948 it was 8 months later when the China war was actually lost that some help began to dribble to the Chinese people.

A year ago, apparently with a fixed intention of abandoning Korea, we withdrew all of our Armed Forces from that country. Although we helped to arm the South Koreans, it is now clear that we armed them purely for the purpose of internal security and not to resist attack from the north.

On June 26, 2 days after the attack, Secretary of State Acheson, before a Senate committee, admitted that it was known that North Korean forces were along the border. He was asked, in view of that knowledge, why there was only a 10 days' supply of ammunition in Korea. So far as I know, no answer to that question has yet been made.

There were no mine fields, no tank traps. In short, nothing to resist an attack which seemed inevitable. The American people are entitled to ask why.

We are involved in war now, and it is clear that our paramount duty is to fully and patriotically support our Government's efforts and to do everything that need be to restore the peace if possible. Nevertheless, it would be a breach of duty not to point out the remarkable blunders which for the third time in a single generation have led us into armed conflict without adequate preparation.

Our postwar appropriations for the national defense have totaled $95,000,000,000. Some day people are going to require an answer to the question: "What became of this money?"

PART II

FOREIGN POLICY—STUMBLING AND FUMBLING

In the beginning of this series of short talks on Korea, I recall that I made the statement that we are involved in a mess largely because of stumbling and fumbling with our foreign policy in Asia, or, rather, with a lack of a policy in Asia. It is not fair to make such a charge without being prepared to prove it, and I am prepared to prove it.

A couple of years ago I made the suggestion that in order to avoid trouble with Russia we should put in unmistakably clear words precisely what our position is, and draw a line marking the area of our vital interests, and say quite bluntly "thus far and no farther." I am quite convinced that if Stalin knew exactly where we stood he would avoid deliberately treading on our toes. Thus, in Berlin, we made it plain by our dramatic air lift that we refused to be pushed out of that area, with the result that we were not pushed out.

In Korea, however, our policy has been exactly the opposite, and has invited the aggression which finally took place.

It all started with the extremely serious error of inviting Russia to participate in the last few days of the Japanese war, which was wholly unnecessary, and gave to the Communists their opportunity to demand the arbitrary and unwise division of Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel, which was bound sooner or later to cause trouble.

Then, of course, a year or more ago, we withdrew from the peninsula a very substantial army which we had there, at the very instant when common sense demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation. That was the time for decision. Either we should have concluded that Korea was a part of our vital interests in the Pacific, in which case our troops should have remained, or else we should have concluded that we had no vital interest in Korea, in which case the troops should have been withdrawn and the area finally abandoned.

It seemed perfectly clear to all of us, and it must have seemed equally clear to the Communists, that our policy was to abandon Korea, and not thereafter to intervene. All the rest of China had been abandoned (and Korea is geographically a part of China); the President openly and officially stated that we would not defend Formosa and bitterly criticized Senator TAFT for suggesting that we should, and it seemed to have been finally determined by the administration that the vital area which America would defend was Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines.

In a major policy speech before the National Press Club here in Washington on January 12, 1950, the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, laid down the policy that we could not and should not go further than that, and that no such line of containment could be drawn in south and southeast Asia, where we had no direct responsibilities and only limited opportunities for action. That clearly excluded China, Korea, and Formosa.

As late as May 5, 1950, Senator TOM CONNALLY, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is the administration's spokesman on foreign policy in the Congress, said that Korea could be overrun by Communist aggressors any time, but that Korea was not an essential part of the defense strategy and not very important. This, of course, was the equivalent of telling the North Koreans that we were not going to bother about South Korea, and they could go ahead and do what they pleased. Earlier CONNALLY, in referring to Formosa, said that if we occupied it, we would have a liability on our hands instead of an asset. He concluded in a burst of oratory by saying that he would not "send American boys to Formosa to bleed and to die, and to be buried in the jungle soil 7,000 miles away."

I respectfully submit to you that this was a clear invitation to the North Koreans to march, and they must have been as surprised as the people, the Army, and the Congress itself was when overnight the administration turned the greatest flip-flop in history.

Obviously, we must now unite with complete determination to settle this affair, but I believe the American people would go forward with more confidence and more enthusiasm if those responsible for this remarkable shilly-shallying would resign, to be replaced by men who know their own minds; men who would be frank and honest in their dealings with the American people.

Maj. Gen. Philip Fleming

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, one of the great Americans born and raised in the First Congressional District of Iowa is Maj. Gen. Philip Fleming whose record of achievement is well known to every Member of Congress. General Fleming's boyhood home was Burlington, Iowa, and he went to the United States Military Academy from there.

That Burlington, Iowa, is very proud of her native son is well shown in a recent editorial that appeared in the Burlington Hawkeye Gazette which I include in my remarks so that Congress and the Nation may have the privilege of reading it. At the same time I take this opportunity to extend General Fleming my commendation and my congratulations on the outstanding record he has made throughout his exceedingly busy and useful lifetime.

The editorial is as follows:

JACK-OF-ALL-TRADES

If there is any man who has been jack-of-all-trades in Government in recent years and who has covered himself with honor in so doing, it has been Burlington's Maj. Gen. Philip Fleming.

Long a confidant of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, he was called upon by F. D. R. to administer many civilian capacities as well as military. Probably the most important was at the head of WPA in its latter days. He also served on the Maritime Commission, made junkets to foreign countries and otherwise made himself generally useful.

Upon F. D. R.'s death, President Truman continued to use Fleming's talents. His assignments have been numerous. The most recent is as Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce for transportation. In the event of an all-out war, which seems more than possible at the moment, Fleming's would be a most responsible position.

The genial general is no longer a spring chicken. On October 15, he will celebrate his sixty-third birthday. A native of Burlington, he cut his eyeteeth as a kid along the streets and playing in the ravines of town. As a part of his early experience, he was a newspaper boy for either the old Hawk-Eye or the Gazette, he once told us.

Anyhow, Burlington is always proud of her own when they do well, and Phil Fleming has done better than well in the field of military and political planning. He is one of the town's outstanding sons.

It Is Everyone's Duty To Register and Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1950

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, in our generation two world wars were fought for freedom—freedom of speech, freedom of faith, freedom from want, and freedom from fear.

The freedom of the ballot box is the guaranty of these other freedoms; yet in our generation we have seen our people exercise this basic freedom less and less.

History shows the trend. In 1896, on an election day that history records as cold and rainy, over muddy roads and without the modern conveniences of transportation that exist today, 85 percent of the potential voters of this Nation trudged to the polls to vote on issues which were purely domestic and which most people have long since forgotten.

But in 1946, at the end of the greatest war in history, fought to preserve this Nation and other freedom-loving nations from subjugation and slavery, only 39 percent of the voters could find time enough to climb into their cars and roll off to the polls at a time when postwar decisions that would affect the history of the world were to be made.

An election was won—a congressional majority was voted into power by two-ninths of the voters of the United States.

In 1948, in a Presidential election, when the issues were world-wide, when great decisions affecting the future of the world were being made, only 51.6 percent of the voters bothered to leave their television and radio sets and go to the polls.

Americans seem to place a low value on the ballot for which their fathers fought and died. They seem to place small value upon the price we paid in blood and treasure in World War II to keep freedom alive in the world.

In Europe, the nations who have been fed by us, who have been aided by us as they sought their salvation under the threatening guns of a hostile power, these nations place no such low valuation on such a priceless heritage. In England 85 percent of the electorate went to the polls. In Italy nearly 92 percent of the voters went to the polls. Similarly in France.

But here at home our citizens seem to take their liberties for granted. They say, "Let George do it." Too often our citizens defer until election day their desire to participate only to find on election day when they want to vote, that they have not registered and therefore cannot vote.

Thus millions of non-voters, by negation, settle by lazy inaction the pressing problems of our times.

This is bad—in our democracy, it is unforgivable. For most of us take part in our Government only by means of the ballot.

Voting has been termed the sacred right of every citizen. Voting is more than that; it is a duty. Voting is the foundation stone of our democracy.

When we were in school as youngsters we stood up with the rest of the children, and took the oath of allegiance to the flag of the United States of America. We must not let that school-time pledge end our job as useful citizens. That pledge was to impress upon us our priceless heritage as free citizens of the United States. Let us make that pledge come true by exercising our franchise by registering and then voting in all elections.

Remember that your elected representatives really represent you. The Members of the Congress of the United States in Washington represent you. Your governor represents you. Your mayor represents you. These people are your servants. They are your voice. They speak for you. When you vote, you are having your say on how this country is run. When you don't vote, you have nothing to say, and you have no reason to complain if things are not run to your liking.

So it is up to you, as a thinking citizen, to get your name on the registration books, and then to vote in the primary elections and in the regular elections next November.

We have greater problems today than ever before. The world is smaller in size, and greater in population and in problems. It is more necessary that the people express their will today than ever before in history. You know that I make this appeal in all sincerity. I have been a Member of the United States Congress for 14 years. I am a member of two powerful and important committees in Congress, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I know of the tremendous responsibilities and the complex and vital national and international problems that are facing us. Two devastating world wars in our generation have added greatly to these problems. Our health, our housing, our agriculture, our conservation, labor, wages, prices, profiteering, taxes, inflation, to name just a few, are problems, the solution of which will affect our future, and the future of our children.

It is your solemn obligation to have your say in the solutions of these and all other problems of government.

To preserve that heritage of freedom for which our forefathers fought many generations ago, millions of Americans have fought and shed their blood in all parts of the world. So, how can anyone neglect their duty to vote?

By wise decisions at home, and wise choices at the ballot box, we can preserve our freedom, and create a peaceful world, and a prosperous America.

We must send our best brains into action. This is no time for scrubs or second-raters. The stakes are high and we cannot afford to lose. Government therefore, is your business. All of the activities of Government, international, national and local, affect you personally, intimately, and directly. They affect your jobs, your homes, the prices you pay, the education and future of your children. Make your action in government positive and effective. Register now. And then vote, both in September and in November.

OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD an excellent article by Sylvia F. Porter, appearing in the New York Post and other papers on July 12, concerning H. R. 2908, the bill to separate subsidies from air-mail payments:

NINETEENTH CENTURY MAIL

(By Sylvia F. Porter)

London's residents get three mail deliveries a day. In Brussels there are also three, in Paris at least two. But the residents of the great cities and towns of America? We now get only one.

In the middle of the twentieth century, in an era of atomic energy and flight faster than sound, we are being forced to submit to a nineteenth-century, "horse and buggy" mail-delivery schedule.

Today all of us are feeling it, for the slowdown in the mails is on in full force. Your mail comes in irregularly and late; your letters arrive at their destination after often devilish delays.

If you've a really important message to send, you dare not trust it to ordinary delivery via a 3-cent stamp. You take on the extra expense, send it special delivery or by telegraph or phone.

It would be laughable if it weren't so unintelligent; ridiculous if it weren't so infuriating.

Yet, Congressmen shrug their shoulders at the situation. They cluck sympathetically, turn their attention to other affairs while they wait for you to insist on action.

Post Office officials shrug their shoulders too. So far, their appropriation for this year is substantially under their spending needs—so they've chosen the easy way out of cutting the service to you and me, citizens and taxpayers.

This is not the answer. It is not sensible. It is not necessary either. The gap between Post Office income and outgo can be closed in much more intelligent, efficient ways.

And here's one answer Congress should approve at once under any circumstances. In brief:

The concealed airline subsidies—conservatively estimated by the Civil Aeronautics Board at up to $60,000,000 and probably above that—should be removed from the Post Office budget so that for the first time, the President, Congress, and the public can know definitely how much of our tax money is being spent on flying the mails and how much on subsidizing private airlines.

Today, the Post Office pays out about $1 for 60 cents of air-transportation service. The extra 40 cents should not be charged to the Post Office; it should be assigned to the CAB.

And if it were, the Post Office budget would be much closer to balance. The subsidy would be out in the open. An embarrassing, unhealthy subterfuge would be ended.

A bill to achieve this desirable reform of separating subsidies from air-mail pay has been introduced (H. R. 2908) and will come to a vote Thursday, July 20, before the full House Interstate Commerce Committee.

Just about every responsible, objective official and group is in favor of it. For instance:

President Truman, the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, the Postmaster General, Commerce Secretary Sawyer, labor and veterans' groups and the Big Four airlines—American, Eastern, TWA, and United.

Why then hasn't it been passed by now? Because it is being fought by airlines afraid revelation will endanger the subsidies.

John L. Sullivan, former Secretary of the Navy, has been hired by several of them to push another phony bill that would order "further study" of the situation and a report July 1951. That would mean no action until at least 1952.

Sullivan's law firm, Sullivan, Bernard, and Shea, is getting a fee of $30,000 for this. Believe it or not, he has a good chance of winning against virtually the entire Nation.

It's another painful example of what can happen when the high-paid lobbyists go to work for selfish interests. But these are facts.

Armed with them, you can demand—and then you'll get—action. And your mail service will be restored pronto.

Character Assassins Are Worse Than Thieves, Thugs, or Gangsters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1950

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, with the coming of the fall elections the question is, How can we make more citizens exercise their right to vote? In the last national election only a little more than one-half of the potential voters cast their ballots. In 1896 during the McKinley and Bryan contest, 83 percent of our citizens voted. Why are there not more voters participating in elections? The small number of the voters may be a sign of strength or confidence in the Government. The citizens may feel confident that the foundations of their social order are secure, and that no shattering fundamental issues are at stake. There is great danger, however, when only a bare majority of the voters participate in an election. Free government such as we enjoy demands a full expression by all of our citizens. Let us never forget the warning that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. The sacred Bill of Rights and the Constitution should be read and studied at regular intervals because there are so few people in the world who can enjoy the rights and freedoms which have been handed down to us as a heritage and which we must preserve for posterity.

Apathy and indifference can cost the people dearly. Many years ago the great labor leader, Samuel Gompers, stated in simple words the desire of the common people. He said:

> We want more school houses and less jails, more books and less arsenals, more learning and less vice, more constant work and less crime, more leisure and less greed, more justice and less revenge; in fact, more of the opportunities to cultivate our better natures, to make manhood more noble, womanhood more beautiful, and childhood more bright and happy.

This has been our program and it has had the support of the liberal and progressive Democratic Members of Congress, who are now being viciously attacked by the powerful reactionary big-money interests. Vicious lies and smears are being spread, and unlimited amounts of money are being spent to defeat liberal and progressive Members of Congress.

On May 5, in my radio broadcast, and also in my speech in Congress of the same date, I revealed how the Republicans and the reactionary tories were planning a campaign of smear, fear, hate, and suspicion. On June 1, 1950, this was admitted on the Senate floor with great shame by Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH, Republican of Maine. She was joined in a statement of repudiation by six other Republican Senators. These seven Republicans admitted publicly that they could not stomach the dirty, filthy, smeary character assassination campaign that their own Republican Party was engaged in.

We Democrats of Michigan have been attacked and subjected to these vile, ugly, filthy smear attacks for some time. Our press, with the exception of a few weekly labor publications, is all owned, controlled, and dominated by Republicans and big business associates. The one Polish language daily, Dziennik Polski, is a rabid, reactionary Republican sheet. Radio stations in the Detroit area likewise are owned and controlled by Republicans. Those of us Democrats who are sincerely liberal and progressive, and who are faithfully trying to carry out the provisions in the Democratic platform adopted at our great Democratic Convention, attended by delegates who were duly chosen and elected by the people—we are the ones particularly chosen for these spiteful and venomous attacks. My Polish friends will recall the full page advertisements, reeking with hate, filth, venom, and vituperation, which appeared in the Republican Dziennik Polski in previous elections. These pee wee Polish Peglers hate Roosevelt and the New Deal. They forget that the Democrats save them from bankruptcy.

In our district they have filed Republican carpet-baggers as candidates on the Democratic ticket. These political fakers are running as Democrats to cause confusion and dissension within the Democratic Party. These Republican carpet-baggers have the full support of the Republican newspapers, Republican radio commentator; and the Republican big-money interests. This is a Trojan-horse campaign. To beat progressive Democratic Congressmen, Republican stooges are being filed in the Democratic primary and then are glorified and publicized by the Republican press. I sincerely hope that the Democratic voters will not be fooled by these Republican Trojan-horse tactics. Why, a couple of the candidates do not even live in the first district, and they have the brazen gall and nerve to run from our district.

I do not mind fighting a campaign on the issues. I resent the smears and character vilifications that these carpet-baggers are engaged in. I serve notice now that I intend to sue them, and the publications engaged in this smear campaign, for slander and libel. I wish to remind them that some time ago my business associate, who was a candidate for the Detroit Common Council, won a $15,000 libel suit against the Dziennik Polski.

The voters of the First District have honored me by electing me to the State senate and then to the Congress of the United States for seven terms. During my 14 years of service, I have been faithful and loyal to my duties and to the trust and confidence placed in me. I realize that in politics a tough and thick hide is needed, and I am willing to take it and to give it. But character assassination as practiced in this campaign is another thing. These vilifiers are worse than thieves, thugs, or gangsters. When they steal your purse, they have stolen only money, but when they steal your good name and assassinate your character, they have stolen everything.

May I remind my friends that when Federal Judge Arthur Koscinski was up for appointment, the smear artists started to paint him Red and began to tear his character apart. Some supporters ran away, but I did not flinch. I stood loyally by and fought off the attackers. When United States Marshal Joseph L. Wisniewski was up for appointment, again the vicious character assassins went to work. Communist, Red and other charges were hurled at him. Again I stood firmly by the side of Joe Wisniewski; we proved the attacks false, and the confirmation went through. When several post-office employees, who were outstanding and fearless Democrats, were being attacked and smeared, I came to defend their good name and character. These charges were proven false and unfounded and provoked by jealousy and envy.

Some disgruntled Pennsylvania Republican politicans, headed by Republican Judge Blair F. Gunther, who helped to create the Slav organization and then lost control of it, desiring to discredit the organization brought a questionable character, a stool-pigeon, to testify before a congressional committee. Although he was headlined as an FBI agent, on checking with the Department I find that he was never an employee, never a part of the FBI, and never authorized to make any statement on behalf of the FBI.

I say that he is a questionable character, because he was charged with cruelty and nonsupport of his wife and children. This is all a part of the Pennsylvania court records. This witness admitted that he was instigated to make these smear statements by the unscrupulously ambitious Republican, Blair F. Gunther. The reactionary Republican machine of Pennsylvania paid off Guntner by giving him a judgeship.

This stool-pigeon, this Republican hireling, testified that he found 2,000 of my speeches in the headquarters of this organization. I had sent these speeches to a United States Army captain, in the paratroopers, who had 3 years of active and dangerous overseas duty. He had been awarded the Distinguished Service Cross and other military decorations, and is, as I understand it, 75 percent disabled. This speech was written in support of the program advocated last summer by the Quakers, the Friends Service Society, a thoroughly American and devoutly religious organization with headquarters in Philadelphia. The great William Penn established the Quaker colony in order to escape religious persecution in Europe. The Quaker program called for peace, trade, and commerce between all nations. They pointed out that hundreds of years of religious wars had decided nothing and that finally the different religions found that they could live in one world together.

It is nothing unusual for a Congressman to get requests for copies of his speeches, and 2,000 copies is not a large number for distribution. If these speeches were part of a propaganda campaign, then not 2,000, but 2,000,000 would hardly be enough. I have over 150,000 registered voters in my district alone and there are 435 congressional districts in the Nation.

I have challenged the press and my opponents to publish the text of the speech. This, of course, they will not do, because there is nothing wrong with the Quakers' program, and the Secretary of Commerce is at this moment proceeding with plans for a world-wide trade fair.

This is a slimy, snakey attack. They do not challenge the text of the speech. They wish to make political hay out of the fact that the speeches were seen in a Slav organization headquarters in Pittsburgh.

I had sent the speeches to a private citizen, a former United States Army captain. I did not send them to his club. Why have they made a mountain out of a molehill?

I have engaged an outstanding libel attorney to check thoroughly into the statements made by this Republican stoolpigeon and family deserter from Pittsburgh, and all references made to me in the Polish Republican paper in Pittsburgh, the Republican Saturday Evening Post, the Republican Dziennik Polski, and any other rabid Republican reptilian publications.

The voters of my district are intelligent, hard-working people. Time and again they have demonstrated their ability to think for themselves and their independence of the Republican smear artists. I believe that the voters are entitled to know something about the candidates. I invite all the candidates to reveal their family and political background.

My father and mother settled in Detroit, in the First Congressional District, 70 years ago. They were married at St. Josaphat's Catholic Church. The first four of the nine children were baptized there. The other five were baptized in St. Stanislaus' Church, of which parish my father was one of the pioneer members. My aunt and uncle were the first couple to be married at St. Stanislaus' Church. My father's place of business was located at Farnsworth and Dubois. He was an active worker and leader in the ninth ward Democratic organization 50 years ago.

I became active in Democratic politics before I was old enough to vote; that is, while I was attending law college at the University of Detroit. Together with a group of University of Detroit students we took an active part in the 1924 campaign. In 1928, during the Al Smith campaign, I ran for State senator on the Democratic ticket and came within 202 votes of being elected. In 1931, in a special election, I was elected Democratic State senator by a large majority. I was the first Democrat to sit in the Michigan State Senate in 16 years. As the lone Democrat I came out for old-age pensions, for repeal of prohibition, in opposition to Governor Brucker's anti-labor policies, the use of State police on gestapo raids, and so forth. I was one of the organizers and was elected first president of the Detroit Democratic Club, and I was also given the job of chairman of the committee on clubs and organizations by the Wayne County Democratic Committee headed by that highly esteemed and great Democrat, Roscoe Huston. This task called for a lot of hard work, campaigning every night, and the expenditure of much energy and money. We organized 75 Democratic clubs in Wayne County and set up the precinct-captain organization by congressional districts. Our First Congressional District became the leading Democratic district in the State, and has held that position ever since. I have been a Democratic delegate for 22 years, and active in all of the Democratic conventions. I have held the position of congressional chairman and have been a member of the Democratic State Central Committee.

My wife is a Detroit girl and was born in the First Congressional District. We belong to the St. Hyacinth's parish, at McDougall and Frederick, of which church Bishop Stephen S. Woznicki was the pastor until he was recently elevated to take charge of the Saginaw diocese.

In Washington we are also members of the Annunciation parish. My children have all attended parochial schools and then have gone on to attend Catholic high schools until graduation. My son serves mass as an altar boy, and my eldest daughter is secretary-treasurer of the parish Newman Club, and all of my daughters are active Sodality members.

I respectfully request that my opponents discontinue the smear tactics and discuss campaign issues.

The peculiar menace of this hour is the pressure toward extremes. It was the tactic of nazism and fascism first to destroy the middle ground—the moderate and the liberal—and then to claim that all must choose between the dictatorial left and authoritarian right. It is the tactic today of the Communists.

I am one who still believes that we do have choices other than a communistic collectivism or a cold "devil take the hindmost" individualism.

As a Democrat, I believe in the American way that has been built upon competition to excel, not to destroy; upon the free interplay of divergent ideas and opinions; upon the concept that the state serves the people, not the people the state, and that the individual has the right to protection against the tyrannies both of political power and of mob rule; upon the ideal that the integrity of the individual is not incompatible with the brotherhood of man.

We who take the middle road; we liberal and progressive minded Democrats must hold our ground firm. We have fought hard and gained much in social and economic justice for the people. We must preserve our hard-fought gains for posterity.

The great poet, James Russell Lowell, wrote:

They are slaves who fear to speak
For the fallen and the weak;
They are slaves who will not choose,
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be,
In the right with two or three.

We Democrats have a creed, we have a program that the American people, yes, all the people, can accept with enthusiasm and confidence. We liberal Democrats must never give up the fight, for to do so will mean a submission to tyranny, cruelty, deception, hate, and fear. We believe in a democracy based on the concept of the rule of law; we believe in a society in which every man has rights—inalienable rights—rights which are not based on race, creed, color, rank, or economic power, but on equality. We believe in dealing out justice among the citizens and preserving justice between the citizens and the state. Our concept of individual rights was our greatest weapon in the Revolutionary War. Today it is still our greatest weapon against communism and all forms of totalitarianism. Fascism, nazism, and communism all have tried to convince the people that our concern with individual human rights is false and fraudulent; but the people all over the world are beginning to realize that wherever the extreme left or the extreme right—wherever totalitarianism has come into power, that they, the people, are subjected to tyranny, torture, kidnapping, gas chambers, slavery, murder, midnight arrests, and judged by courts where the judges sit as prosecutors. We, the liberal Democrats, are waging the great fight for human rights as against tyranny in any form. We have faith and confidence that our cause is anchored on solid rock.

Let us not be silenced. There are entirely too many people who have been so frightened into silence that they are afraid to say anything for fear that they will be smeared.

It should be no secret that there is a great postwar offensive being waged by big business and finance to recapture their former dominant influence in government. The Buchanan Lobby Investigating Committee has revealed how millions of dollars are being spent by big-business interests to recapture control of the Government. The people must be on the alert.

The great Democrat, educator, and statesman, Senator FRANK GRAHAM, has expressed most beautifully our creed:

In spiritual faith and the American dream, America is being made safe for democracy without hate, and excellence without arrogance; where men become brothers in the sight of God and in the human heart; where the opportunities of the children in homes and schools are the chief concern of present progress and the chief hope of a nobler society; where enduring progress in human relations is made through religion, education, and voluntary cooperation in the minds and hearts of the people; and where the struggle for the fulfillment of our historic Americanism is the best answer to fascism and communism in the present global struggle against totalitarian tyranny for freedom and peace in the world.

In this America of our struggles and our hopes, the least of these our brethren has the freedom to struggle for freedom; where the answer to error is not terror, the respect for the past is not reaction, and the hope of the future is not revolution; where the integrity of simple people is beyond price and the daily toil of millions is above pomp and power; where the majority is without tyranny, the minority without fear, and all people have hope. This is America. God bless America.

I shall conclude by quoting from President Truman's message to Congress on August 8, 1950:

Throughout the world, communism is seeking to discredit our system of constitutional liberties. The Communists know that the leadership and good will which our Nation enjoys arise in great measure from the fact that men here have the blessings of liberty. Consequently, the propaganda of communism is devoted to a bitter and unceasing attempt to blacken and distort our national character and our way of life.

This propaganda is a formidable threat to the unity of the free nations in working for peace. The best answer to it is not words, but deeds. We must demonstrate that we are a country in which men can live together and advance together as a free society. This alone can prove the falseness of the Communist attack. It would be tragic in the highest degree if we were to frighten ourselves into destroying those very liberties which are the basis for our moral leadership in the struggle for peace.

I am determined that the United States shall be secure. I am equally determined that we shall keep our historic liberties.

Success in achieving both of these objectives is of exceptional importance in the present period of international tension. For by our actions we must maintain the United States as a strong, free people, confident in our liberties, and moving forward with other free peoples to oppose aggression and to build a just peace for all mankind.

Excerpts From Speeches on National Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, as long as it has been my honor to represent the Seventeenth Ohio District in the House of Representatives, I have endeavored to voice the opinions of the people on the floor of Congress.

To learn these views I have tried to keep in constant touch with my constituents through personal meetings held annually at the courthouses of each county in the district, through personal letters, and through annual questionnaires.

Under consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts of various speeches I have made in order that the people of the district may know my position on national issues.

If anyone desires to find these remarks in full, they are printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the dates indicated:

OUR DEFENSE

(December 5, 1947)

Mr. Speaker, my survey has shown to me that our defense program is at a very low ebb.

We must decide whether or not we are going to strengthen our own defenses, both military and economic, or give to other nations more and more American dollars. Our own defense and economic situation in this country is in such a weakened condition that it will take hundreds of millions of dollars to restore it to the level we maintained as of VJ-day.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that this money is being used to prevent the spread of communism. If such is the case, why do we find money and aid going to satellite nations of Russia and, yes, to Russia itself.

It has been charged and not denied that countries to which we are giving aid under the European recovery program have been shipping copper to Poland, which is under Russian control, and, yes, Mr. Speaker, shipping steel rails and locomotives direct to Russia. The records will show that we are furnishing to European nations materials which are critical in this country and which are badly needed for the establishment of our own defense program.

Our military position needs a tremendous expenditure in order to protect ourselves. I am asking you, are we going to continue a policy of weakening our economic structure and weakening our military position? I am of the firm conviction that it is time for us to give recognition to our own needs. Let us be fair with the American people—recognizing their need, recognizing the weakness of our own country—put our own house in order.

COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM

(May 5, 1949)

Mr. Speaker, this morning we are informed that recent investigations of the FBI reveal that 8,881 employees have been dismissed from the Federal service within the last few months as a result of loyalty investigations.

We all recall that President Truman and various candidates for Congress, including my opponent from the Seventeenth District of Ohio, ridiculed the congressional spy investigation as a "red herring" designed to divert attention from the record of the Eightieth Congress. Mr. Speaker, the facts now disclosed would lead me to say the "red herring" of 1948 has reddened faces in 1949.

In my opinion, the Communists in America are traitors, agents of a foreign power. Mr. Speaker, their aim is sedition, espionage, and treason and I believe a definite decision must be made by our Government at once and strong measures taken to protect our American way of life. It seems ridiculous to me to ask our American taxpayers to continue to pay high taxes in order to send money and materials to Europe to fight communism—approximately $28,000,000,000 sent since the closing of the war—and, at the same time, pamper and allow communism to spread here in our own country.

RUBBER-STAMP CONGRESS

(January 17, 1950)

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a newspaper article released by INS from which I quote:

"WANTS ONLY FAIR DEAL CONGRESSMAN

"President Truman made it clear today that he wants only Fair Deal Democrats in Congress.

"The Chief Executive indicated in strong terms at a Democratic Party gathering that a new purge is on to get rid of those who oppose his program."

This article makes it clear the President is going to purge anyone who opposes his program.

I have always opposed any program which, in my opinion, would lead us down the road to socialism and communism, and I definitely oppose the President's program of taking power from the people back home and placing it in the hands of Federal bureaus here in Washington. I am not in accord with the President's socialized-medicine program and I will continue to strenuously oppose unnecessary Federal expenditures and the philosophy of spend and spend—tax and tax. Because I believe as above stated, I will be one who will be on the "get rid of" list of the President. The Fair Deal candidate who will receive the support of the President will be one who agrees with the philosophy of statism and is in accord with the views of President Truman and his Fair Deal. This philosophy, in my opinion, is not in accord with the views and beliefs of the people, Democrats as well as Republicans, of the Seventeenth Ohio District.

Mr. Speaker, the President is to be congratulated for his outright statement which makes the issues of the coming election clearly defined, freedom and security against bureaucratic control and socialism, a challenge I shall gladly accept.

Mr. Speaker, elections will soon be here and the left-wingers and those who are friendly toward communism will support many candidates. The people should carefully analyze and scrutinize the various candidates to make certain they have not pledged themsleves to those who would attempt to destroy our form of government.

During the last campaign, Mr. Speaker, the President as well as some candidates for Congress attempted to tell the people that communism was but a "red herring." Events since that time certainly prove that communism is still a menace to our freedoms and should be considered as such. Let us remember those who attempted to belittle this threat.

GAG RULE

(October 4, 1949)

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution which is now before us for consideration, known as House Resolution 372 which certainly can be categoried as a gag rule. This resolution prevents any amendments being offered to the social security bill, known as H. R. 6000.

Mr. Speaker, this kind of action certainly is not a symbol of the freedoms for which many of us have fought. I have just finished conferences in my district and over 600 people came to the courthouses to express their views and many of them on the subject of social security, and may I say, Mr. Speaker, many of their suggestions merit the consideration of this Congress. Yet, under this rule I am not allowed in the form of amendments to submit their views as well as my own for the consideration of this body.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for the membership of this body to be willing to go on record so that the people that elect us will know how we stand on various issues. Then, after we are recorded either by "yes" or "no" vote, the people will have the opportunity to determine whether or not we express their views, and they will so tell us at the next election.

We should be honest enough to come out in the open and put ourselves on record in voting on legislation before us for our consideration. It is time for all of us to be willing to stand up and be counted so that the people can decide by our record whether or not they want us to represent them in this legislative body.

NONESSENTIAL EXPENDITURES

(January 27, 1950)

Mr. Speaker, no nation can spend itself into real prosperity. Prices are rising and the real value of saving, pensions, annuities, and insurance are shrinking and being cut almost in half. Taxes are enslaving the American people of their right to spend their own money. The average American family of four is paying approximately $31 a week in taxes—four times as much as just 10 years ago. If we are to continue and have a real prosperity, unnecessary Federal expenses must be immediately reduced and they can be reduced, Mr. Speaker.

SOCIAL SECURITY

(October 5, 1949)

Mr. Speaker, social security is a much-needed program as it provides financial independence for old folks no longer able to work. Properly administered, it would do just that.

The social-security objective is excellent—the plan for financing it is deceptive.

(August 14, 1950)

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to note this legislation, H. R. 6000—social-security bill—now exempts State and municipal pension plans as well as the school teachers' retirement system from the Federal social-security program. I have always opposed attempts to include existing pension plans in social-security legislation, and I am glad that this bill includes provisions making these groups exempt from coverage. The provisions of this bill will assure the school teachers of the State of Ohio that their retirement funds remain intact, and teachers cannot, in any way, be denied their rights under their own retirement system. This same applies to police and firemen, and other employees covered under the State and municipal plans.

LABOR AND BUSINESS

Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the combined welfare of labor, agriculture, little and big business, because I know that any legislation passed should be fair and just to all, and should also be in the interest of over 80,000,000 people, who cannot be classified either as employers or employees. I recognize that whatever legislation is passed by this Congress may not meet the full approval of management, nor of labor, but I think we all realize that we must compromise on certain issues and that we must do our best to pass, within the next few days, legislation that will encourage us all to work together in an effort to keep wages at a high level; agriculture at a high level; and business and production at a high level; so that we can have continuous prosperity in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am against any law that will give business too much power or control, and I also am against any legislation that will put into the hands of a few labor leaders the power to choke the Nation to its knees and slow down and endanger the welfare of our country. I am interested in legislation that will be beneficial to all the people and which will provide the same rights, privileges, and prerogatives, to both labor and management. If this type of legislation is passed, the right of the individual citizen and the collective interest of the public will be protected. I pledge my support to legislation that will bring this about.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

(February 9, 1950)

Mr. Speaker, the subject before us today, known as the Trade Agreement Extension Act of 1949—H. R. 1211—vitally affects all Americans, the farmer, the workingman, and the consumer. My candid opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that American-trade policies are too vital to the Nation's welfare to trust to the whims of one man, however well intentioned that one man may be. H. R. 1211, as it is now written, would give to the President of the United States the right to lower or raise tariff rates as he sees fit. In my opinion, the present bill will legislate, regulate, and finance the abolishment of hundreds of thousands of American workers' jobs. This legislation will allow products to be brought into this country from foreign nations where the living standards are much lower than ours in this country. Our farmers will also be forced to compete with the prices of farm products of foreign nations which certainly are at a lower level because of the foreign wage element involved. I firmly believe that this act should be amended so that the peril point will be protected.

We all believe in reciprocal trade, Mr. Chairman, but let us make sure it is reciprocal, taking into consideration the welfare and living standard of our own people.

KOREA

Mr. Speaker, we recall in 1916 an administration was elected to power because it promised to keep us out of war; in 1940 the same administration was returned to power, as we all recall, on a promise made "again, again, and again" that American boys would not have to fight and die on foreign soil; and now, today, for the third time we are engaged in a war and Congress has not declared it.

This time, Mr. Speaker, the ridiculuous charge has been made by some candidates for Congress and left-wing New Dealers in the Democratic Party that the Republicans are to be blamed for the Korean debacle, because we did not vote for aid to Korea early this year. Nothing could be more stupid or unfair. A school child should know that it would have been folly to give economic and meager military aid to Korea without backing it up with full military aid for the Far East, including Formosa.

At the time of the debate on this subject of aid for Korea it was testified by military leaders, as well as the heads of our Department of State, that we could not defend Korea should the Communists decide to invade.

I voted against the Korean aid bill, because it was proven to me beyond a doubt that it would be inadvisable to send economic aid and a token military aid to build up a rich prize for our enemies unless we were willing to make an all-out effort to defend it.

I do feel that those in our State Department responsible for a change in our Far East policy should not continue in control but be replaced by someone having definite knowledge of existing conditions and the importance of the program from an international viewpoint. And certainly that those in control of this program should not be friendly with those who associate with Communists. We cannot fight communism in the Far East and allow it to run rampant in our own country, yes, even in our own Federal departments.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the bill, now before the House, to reestablish the delivery of mail on the same basis that prevailed prior to the order of the Postmaster General, of April 18, 1950, which cut deliveries to one per day.

The bill is nothing more or less than an effort upon the part of the Congress to make effective the will of the people. Since the Postmaster General issued his order to curtail mail deliveries in residential districts to one per day, there has been constant complaint upon the part of the people who have been deprived of the former service. I have received many letters protesting against the change and demanding restoration of the service. Many of these letters have contained illustrations of the harm that has resulted in business matters and other important situations that called for earlier and more prompt service than is rendered under the changed conditions.

The reason given by the Postmaster General is the need for economy. There is no one who is a taxpayer who is not anxious for some evidence of economy by the present administration. It has been profligate, wasteful, and extravagant in all of its departments of government. But, when billions are being sent to nations all over the world it seems foolish economy to attempt to economize at the expense of our own people, especially when the amount saved amounts to only a few million dollars. The amount that it is alleged would be saved is so small in comparison with the billions being misspent in our own land, in addition to the billions for foreign aid, that it seems ridiculous to speak of this small amount as economizing. Certainly the people of our own country are entitled to something in return for the high taxes they pay to the Federal Government.

Furthermore, we must not overlook the fact that the Post Office Department is a service organization for the people of the Nation. It costs millions of dollars every year for the Post Office Department to carry on the service it renders to the several Government departments, bureaus, and agencies in the conduct of Government business. This is an important and necessary service, and it would not be justifiable to eliminate such service on the theory that it costs something. It is a service that is natural and to be expected in government. For the same reason delivery of mail to our people in the conduct of their daily affairs is a duty of government, and is a service that is paid for by the individual patrons of the Post Office Department. They are entitled to have adequate service in return for the postage rates they pay and for the taxes they also pay.

The order of the Postmaster General does not provide the kind of economy that the people want and the Nation needs. It is so small that it would make no appreciable difference. It would hardly be noticeable on the balance sheet of the Government. What this Nation needs is over-all economies that will run into billions of dollars and that would result in real savings to our taxpayers. The net result of the Postmaster General's order would be the distress it would bring to the many faithful postal workers who would lose employment, inconvenience to our people who depend upon adequate and speedy mail service, and without any genuine or real saving to the taxpayer.

Trans-Isthmian Canal Problem: Tehuantepec Ship-Tunnel and Ship-Railway Proposals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, during the perennial discussions of trans-Isthmian problems attention has been focussed on several historic route areas. One of these is Tehuantepec.

Among the schemes suggested for that location is a combination ship-tunnel and open canal at sea level, as proposed by Dr. William H. Hobbs, an eminent geologist, in the United States Naval Institute Proceedings, February 1950, volume 75, No. 2, page 129, entitled "The Problem of a New Trans-Isthmian Canal." This idea, just as was the Panama sea-level proposal, appears to be premised upon extreme interpretations of the needs of national defense rather than on the true criteria of canal capacity and operational facility.

Another idea frequently mentioned in promotional literature of Isthmian projects is that of a ship-railway at Tehuantepec. An instructive discussion of these proposals by the distinguished author Arthur Stanley Riggs, commander, United States Naval Reserve, retired, was published in the United States Naval Institute Proceedings, August 1950, volume 76, No. 8, page 911, which I now quote:

TRANS-ISTHMIAN CANAL PROBLEMS

[By Commander Arthur S. Riggs, USNR, retired]

I have read with no little interest the article entitled "The Problem of a New Trans-Isthmian Canal" by Dr. William H. Hobbs, in the February issue of Proceedings, and wish to congratulate you and Dr. Hobbs for what seems to me a lethal blow at both the Panama sea-level lock and the Nicaragua high-level, lake-type canals.

Since I am neither a geologist nor a civil engineer, it may be a work of supererogation for me to discuss Dr. Hobbs' position. I may, however, note that the present article is an elaboration of Dr. Hobbs' original thesis, published in the Proceedings (1948) of the ASCE. An even more irrelevant idea was presented in Washington January 14, 1949, before a large general audience in the auditorium of the Department of Commerce by the Mexican engineer Don Modesto C. Rolland, who subsequently published his findings and pictures. Señor Rolland, it may be remembered, was author of the trans-Isthmian railroad plan for dragging vessels across Tehuantepec—an idea evidently derived from the Eads suggestion of half a century ago.

The sole function of a canal is to transit vessels of all sizes and types safely, quickly, and economically between two points. It is perhaps not unreasonable to inquire if Dr. Hobbs ever navigated anything anywhere, or if he has first-hand experience with restricted channels and shoal water, whose dangers are perfectly familiar, especially in view of the elaborate series of tests precisely calculated and carried out over a long period at the Carderock naval testing basin. As a number of naval officers know by their own experience, there is constant evidence of vessels of all types and tonnages striking the walls of Gaillard Cut, due to failure of steering gear or propulsion, and subsurface conditions. It is obvious that similar eventualities must be considered in any such tunnel as that planned. The tunnel, moreover, is far more restricted in width than the cut, whose minimum width is 300 feet.

We may also properly remark that by his own statement Dr. Hobbs has not personally tested the homogeneity of the Tehuantepec rock formations. All rocks are not as solid as they seem to the eye. When New York City excavated its great subterranean aqueduct the engineers in charge, to get the homogeneity that could be depended upon, had to go to a depth of 1,114 feet below sea level at one point, in solid granite at that. And that tunnel is a picayune affair compared with a ship tunnel.

No adequate tests have as yet been made of the formations on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and my personal experience of that region makes me feel assured that no one can tell offhand, or even by analogic reasoning, what lack of homogeneity, what fractures, what faults and other features heavy blasting will develop. In all probability the chief discovery to be made should the Tehuantepec Canal be authorized—which discovery can be confidently predicted by even a mere sailor—will be a gold mine of limitless possibilities for the contractors. The titanic size of the tunnel guarantees that 250 to 300 feet from top to bottom instead of the inadequate 175 of Dr. Hobbs, and at least 150 feet at water level.

All we need in any trans-Isthmian canal is operational and navigational adequacy. We have the makings now. The simple and relatively inexpensive Terminal Lake plan for the existing Panama Canal is the point all the theorists refuse to see. It is still urgently needed for the solution of the pressing problem of Isthmian transit, and should not be obscured by irrelevant issues.

Postal Curtailment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. BUCKLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. BUCKLEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, having worked long and diligently on postal legislation during my term of membership in the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I wish to state I have doubled my efforts in behalf of the Morrison bill to rescind the April 17 curtailment order of the Postmaster General. For I believe this order has not only crippled our former excellent delivery service to the American public, but has worked hardship by virtue of unemployment in the postal service itself, has seriously affected business houses depending on mail for orders and fulfillment of orders, and has caused lowered morale and growing discontent among the taxpaying citizens of the United States with this manifestation of unwisely administered economy in government.

I was instrumental to a degree in aiding the completion of the necessary 218 signatures on discharge petition No. 31, in order to bring this matter before the Congress. I, myself, introduced a bill, H. R. 8226, to rescind the Postmaster General's order. Only today I received a telegram from branch 11, National Association of Letter Carriers, in Chicago, reading as follows:

Forty-six hundred Chicago letter carriers would highly appreciate your cooperation in supporting the Morrison bill, H. R. 8195, which comes up for consideration on Tuesday, August 15. Thanking you in advance for this courtesy, I am,

FRED O. ANDREWS,
President.

Again, quoting from a letter received by me from the National Association of Letter Carriers, signed by William C. Doherty, president, I set forth in brief the serious results of this order:

The need for a first-class postal system becomes more pressing with the approach of war. In one of the many letters we received from business firms relative to the slowdown in postal operations, a complaint was made about a tool part being delayed several days, causing a substantial loss in operation. This type of postal service, whether in the handling of first-class mail or parcel post, can and will cause the United States a great deal of harm in a period when the Nation should be producing the necessary materials to maintain our democratic way of life.

Drawing from complaints of citizenry, office routine in business houses is seriously upset. Mail comes in about 10 a. m.; much later than formerly. This often means the whole day's planning is thrown off, for much hinges on what is contained in the morning mail.

And to quote further from a newspaper excerpt written on this subject:

The postal service is one of the very oldest services our Government has furnished to its people. The public was conditioned to good postal service. So efficient was the service that the courts came to hold that proof of posting a letter in the mail was actually proof of delivery. Letter carriers are being told to do just a half-way job after being bred in the tradition of tiptop service. There may possibly be a slight economy insofar as the actual cost of running the Post Office Department is concerned, but from the public's standpoint there is no economy, considering hardships and actual money losses to business places and the inconveniences that affect everybody.

It is my understanding that England, where the standard of living is far below that of America, has its normal number of deliveries, and that Belgium serves its public with seven deliveries a day. And we lend or give Europe billions of dollars in order that it may meet the standards of and pattern after the American way of life.

Have we no thought for the American boys in Korea, in Germany, in any part of a lonely land, waiting for the letters from home, the letters that are racing with fate, the letters that will mean courage, hope, that will give them reason for fighting on? Can you see those grimy faces, eager, yearning? Can you see them turn away, tears streaking the grime, because of the letters that did not come? Some tomorrow—they hope. But why not today?

I ask you to picture this proud service—stumbling, today overburdened with yesterday's half-completed deliveries; the carriers, men such as you and I, eating lunch on the curbstone, their usual smiling faces as the good-will emissaries of family to family and neighbor to neighbor drawn with haggard and weary lines, wondering why their Government has relegated their services to the era of the pony express. So, my worthy colleagues, in this House, representing 48 States of the Union, where these men serve the vital needs of communication and the interweaving of the interests of a vast population of 150,000,000 people, made possible through their Government postal service, I urge that we, the Congress, restore to this fine old American institution its former high plane of efficiency and fine delivery program; and in so doing let us honor these men of the carrier service, about whom it has been said, "Neither snow nor rain nor heat nor gloom of night stay these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds."

Early History of Washington City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article by Mrs. Maud Proctor Callis, on the early history of Washington City. It was written in connection with the sesquicentennial celebration of the founding of the Capital City.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Daughters of the American Revolution Magazine, June 1950]

WASHINGTON CITY WAS BORN IN THE GOLDEN AGE OF PLANTATION LIFE

(By Maud Proctor Callis)

George Washington's selection of the location for the permanent seat of Government was approved by Congress, in session at Philadelphia, by acts passed in 1790 and 1791. By these acts Congress established the Territory (or District) of Columbia, on a site 10 miles square and containing 64,000 acres, which was ceded to the United States by Maryland and Virginia. The tract included Georgetown and Alexandria. The site was a beautiful, wide, undulating plain especially adapted to the purposes of a large city. The Indians had left the land about a century before when it was patented and farming by European settlers began.

Below Georgetown and within the District of Columbia a tract of about 6,000 acres, facing the Potomac River and extending to its eastern branch, was set aside for the Federal City. Two settlements were included: Carrollsburg and Hamburg. The Federal City was named "Washington." This waterway, the widest and most historic river in our Nation, winds its way from Allegheny mountain tops, passing through gentle rolling hills and fertile valleys of the Virginias and Maryland, for 383 miles to the Chesapeake Bay. When the District was created most of its roads were a little better than Indian trails, and as the Potomac was the main street of the area boat travel reigned supreme.

An excellent natural harbor within the District is formed by the Eastern Branch of the Potomac. At the head of navigation of this branch, not far beyond the District boundary, in those colonial days stood a thriving town, Bladensburg. Bladensburg as a port rivaled Alexandria and Georgetown. Many ships anchored there to exchange silks, satins, and velvets, and other imports for tobacco. Bladensburg was so prosperous that it became a center of luxurious living, and the gayest place in the area. People from miles around went there to celebrate, and to attend the horse races and cock fights. Often they attended plantation parties. The colonists made a fine art of these parties and delighted in dining, dancing, hunting, and hard riding.

Fine homes within the District were few indeed at the time, but many colonial mansions dotted the adjacent countryside. Washington City is quite close to the old homes of George Washington and of other immortal patriots, their plantations lining both sides of the Potomac. These planters worked and played, legislated and fought, and helped to establish the greatest Nation on earth. Many of their mansions have come down to us in a splendid state of preservation. Some have been equipped for present-day living and are occupied by a favored few who possess an abundance of historic appreciation. Some of these old houses have been extensively altered, some that were destroyed have been reconstructed in keeping with historic records, while others have "sprouted wings," and the rambling type has rambled on. These homes are show places and retain much evidence of plantation elegance. Some of them are: Stratford Hall, Mount Vernon, and Gunston Hall—well-known Virginia shrines; and in Maryland: Haber de Venture, Bostwick, Dower House, Belair, Montpelier Manor, Oxon Hill, Hayes Manor, and Falling Green.

The demand for tobacco in the middle 1700's became so great that fabulous prices were paid for it. This created a new era of luxurious living resulting in the replacement of many wooden houses. Brick mansions arose in many places. They were basically of Georgian architecture, each vying with the other in elegance and beauty. Each was distinctive in its individual features. Bricks were often manufactured on the premises. The antiquity of some old mansions can be authenticated by their oversize home-made bricks, and the distinctive color given to them by the native clay.

The usual eighteenth-century mansion was one-and-a-half or two-and-a-half stories high, with dormers and picturesque brick chimneys. Outbuildings, were workshops, servants' quarters, etc. The great house usually stood on a knoll overlooking a river and commanding a superb view. A wide center hall extended through the house with an entrance at each end. One door could be approached by the tree-shaded shell drive, and was for those who traveled by carriage, saddle horse, or foot. The main entrance faced the river for convenience of those who came by boat. It opened out on a wide rolling lawn amid ancient oaks, chestnuts, and other native trees. Boxwood hedges and formal gardens of roses and old-fashioned flowers adorned the lawn, which often extended to tidal marshes. A path led down to the wharf. When a ship arrived from the West Indies bringing molasses, sugarcane, and rum—and with news from the other colonies—that was an occasion; but, when an English vessel landed with Hepplewhite furniture and French carpets—and perhaps brought home the planter's son from his European tour—that was a great event, creating much excitement.

The pioneer planter had developed his plantation out of a dense woodland. He loved every good soul, animal, tree, and plant that was his. He read his Bible faithfully. His chief counsel was his faith in God and in himself, his friends, and his well-chosen books. He read the classics, and books on the subjects of agriculture, animal husbandry, the law, home remedies, and Poor Richard's Almanac. He was a shrewd trader who bargained well with his tobacco and grain for the goods he wanted.

This woodland squire was the lord of his plantation and an all-round expert. He improved his breeds of stock and varieties of fruit by careful selection. He produced meats, dairy products, wool, leather, and other commodities to supply the needs of his community. He watched with pride his stock beyond the ha-ha wall, his orchards, his corn and beans, and his great fields of green tobacco plants. While his undertaking was tremendous, his vast acres fairly breathed with fertility, order, and peace.

These plantation communities consisted of the planter's family, overseas and indentured servants, many slaves, and their children. As this outdoor life was conducive to healthy, happy children, the young folks kept fun alive. Life was smooth and unhurried, and Christianity was taught to all who dwelt within. The planter's family, as well as the plantation workers, attended divine services, usually in a sturdy little church nearby.

The owner was always ready to serve his country; he would attend the House of Burgesses; he would make a decision to settle a dispute, and he would diagnose an illness and personally compound herbs for its treatment.

While his life was exacting, the planter surely knew how to live. In this period when dress was important, he spent much time and thought, and the proceeds from his tobacco, bedecking himself and his family. Men, women and children wore imported fabrics made in the finest fashions. Their costumes were gay and of many colors. Men and women wore wigs, and face powder was generously applied.

The men wore knee-length coats with many bright buttons, fancy vests, lace frills and cuffs, knee breeches, silk stockings, and black pumps with squarish silver buckles.

Women's clothing was strikingly beautiful. Milady's wardrobe included formal dresses with the tight-fitted basque having elbow sleeves finished with flowing lace. The neckline was round, exposing the shoulders. The skirt was very full and swept the floor, showing only the toes of her high-heeled shoes. Black accessories were favored and included long fingerless mitts, and many little ribbon bows. Milady was so stunning in her broadcloth riding habit that she often wore it to pose for her portrait. This costume had the finger-tip length coat, lace jabot, long full skirt, and a large picture hat trimmed with several ostrich plumes.

Hospitality was ever present, especially when many parties were given in season at the various plantations. Sometimes an extra one was had * * * probably to exhibit an imported horse.

The plantation folk were in a flurry when an equipage with outriders, or a boat arrived. Then doors opened wide to receive the guests. The hall was lighted with innumerable candles, whose light was as mellow as the chimes of the grandfather's clock which so often stood near the foot of the classical stairway. The lights of the chandelier in the living room caused the satin costumes to glimmer, while the flames from the blazing logs in the fireplace reflected a glow on the mahogany furniture, the ornamental plaster on the walls, and the wide oak board floors.

Silver and crystal, port and sherry sparkled on the long dining room table. There would be luscious roasts, seafood, pheasants and quail, sweetpotatoes, and always good old corn bread and jam. Food appeared in abundance * * * and disappeared. To avoid cooking odors and overheating in summer, the kitchens were apart from the mansions. In the kitchens locally famous old colored cooks made food masterpieces which remain a mystery, for their art was passed on by word of mouth, and the secret was jealously guarded. At mealtime the latest news was told, and the merits of the most recent books circulating among plantation families were discussed.

Entertainment for guests included the singing of hymns and songs to a harpsichord accompaniment. Square dances and jigs were popular. The accomplished performers danced the minuet with grace and ease. The chase had become colorful hunting.

The serious-minded plantation owners retired to the library for a chat between puffs on their pipes, pinches of snuff, and sips of brandy. Then they discussed politics, tobacco, and horses. They discussed politics because the country was in its formation and they were careful to preserve their new-born freedom and ideals; they talked about tobacco because it was the main source of their income; and horse racing was their favorite sport.

Tobacco more than paid the plantation bills. As wealth was reckoned with this product, tobacco was always part of the thoughts and life of the planter. There has been little change in the Indian method for its cultivation. Then, as now, tobacco required the greatest amount of hand labor of the farm products. Labor was cheap and water transportation convenient. Conditions for its production in Maryland were ideal, and the tobaccos grown there possessed superior burning properties. Virginia tobacco has a special flavor. These products rank high among the tobaccos of the world, and this "old Indian weed" is still the money crop of those two States.

Many horses were of blooded stock and horseback riding early became the most favorite exercise of the planter's family. Riding led to racing, which became a most thrilling sport, so much so that it was enjoyed by the people of the countryside. Then horse stealing was punishable by death without benefit of clergy.

Professional horse racing in this country is said to have been born at nearby Belair. Belair plantation originally consisted of 3,000 acres, including the usual race course, deer park, and a kennel for hounds. The hounds were named and petted, and trained with great patience. Belair mansion was built by Benjamin Tasker for his daughter Ann, upon her marriage in 1741 to Gov. Samuel Ogle. First the Honorable Benjamin Tasker, and later Governor Ogle, procured thoroughbred horses from merry old England and raced them professionally. A few of these horses were unbeatable in their heyday, and many celebrated American race horses stem from Mr. Tasker's mare Selima, which he imported about 1750, and the Arabian stallion Othello. Today's Gallant Fox, winner of the Kentucky Derby and many other honors, is a Belair animal.

In this golden age of creative development and merited elegance Washington, the so-called city of magnificent distances, was born. Perhaps the Washington of today bears little resemblance to its founding era, yet the historian can find many remnants to direct our thoughts back a century and a half and more, to those great colonists—the planters.

Reorganizing Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter which appeared in the New York Times of August 6, 1950, dealing with the reorganization of Congress, written by Mr. Howard N. Mantel, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

REORGANIZING CONGRESS

BROOKLYN, August 1, 1950.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

As the second session of the Eighty-first Congress draws nearer to a close it is becoming increasingly evident that a thorough house cleaning of House and Senate procedures is needed. A great amount of important legislation is doomed to failure each session of Congress because of peculiarities of precedents and rules of both Houses. Particularly in need of revision is Senate rule XXII, sections 2 and 3, which permits cloture on debate only when 64 Members—a constitutional two-thirds—vote for it. As a direct result of this clause, the entire civil-rights program has been killed, even though a clear majority of the Senators favored it.

Another unfortunate situation is the seniority precedent, which virtualy dictates the choice of committee chairmen, and which has given committee chairs to Senators and Representatives who should not hold such positions. Coupled with this is the problem of pigeonholing vital legislation in committee.

To work out equitable solutions to these problems, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, and Congressman CHET HOLIFIELD, of California, have introduced identical resolutions in their respective Chambers to create a Joint Select Committee on the Organization of Congress. This committee would have the power to investigate and recommend changes in the relationships between the two Houses, the relationships of Congress with other branches of the Government, and to recommend, fundamentally, changes in "* * * the rules, parliamentary procedure, and practices of each House." As readers of the New York Times will recall, the famous La Follette-Monroney committee of the Seventy-ninth Congress was responsible for the enactment of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (Public Law 601), which did much to fortify congressional practices, but which, unfortunately, was limited in its scope and jurisdiction, and consequently is in serious need of revision.

The United States Congress must be capable of meeting the challenge of a world torn between strife and peace. It must be a legislative body that will stand out in the world as a democratic institution capable of meeting the needs of the people of the world. To do this the machinery of Congress should be strengthened and revised by enactment of practicable changes in the present system. With this in mind, I strongly urge prompt consideration of the Humphrey-Holifield resolution.

HOWARD N. MANTEL.

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a broadcast entitled "Happenings in Washington," which I made on August 14, 1950.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON, PROGRAM NO. 31

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital, and bringing you another discussion of happenings in Washington.

Since the invasion of South Korea brought us face to face with the grim realities of war, I have received a flood of letters and telegrams from all parts of Pennsylvania.

These messages from the folks back home have been most encouraging. They brought me renewed assurance that the people of our great Commonwealth are imbued, in full measure, with the spirit of patriotic Americanism.

Since I last talked with you the war has been brought closer to thousands of homes in Pennsylvania with the calling of the Twenty-Eighth Division into Federal service. Many more of our sons have been summoned by selective service.

As a former commanding general of the famous Twenty-Eighth Division, my heart goes with them wherever duty may call. It will be comforting to all of us to know that they will be led by a great soldier, my friend and comrade, Maj. Gen. Dan Strickler, who will always be concerned with their safety and welfare.

We pray that our boys may be spared the horrors of war. Humbly we implore Almighty God to take them under His divine protection.

Almost unanimously the letters and telegrams I have received expressed approval of President Truman's reversal of his administration's disastrous policy in the Far East.

The great majority agreed that we had been brought to a time of crisis under the influence of fuzzy-minded men in positions of importance in the State Department.

And many denounced in no uncertain terms the tendency on the part of the administration to play politics with the security of the Nation while American lives are being sacrificed on the front lines in Korea.

Yes, my fellow Pennsylvanians, that is the shocking, disgraceful course which must be abandoned if American fighting power is to be developed to its highest peak.

Nothing less than total mobilization of all our strength will save America. It must be done now. Tomorrow may be too late.

Yet, in matters of vital importance to the future of the United States and the world, pussyfooting continues in Washington.

And while we hesitate and delay the armed might of communism sweeps across Korea and prepares to strike another blow at freedom in another part of the world.

Every American must understand what tremendous sacrifice will be required if we are forced to defend ourselves and our allies on many fronts.

Can we wait until after the November elections to tell the people of America the real truth? Can we place votes first?

I regret to tell you that some of the maneuvering in Washington indicates a disposition on the part of the administration and its supporters in Congress to give priority to political considerations rather than the safety of the Nation.

Recently the Senate passed the general appropriation bill for 1951. Time after time during the consideration of this bill some of us in the Senate urged—yes demanded—deep cuts in domestic spending.

We wanted to eliminate or suspend all public works projects except those which the Secretary of Defense would certify as necessary to national security or those on which suspension would result in unnecessary loss.

Administration leaders fought this economy proposal and it was defeated.

We wanted to cut the public-works programs by 50 percent in order to save money for defense purposes.

Again the administration leaders rose in opposition and again we were defeated.

We then proposed a 15-percent cut in all nonmilitary appropriations except those for fixed charges. And once more we were defeated by administration opposition.

Then we fell back to a 10-percent cut in domestic spending and finally we were able to have that proposal adopted in the Senate.

If finally approved this will mean a saving of about $525,000,000, a small sum as measured by the billions we will need for defense.

It will come as a shock to many of my listeners to learn that during the debate the administration leaders made a most vigorous and successful fight against any cut in funds for the Marshall plan.

They argued that the 10-percent reduction should not be applied to European recovery money.

It was said that we must be careful not to destroy the morale of the people of those countries.

Now I have always favored helping the friendly nations of Europe to get back on their feet. But I cannot understand why billions of dollars, taken from the earnings of American workers, are needed for construction of projects far removed from the countries of western Europe.

Let me tell you about some of these projects that the administration considers so important and so sacred that they could not be cut 10 percent.

They include road building, soil conservation, and water developments in various African colonies of England, France, and Belgium. They include a soil-erosion project in Algeria, a road project in the Belgian Congo, a rice-cultivation project in Morocco, an irrigation project in Jamaica, and a land-reclamation project in South America.

These are only a few of the projects. There are many more on the list, all to be paid for by the American taxpayer.

Now I ask you—do any of these projects contribute one single thing to the defense of America or to the defense of any country of western Europe?

Do you think Congress should appropriate millions of dollars for these projects while Americans are being asked to pay higher taxes to provide arms and equipment for our heroic fighting men in Korea?

Do you think a cut of 10 percent in these appropriations would destroy the morale of our European friends?

Well, a majority in the Senate apparently thought so and the Marshall plan funds were excluded from the 10-percent cut.

Even with the 10-percent reduction we will still be spending more money for domestic programs than was appropriated by the Eightieth Congress during either of the years 1947 or 1948.

It has been argued that the increased spending since 1948 was due to bigger expenditures for military purposes. But when the figures are compared we find that many more billions of dollars were spent in recent years for the administration of departments not connected with national defense.

Here are a few examples:

The Department of the Interior in 1947 received an appropriation of $290,000,000. In 1950 the appropriation was increased to $646,000,000, or more than double the 1947 figure.

During the past 10 years the Department of Justice appropriation has doubled from $67,000,000 to almost $136,000,000.

The deficit of the Post Office Department has increased during the last 10 years from $30,000,000 to $550,000,000 for the fiscal year of 1950. And you know that the taxpayer is getting poorer postal service than he got 10 years ago.

Just one more example:

The appropriation for the Department of Commerce which was almost $148,000,000 in 1941 has jumped to $688,000,000, an increase of over 400 percent.

In the face of these figures can anyone doubt that millions and millions of dollars could be chopped out of these appropriations and used to build the defense of our country.

To my way of thinking the 10 percent slice approved by the Senate was only a token of what could and should be done.

Let me repeat, in part, what I said during the discussion of the appropriation bill on the Senate floor:

"When we ask the American people to make the sacrifices that are part of the price of war we must make sure that every expenditure by the Government not necessary for national defense is cut to the bare essentials.

"I contend, Mr. President, that in order to hold the line on the home front we must practice the most drastic economy in every Government function not directly connected with defense.

"Every cut we make in Government spending is a step for the preservation of our freedom."

"I submit, Mr. President, that we should attack this problem courageously. We must stand firm against the demands of the free spenders.

"In the face of the situation that confronts us and the sacred responsibilities that are ours, we cannot continue the present free-spending program on the domestic front.

"If we do, we will spell out in bold letters the final destruction of individual freedom in the United States.

"When we are through fighting this war, and the Stars and Stripes are carried to victory, we must be in such financial condition that our individual liberties will not have been destroyed."

In charting our future course we must be guided by developments which stand out clearly in the world picture.

1. Soviet Russia will not cooperate for peace.

2. Communist power is being concentrated for eventual warfare to gain world domination.

3. Aggression in Korea may be the opening battle of World War III, with the United States paying nearly all of the costs.

Now with this clear picture before us we must proceed at once with full-scale mobilization for victory.

We must enact laws now to protect our people against the rising cost of food and the other essentials of life.

We must enact legislation for sharply increased taxes in order to pay the costs of war out of current revenues as far as possible.

We must renew our fight for deeper cuts in all spending not connected with defense.

I had those things in mind when I addressed the Senate. In concluding my remarks I said:

"Can we, in voting on this bill, close our eyes to the changed conditions forced upon us and the world?

"Can we justify spending programs which would require the use of money, manpower, and materials vitally needed for defense purposes?

"Mr. President, brave men are dying on the front lines in Korea. In time of war there must be battle casualties.

"Here in this Chamber we must have the courage to face the political fire of those who continue their demands for legislation favoring their own pet projects.

"The situation confronting us calls for courage to stand and fight for the whole United States.

"If we must have political casualties in the battle to build the strength of our Republic and to preserve our freedom, then I say to you, my colleagues, we must be ready to make that sacrifice."

I say to you, my fellow Pennsylvanians, this is no time to play politics. It is a time for real Americanism.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Address of Brig. Eric Dorman O'Gowan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks I include in the RECORD the speech delivered by Brig. Eric Dorman O'Gowan before an audience in the city of Belfast, following his return from a triumphant visit to the United States.

Because of his 32 years of military service with the British Army and his keen insight into questions of military strategy, his address is of importance to all students of current world problems. Moreover, he speaks with the authority of a military statesman, the vision of a profound student.

Pointing out the division of Korea as similar to that of Ireland, Brigadier O'Gowan rightly urged a prompt and peaceful settlement of the Irish border question. He urges that settlement in the interest of strengthening the defenses of Europe, which are recognized to be not only weak at the present time, but totally inadequate. He forceably points out that strategically a united Ireland can be of vital and inestimable military value in the event of European warfare. On this, there can be no argument.

Ireland is of vital and critical importance in any realistic plan for the defense of the west. Americans should be greatly concerned over the unwarranted situation that exists there today because it could conceivably be disastrous to the defense of the west.

The division of Germany today is cause of concern in the European situation. The division of Korea has proved the pretext, if not the cause, of our present warfare in the Orient.

Before the division of Ireland can become the occasion of further concern or warfare in western Europe, we should avail ourselves of every possible means to eliminate that division which is so obnoxious to freemen everywhere. The great value of a united Ireland to the Western World is clearly set forth in the very able speech of Brigadier O'Gowan. I urge my colleagues to read it with consideration.

The speech is as follows:

ADDRESS BY BRIG. ERIC DORMAN O'GOWAN, BELFAST, JULY 17, 1950

Friends of Ireland, fellow Ulstermen, defenders of western Christendom, I am privileged to speak to you tonight, not because I am of any importance in Irish or in world affairs, but because I am an Ulsterman of the oldest native stock in whose family history meet many of the conflicts and stresses which have marked and molded the Ulster of our time. My great-great-grandfather wore the white cockade in the '45, his son was killed near Newry. My grandfather came shoeless from the Mourne Mountains and ended the possessor of a large estate in Cavan. My father was the last appointed high sherrif of Cavan; the last time we spoke together before he died, his view was that the border had gone on too long and he hoped I would help to get rid of it. I am what I am, my second brother retired from the Royal Navy as a captain, my youngest brother has been a minister of the Crown and Governor of Burma. Ours has been a family of mixed marriages, we produce all sorts, except bigots. Today we live in County Cavan, 70 years ago we had never lived elsewhere than in County Down. We were in Ulster before the Normans, we were before the plantations. If God is generous we will see the strangers either gone or Irish.

Let it be clear then that my country is Ireland; no man can have more than one country. The mistake of our minority in Ireland, what tears them into pieces, is their efforts to have two countries, Great Britain and Ireland. That cannot be done, it must be one or the other.

As an Irish citizen I wish to see Ireland independent and prosperous, taking her proper place in the great commonwealth of free Atlantic nations as one of the defenders of western Christendom. For Ireland to achieve that high duty she must, like all other effective nations, whatever their size, be united under one government controlling all the historical territory of the nation.

Unfortunately for Ireland, and I believe for the civilized world, the United Kingdom of Great Britain maintains possession of the six northern counties of the Irish isle, to the ultimate disadvantage of both nations, and to the detriment of the strategic security of the sister Atlantic nations, especially of the United States, Canada, and France.

The administrative arguments against the division of Ireland between two administrations are insuperable. Were it not for an act of resentment on the United Kingdom's part, no one would have dreamed of administering the island in two sections, one part through a British Governor in Belfast responsible to the British Government, for the remainder, through a sovereign independent State. No more reasonable are the economic effects of partition Could anything be better designed to cripple a Nation than to separate industries from the major agricultural area, and then to impede or to ban the free passage of labor and commodities between one section and the other. This crime against the unity and well-being of the Korean Nation has already provided the excuse for open war. No nation will submit to partition permanently.

I am satisfied historically that partition was imposed on Ireland in the strategic and economic interests of the United Kingdom as well as in annoyance at Ireland's demand for independence. The result has been wholly bad, especially since in the part of Ulster retained by the United Kingdom it has not proved possible to establish true democratic institutions because of the abiding resistance to British rule, maintained in the face of all attempts at suppression, by the pro-Ireland element in the population of Northern Ireland separated against its will from the people of free Ireland. This undemocratic state of affairs creates profound frictions between the Governments of the United Kingdom and of Ireland respectively. As a result a unified defense system for the island is impossible, since there can be no agreement as to the senior partner, in consequence Ireland is precluded from taking her proper place in the defensive organization of the Atlantic Commonwealth under the Atlantic Pact. Thereby partition threatens peace, for a virtually defenseless Ireland is a standing menace to the security of the Atlantic community in the event of war.

It is useless for spokesmen of the United Kingdom to urge Ireland to cooperate while she remains divided. Any Irish government which complied would fall overnight for much the same reasons that the Government of the United Kingdom found it impossible to take part in the Schuman plan without compromising the British Nation's economic sovereignty.

It is my contention that the presence of British rule in Northern Ireland is a denial of democracy and a threat to world peace, different in kind but not in effect from the partition of Korea.

In the light of these arguments, I consider it supremely unwise for the Government of the United Kingdom to have permitted their chief of the local government in Northern Ireland, the leader of the anti-Ireland and pro-British minority in Ireland, Sir Basil Brooke, to undertake a propaganda tour in the United States of America and in Canada.

Indeed, it is difficult to see what good purpose Sir Basil Brooke's tour was intended to serve, particularly when the Government of the United Kingdom had, by the Ireland Act of 1949, placed in the hands of the minority of which Sir Basil Brooke is chief, the absolute right to decide how long Ireland should remain divided. Thereafter not even the Parliament of the United Kingdom could take the initiative in restoring the six counties to Irish government. In so apparently impregnable a position, what need was there that the Unionist chief in Northern Ireland should expose himself and the United Kingdom to criticism in the United States of America?

The Unionist chief's tour was prepared with the greatest care. All the, not inconsiderable, resources of the United Kingdom Foreign Service in the United States of America, a powerful and ubiquitous body of highly skilled propagandists, was at his disposal, despite the fact that his status as Premier of a nebulous subgovernment of the United Kingdom was outside the normal protocol. The tour was lavishly supplied by public funds raised from the Province. The United Kingdom Government allocated invaluable dollars. His retinue was to include a police and a publicity official, a senior civil-servant stood at his elbow on all occasions. The Government of the United States of America was invited to cooperate on the highest levels.

Shortly before the tour began, it seemed to me that, since the leader of the anti-Ireland Ulster Unionists was, by going to the United States of America, appealing to Caesar, in the form of American democracy, it might not be inappropriate for a pro-Ireland non-Unionist, non-Tory Ulsterman, particularly one who had served the British Crown, to be in the United States of America at the same time as Sir Basil Brooke in a position, as an independent person, to speak for an undivided Ireland.

My departure was not publicized; there was no previously arranged program. I was about as well equipped for the job as was David going out against Goliath. But like David the weapons on which I relied were novel. (a) A modern outlook on Ireland and her strategical and economic relationship with the United States of America and Europe. (b) Photostatic copies of the Northern Ireland Special Powers Act. "Goliath" Brooke's weapons were the British Empire, lots of brass and protocol. I traveled reliably by TWA (American); Goliath flew British. It might have been more tactful had he, too, flown American, but that would have entailed a halt at Shannon in Free Ireland.

On my arrival, a day before he reached the States, I was met by the full battery of the New York press, plus television, a car from the mayor's office, and kindness from everyone.

Goliath (tell it not in Gath) was met by Judge Troy's minute men, a disciplined body of American citizens who strongly disapproved of the presence of the United Kingdom in Ireland. It says much for their discipline and keenness that they defeated both the efforts of the authorities to keep the expected time of arrival secret as well as the uncertainty of his aircraft.

A word about Judge Troy's minute men and women. I made a point of following their activities closely while I was in New York. Sir Basil Brooke affects to have discovered two species of American—the decent American and presumably the indecent American. The criterion of the decent American, which by definition, excludes Colonel McCormick and the mayor of New York, is belief in the divine mission of the British Empire and the British way of life, particularly in Ireland. Indecent Americans, include all of Irish origin, which brackets, presumably include Major General Dean, now in ground command in Korea. All minute men and women are by Sir Basil's standard, not decent Americans. The facts are very different; few democratic Americans when made aware of the true situation in northern Ireland were found to approve. I placed the Special Powers Act in the hands of several judges whom I met at receptions, etc., and I was amazed at the instant horrified repudiation of that instrument as being un-American in the extreme. On the night when Sir Basil Brooke spoke to a carefully hand-picked Anglo-American group in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel upward of a thousand picketers paraded around the hotel for 2 hours on a cold evening bearing appropriate slogans. They were well-dressed, mostly middle-aged, orderly American citizens who knew well what they were doing and against what they were protesting. They were striking a blow for democracy as they knew it.

I will not bore you with a record of Sir Basil Brooke's travels. President Truman he did not see. All America heard that one of his forebears burnt the White House. That joke recoiled. Chicago heard it said that, at a reception there, he told his neighbors the funny story of the two soldiers, one of whom asked the other if he knew the difference between the King of England and the President of the United States. The difference apparently lay in the fact that the King of England had a father—decent Americans were not amused. His press conferences were not always easy, the Special Powers Act hung round his neck much as the Albatross hung about the ancient mariner's. I caught up with this Goliath in Chicago, because the mayor received Sir Basil Brooke, so the enraged Irish insisted that their man, myself, be received, too. I felt sorry for the mayor by the time he was through with Ulster free and unfree

But in terms of publicity and news space, the League for an Undivided Ireland killed Goliath dead in Chicago.

The West Coast challenged him to visit. He declined. I went instead. His non-appearance there was not unnoticed by decent Americans.

Early in his tour he began to fade out as news. The fact was that beyond saying how nice it was to be British, he said little the press could bite on.

I, on the other hand had good and interesting press conferences. Everywhere press men were anxious to get the hand of the strategic aspect of partition and the way United States security was compromised by it. Sir Basil Brooke, by the way, stressed that if the United States of America was at war Ulster would be at war, he forgot to point out, but I did it for him, that as part of the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland had no say in either peace or war. The British Parliament decides that one. He avoided saying whether in the event of war Northern Ireland would have conscription.

The press was also interested in the special powers act. So also were Congressmen, even those not normally affected by Irish affairs.

I spoke at New York, Pittsburgh, Washington, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Chicago, Providence, Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles. I flew well over 20,000 miles—the Atlantic both ways. It was a strenuous tour minus those aids to relaxation provided for Goliath by the taxpayers both pro and anti Ireland of Northern Ireland.

I did not go to Canada, there was no need—the Government of Canada had already summed up Goliath or what was left of him.

Had he been concerned solely with the affairs of his party as a minority group in Ireland he would have been legitimately engaged in a way Irishmen understand, but it is necessary to stress the point that Sir Basil was not speaking solely in the interests of his minority group but was upholding the right of the British Government to rule in Northern Ireland.

I maintain that no loyal Irishman should discuss with any minority representative the matter of Ireland's unity and integrity. That is an issue between Irish and British, but Brooke spoke as a Briton and was treated therefore as a British representation. He cannot have it both ways For example, Lady Brooke is reported to have said at a women's meeting in New York that she wished that there could be a canal dug around the six counties and the sea let in to make an island of Northern Ireland. * * * Such people cannot call themselves Irish, in Ireland they serve Britain alone, Ireland never.

The important task for us was to use Brooke's tour as a lever for reopening the Hiberno-United Kingdom issue, so as to fortify the freshly revived American-Irish organizations everywhere. These are formidable allies grouped under the general control of the American League for an Undivided Ireland. This redoubtable body operates not purely in the interests of seeing justice done in Ireland on the general American principles, but also in the general interest of American security, strategical and financial. I must repeat that its outlook is not Irish but American. Among other activities it operates a lobby in the American Congress which serves to counteract the very powerful British influences in the State Department and the Pentagon. The league's effect was strongly demonstrated in the Fogarty resolution on Marshall aid to Great Britain, action which is now leading to the consideration by Congress of a wider-based resolution approving the unification of Ireland under an Irish Government and the cessation of United Kingdom interference in Irish affairs.

It may be interesting to note that the address I made to the Overseas Writers' Club on my arrival in Washington has been placed on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as being of national importance to the conduct of affairs in the United States of America. That was a very great compliment to Ireland. It was also valuable for that address emphasized the strategic weakness of a partitioned Ireland.

It will thereafter be seen that I did not go to the States in a negative attitude, to contradict a man whose sole status in a united Ireland would be the leader of a pro-British minority, but to use the publicity so generously provided by the British Government as a means of presenting Ireland's case against the United Kingdom, and Ireland's position in the Atlantic community to an audience wider than is normally reached by Irish speakers visiting the States. I was also able to develop the important but secondary issue, that of the misgovernment which is inevitable under the present regime in Northern Ireland

Decent people in the United States of America have no longer any excuse for not knowing of the special powers act, of unionist gerrymandering, of the immense and wholly disproportionate political police force, which is in fact the pro-British element's private army paid out of public funds. They heard of political discrimination, of the avowed intention to liquidate awkward political majorities.

A secondary object of Brooke's tour was avowedly to attract American industry to the six counties. Several interested Americans did comment on the risks attendant on opening up in so unsettled a political situation, which they felt quite outweighed the advantage of governmental access and special privilege curiously proffered by Brooke. They also wondered whether it would not be wise to consult the Government of Ireland proper before investing in the United Kingdom zone of Ireland.

One last line of British propaganda needs mention. It was suggested that there was some analogy between the border between Canada and the United States of America and the border in Ulster. Brooke is weak on history. Canada and the United States were at no time one country under one administration. If within the last 25 years this had been the case and Canada had been torn out of a greater United States of America by a foreign power, leaving North America partitioned and weakened, would not the people of the United States of America have by now gone to war to regain what was rightly their own? There is no doubt whatever that they would, just as they went to war to preserve the Union from the partition policy of the seceding States. Americans know well that the act of Union, which deprived Ireland of its parliament, was enacted to prevent Ireland going the republican way of the United States of America and France. They also know that in Northern Ireland we see the final stage of that iniquitous act.

Paul M. Herzog

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three editorials paying tribute to the high public service of Mr. Paul M. Herzog as Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, and commending him for his willingness to continue to give of his wisdom and experience in these troubled times.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of July 31, 1950]

MR. HERZOG STAYS ON

President Truman paid an unusual tribute to Paul M. Herzog in appointing him to another term as Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

The President revealed in a letter that he had twice drafted Mr. Herzog to stay on the job over the Chairman's insistence that he should return to private life. Mr. Herzog has been anxious to leave the Government for personal reasons.

It was the kind of letter a President usually reserves only for a departing public servant in reluctantly accepting his resignation. The President referred to Mr. Herzog's exceptional qualifications for his job, and concluded by saying he had no recourse in these troubled times except to ask the Labor Board Chairman "to continue to give your Government the benefit of your wisdom and long experience."

Mr. Herzog, who is 43, came to the NLRB 5 years ago after service first as a member, then as chairman, of the New York State Labor Relations Board. He has served the NLRB during one of the most difficult periods of its 15-year existence. Three years ago, the Board, which had been administering the prolabor Wagner Act, was called upon to administer and interpret the more evenly balanced Taft-Hartley Act.

The transition was not an easy one to make. And Mr. Herzog seems to have accomplished it with a minimum of valid criticism from either labor or management.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of August 1, 1950]

NEEDED WHERE HE IS?

The President has nominated Paul M. Herzog for a second full term as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board and has persuaded him, if confirmed, to forego his intention to return to private life.

The job, in many ways, is a thankless one. And the post is often a hot spot—particularly of late. As a result of the unfortunate attack on the board by its general counsel, Robert L. Denham, and the later fight in Congress over whether the NLRB and its counsel should continue independent of each other, Mr. Herzog was drawn into a maelstrom of controversy.

The vigor with which employer groups backed Mr. Denham thrust upon Mr. Herzog the appearance of being prolabor—a role which would hardly serve the interests of good labor-management relations at any time. Mr. Herzog, as we understand him, is not prolabor. He does, however, understand labor and gives a receptive hearing to its side of a case.

In view of labor's solid conviction that Mr. Denham represents management's interests in the dual set-up, it is all the more important to retain Mr. Herzog's judicial temperament and long experience to help hold the balance.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of July 26, 1950]

TALENT AND EXPERIENCE THAT CANNOT BE SPARED

Capable public servants are hard to get and easy to lose. President Truman, who knows that story all too well, is unwilling to let Paul M. Herzog leave the National Labor Relations Board. He has been Chairman since 1945. He wanted to resign in August, but Truman has nominated him for another 5-year term.

Herzog is that rarest of individuals—a genuine expert on labor relations who has maintained a degree of impartiality. His fairness is his greatest asset. Next comes his experience, which is remarkable for a man who will be only 44 next month. He has been in public service almost constantly since 1933. He has ridden the crest of the swift-running tide of labor legislation that has swept America in the past two decades.

He began as assistant secretary of the old National Labor Board, by appointment of Senator Wagner, in 1933. In 1937 he joined the New York State Labor Relations Board on its formation. There he served as chairman under both Democratic Governor Lehman and Republican Governor Dewey. He left the board only to go into the Navy in World War II. Governor Dewey paid him this tribute on his resignation: "Under your leadership the State Labor Relations Board has impartially, without fear or favor, built a great record in solving the problems of employers and employees. The board has served as a model of good administration."

President Truman appointed Herzog chairman of the National Labor Relations Board under the old Wagner Act of 1945, and reappointed him under the Taft-Hartley law in 1947. The second appointment was a bold gesture of confidence. Herzog had opposed the passage of the Taft-Hartley law and urged the President to veto it. Yet Truman felt so sure of the Board chairman's fairness that he sent him back to continue his job under the new law when it passed over the President's veto.

Thus, the Federal Government has kept the services of a man whose experience is not equaled in his new, vital, and complicated field. The trials of such a job require a Hercules for strength and a Job for patience. Through it all, Paul Herzog has kept his hair, his sense of humor, and his addiction to pipe smoking.

His persistently youthful appearance conceals a mature philosophy. "Labor and management had to adjust themselves to more new rules since 1932 than during the entire preceding century," he observes. "Is it any wonder that Government, labor, and industry—all three of them—have deviated at times from the ideal course, or that irritation and confusion have occasionally been the order of the day?" His conclusion is that "such aberrations are part of the price a democratic nation should gladly pay for the right to experiment with its institutions."

German Steel Scrap to Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. KINGSLAND MACY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent United Press news release, the headline of which reads "Germans selling scrap to Reds, United States dealers charge." It will be recalled how insistent I have been over the past few years with respect to bringing back steel scrap from the German Ruhr to the United States. It was only on June 12 that I said on the floor of the House:

I have never been able to understand the wisdom of leaving in western Germany a huge stockpile of just the kind of steel scrap we particularly need. Common sense should have dictated a greater use of homecoming empty bottoms resulting from carrying relief to western Europe for transferring this stock pile from a highly exposed position to a more protected and much more advantageously useful one in the United States of America.

Now, in the papers of yesterday a United Press despatch reveals certain facts which make it evident that my fears were not ill-grounded. I quote the dispatch, as follows:

FRANKFURT, August 15.—Angry American steel-scrap dealers accused West German Government officials and industrialists today of sabotaging the United States rearmament program by slashing exports to America so they can sell more to Russian satellite countries.

The Americans said the action was outright sabotage and will add millions of dollars to the present price tag on United States rearmament expenditures.

The scrap dealers cabled a protest to high officials in Washington over the signature of D. J. Lewis, secretary of the Scrap Iron & Steel Import Corp., New York, largest United States dealer in scrap.

"Soviet satellite countries," the protest said, "are obtaining the major part of the available scrap supply." It said United States efforts to buy scrap were hamstrung by newly imposed West German Government restrictions.

The protest was cabled to Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, Under Secretary W. Stuart Symington, Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer, Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and Senator Millard Tydings, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

The scrap dealers said they protested to United States High Commissioner for Germany John J. McCloy but that he said the restrictions were purely a German affair.

The basis for their complaint was the cancellation by the West German Government of a license for shipment to the United States of 325,000 tons of first quality, heavy melting steel. The cancellation was made after the former Allied Joint Export-Import Agency turned its operations over to the West German Government.

American buyers then were given a license for 150,000,000 tons of steel scrap, but on August 1 Germany announced a sharp restriction of scrap export and advised contractors that only 50 percent of the reduced shipments could be high-grade melting scrap.

The remainder, under the German restrictions, would have to be inferior grades. The dealers said the inferior grades would be useless to American mills and too expensive to ship.

Meanwhile, the dealers charged, 220,000 tons of high-grade scrap have been moved to iron curtain countries under trade agreements the West German Government continues to honor.

The scrap dealers said curtailment of German shipments will skyrocket American domestic scrap prices from its present price of just over $40 a ton to $50 or $60. They said the cost of the present $23,000,000,000 American rearmament program will soar proportionately.

Experts estimate that Germany has about 10,000,000 tons of steel scrap in reserve.

The Administration's Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including a timely and pertinent editorial from the San Francisco Examiner. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

THE ADMINISTRATION'S DUTY

President Truman is asking Congress to provide $10,486,976,000 in new military funds, and to meet part of the requisition by levying $5,000,000,000 in new or increased taxes.

The President wants the $10,000,000,000 because, as the little war in Korea suddenly demonstrated, our national defense is inadequate, although we have expended in 4 years of peace $50,000,000,000 for military purposes.

Our unreadiness to meet promptly a so-called police action in an area as limited as South Korea indicates that the administration has made no wise use of the immense funds it has already had.

So the administration wants more money to do what it should have done before.

And, of course, Congress will assign the funds, if no better way can be found.

But there is a better way—or, at least, one that should have priority.

For how has it happened that the administration now calls for war taxes to meet its military needs?

Actually, we have continued on a war-tax basis all during the peace—or cold-war—period.

The excise war taxes have never been repealed or reduced.

The personal income and corporation taxes have remained at high levels.

Payroll taxes still flow into the Treasury.

Consequently, new war taxes must be added to the war taxes already in effect, which have been retained ever since the last war ceased.

This happens partly because of the New Deal's gross mismanagement of defense expenditures.

It happens more largely because of the New Deal's extravagant expenditures for nonmilitary purposes.

Obviously—and in view of the administration's current deficit—the primary defense need is to eliminate all unnecessary expenditures and put to defense uses the sums retrieved.

If this be done, no tax increase would be justifiable at this time, since the administration would have in hand the $5,000,000,000 which it seeks in new taxes.

If the job were well done, the administration might have even the whole $10,000,000,000 desired for military requirements—and perhaps enough besides to balance the budget.

Until the administration is willing to make some political sacrifices for national security, its demands for sacrifices by the public are made with very ill grace.

From the Korean Fighting Front

OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to present for the information of the Congress a letter I have today received from one of the young men in my district, now with the fighting forces in Korea. The writer is Staff Sgt. George W. Spreng, whose parents, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Spreng live in Moorestown, N. J. Sergeant Spreng spent about a year in Korea with the Korean military advisory group prior to the North Korean invasion of the South and wrote to me at intervals to describe the work of our advisory group there. In all of his correspondence, Sergeant Spreng has praised most highly the Korean soldier and the civilian citizens of South Korea; they have won his respect and admiration for their courage and their perseverance under difficulty. I call the attention of the Members particularly to the section of Sergeant Spreng's letter which praises the Korean soldiers in battle—this refutes most effectively the Communist-inspired reports that the South Korean soldiers do not want to fight. Sergeant Spreng's letter follows:

UISONG, August 7, 1950.

HONORABLE SIR: I received your most welcome letter. I am serving now on detached service from Corps of Engineers with the Second Korean Corps; I have been given this assignment because there is a shortage of engineering officers. I have applied to have the commission which I held during the last war renewed, as I have found on occasion that lack of rank is a handicap when dealing with the Korean soldiers.

Things still look dark, but I'm very optimistic about the favorable outcome of the situation. To me it is a question of having the men and equipment to exploit a breakthrough. The North Koreans are getting ready for a knock-out punch, but I feel sure we can hold them. We are not yet ready to make a similar attempt from our side.

Psychologically our American units were unprepared for war when first committed. They are getting a little hardened now and are making a better showing than at first. The South Korean soldiers are doing a fine job; we are proud of what they have been able to do with the equipment they've had to do it with. American soldiers and the American people should be told about how the Korean soldier is fighting.

From what I've observed of our American fighting units sent here from Japan, most were under strength and not fully equipped, which is not unusual with an occupation mission, and a shortage of funds for equipment. However, I believe the Korean situation proves that all American units retained on active duty even in peacetime should be at full strength, fully equipped and undergoing all types of climatic training; then we will be ready with troops for any emergency, any place, any time.

Right now I'm sweating it out, trying to get some demolitions. I've used up all demolitions in my two infantry divisions, plus that of my rescue corps in our latest retrograde movement. Our supporting depot is all out, too, so we are trying to get some on hand to replace our depleted stock. We are using anti-tank and anti-personnel mines quite extensively to try to slow up North Korean armor and infantry.

I hope you receive this in good time. I am hurrying to catch the mail courier who is going to the rear. I will keep you advised about the fighting and our progress.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. SPENCE.

Importance of Stockpiling Minerals and Metals Finally Recognized

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post of August 12, 1950, Marquis Childs in a column entitled "Lagging Stockpile" says that—

One of the things that almost no one in Washington talks about—publicly—is the status of stockpiles of strategic materials.

Apparently Mr. Childs has not been following the record, because my committee has been talking about the situation of our stockpile for many months. At present there are three bills to aid the production of critical and strategic minerals and metals bogged down in the Rules Committee. On two occasions during this Congress, we had measures on the floor for consideration and in both instances those measures were defeated. During the discussion of those bills, the situation of our strategic stockpile was clearly and bluntly explained to the House and to the Nation. In addition, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] as chairman of the Armed Forces Subcommittee dealing with the stockpile of critical and strategic minerals and metals has held numerous hearings and made many statements on the floor in regard to shortages in the stockpile. Last week when the Defense Production Act of 1950 was before the House, the matter of the stockpile was discussed and I secured an amendment to that bill which would aid in the exploration, development and mining of critical and strategic minerals and metals. However, Mr. Child's article is very timely and I am glad that he has called attention again to this vitally important matter. His column on the subject is as follows:

LAGGING STOCKPILE—FOOT DRAGGING OVER MANGANESE

(By Marquis Childs)

One of the things that almost no one in Washington talks about—publicly—is the status of stockpile of strategic materials. This is a grisly kind of secret because nobody wants to expose the deficiencies to public view.

On vital materials such as aluminum, copper, manganese, tin and rubber, the totals give no comfort at all. In some instances they are truly frightening. It is very much like the story of the early years of World War II when raw material deficiencies caused such harrowing concern as Nazi submarines sank American cargo ships almost at will.

In view of this, it is astonishing to discover a behind-the-scenes dispute in which the same old forces seem to be dragging anchor. The dispute is over manganese, one of the scarcest metals and one that is absolutely essential. It is the "cement" that must go into every bit of steel that is made.

The only country in the world with large known deposits of high-grade manganese is Soviet Russia. In the past a considerable share of our imports has come from Russia. But in the past 2 years this has been reduced to a trickle.

That has made it imperative to develop new sources of supply. A group of engineer promoters came to Washington to urge development of manganese deposits their company had staked out in New Mexico. They were not asking for Government loans or aid. But they did want a contract from the Government agreeing in advance to buy the ore they produced at a sufficient price.

Because the New Mexican deposits are not so rich as the ore imported from Russia, the processing cost is naturally higher. The independent company proposed to install a processing furnace—these are in surplus left over from World War II—at Deming, N. Mex., to do the job.

It would seem to have been a natural in view of the acute shortage of a metal that is in reality more precious than the gold hoarded in Fort Knox. But, just as in World War II, the company's representatives in Washington found officials either strangely reluctant or, in some instances, deliberately obstructive.

They became convinced that this was due to the influence of the world steel cartel which has long dominated the manganese picture. The United States Steel Corp. had pushed the development of a manganese project in the Gold Coast of Africa. This was a high producer. But in the first months of World War II only 5 out of 100 shipments escaped German subs, according to one report.

The mysterious dragging of feet continued. The Bureau of Mines lost a report on the extent of the manganese deposits in the Southwest. Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer was urging development of manganese in Brazil. Jess Larson, Administrator of the key General Services Administration, and his aides talked the excessive cost of the New Mexican development and the possibility that the independent company might lose money.

At this point the frustrated promoters told their story to two officials who immediately saw its significance. One was Senator CLINTON ANDERSON, of New Mexico, the other Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman.

ANDERSON promptly began to investigate. He says that what he found out startled him. One manganese mine in the Southwest was bought up by a large company and promptly closed down. A rich deposit in Mexico, just across the United States border, had gone undeveloped because the price offered by the steel-manganese cartel was impossibly low.

Chapman, who for several months had been riding the Munitions Board about the need to build up stockpiles, put his influence behind the New Mexican project. There is every likelihood now that a contract will be signed for 100,000 tons of ore from the Southwest.

A year and a half ago Representative WILBUR MILLS, of Arkansas, put a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the stockpile of manganese was then 1,840,000 tons, little more than a year's supply at the then level of production and probably less than that with the present record use of steel. Edward Newton, a mining engineer at one time connected with the Bureau of Mines, testified:

"I urge that further consideration be given to this subject, with a view to continuing the investigation of processes of realizing the potential wealth that lies in the manganese deposits of this country. We are tackling a difficult problem and one in which the competition of the foreign supplies is against us, but it is a patriotic and selfish duty to try to develop our own industry and through public and private stimulation the work should be continued."

That advice was given in 1919.

Postal Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have cast my vote against adjournment and regard it as a duty, as well as a privilege, to vote for this bill, of which I am a coauthor.

If I had not been fully convinced that the postal service and the Nation were being severely penalized by the drastic order of curtailment issued by the Department, I would not have originally introduced the companion bill, which is similar in every respect to the one pending before the House.

Let us embrace this opportunity to rescind the unwise order which, if continued, will do irreparable damage to the postal service. It is daily inflicting unwarranted and unnecessary hardship upon faithful employees of the postal service. We cannot tolerate such a condition.

This is the greatest Nation in the world and our people are entitled to have the greatest, best and most efficient postal service. To restrict this service at this time is not economy; it is foolhardy penury. It will, in the end, be far more costly to the Government, as well as damaging to the industrial, business and professional life of the Nation and harmful to the morale of our fighting sons and patriotic people in this time of crisis.

As I have stated before, this order is a retrogressive, detrimental measure. It is the clear duty of this House, in my judgment, to vote to rescind it. I urge prompt, speedy action and hope that the House will manifest, by an overwhelming vote, its desire to restore the postal service to a satisfactory basis which will give proper consideration to the employees and public alike and result in efficiency and dispatch in handling the communications of the American people of every class and station. It is imperative that this lamentably unwise and unsound situation be corrected forthwith.

Republican Advance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank R. Kent:

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—REPUBLICAN ADVANCE

(By Frank R. Kent)

WASHINGTON, August 5.—Politically observant persons must have noted that since the 1948 election every few months there arises a new "Republican movement" sponsored by more or less well-known, but very seldom potent, party figures, the avowed purpose of which is to "rehabilitate and reconstruct" the Republican Party along "modern lines."

This performance has been repeated so often as to have now reached the stage where only the most incurably credulous take it seriously. The most recent of these "movements" calls itself "The Republican Advance" and is promoted by a New York attorney named Henry Poor and a Mr. Russell Davenport, once briefly in the public eye as an adviser of the late Wendell Willkie. Before that it was Governor Driscoll, of New Jersey, who called for a Republican "reconstruction." And before him there was a group which wanted to be to the Republican Party what the so-called Americans for Democratic Action are to the Democratic Party—an odd ambition, to say the least.

Every one of these movements differs somewhat from the others but basically they are identical.

Each is hotly denunciatory of the Old Guard and vehemently insistent upon the party gearing itself to the times and facing the future with a broader and more attractive appeal. Each makes lavish use of the shopworn and meaningless adjectives liberal, progressive, and constructive.

They are all strong on generalities and extremely foggy concerning specific facts. When you get through reading their verbose pronouncements, including the indignant denial that they propose to, me too, the old Roosevelt New Deal and the new Truman welfare state, you find that if that isn't their proposition then they have said nothing whatsoever and the whole business is wind.

In two other respects these efforts for Republican rehabilitation are exactly the same:

1. They seem to have an equally unstable existence. Some stay alive longer than others but soon or late they shrivel and fall off the vine.

2. Invariably, they secure rather important publicity for a short time. Certainly, a sure way for a Republican to get publicity is to proclaim himself a liberal and express discontent with the reactionary party leadership.

He does not have to have a program. He does not even have to have an idea. All he has to do is beat his breast and strike the pose.

At once, he is hailed by the left-wing and advanced thinkers among the columnists, commentators, and press agents. They start in to make a hero of him. From that time on he is referred to in chorus as the hard-hitting, clear-thinking Senator So-and-So, or the able and independent Representative This-and-That.

And though, unless completely stone-headed, he must know that these journalistic greasers are unshakably New Deal, Fair Deal, and welfare state Democrats, it becomes the main purpose of his life to have their commendation continue.

One would think the intelligent among them would realize they are behaving like political saps, lending themselves to Democratic propaganda about the desire of Republicans to return to the Harding and McKinley days and giving encouragement to such old political frauds as Mr. William Green, of the A. F of L., who regularly denounces the Republicans as bankrupt of decent principles and barren of political honor.

Of course, this talk of reactionary leadership is the cheapest kind of claptrap.

The Republicans did not lose the last four elections because they were reactionary. They lost two of them because of the war and the other two because, in a silly effort to outbid and outpromise the Democrats, they gave the voters no choice between liberalism and conservatism.

Twice there have been two neglected issues upon which there is strong reason to believe they could have won. One of these is the evil effect of an enormously expanded Federal machine, the weight of which tends to keep the administration in power and the tremendous cost of which has brought us close to economic chaos.

The other is the shameful subservience of the Democratic administration to the greedy labor bosses, whose reckless waves of strikes have at times endangered the economic life and health of the Nation.

With these two and the right sort of candidate, the Republican Party can afford to disregard these boresome movements to renovate and redecorate it. It does not need a new dress or a new look or new principles or a new program.

It does need fewer men who, attracted by publicity bait, can be lured into attacking their own side and it does need a man to nominate 2 years from now who can indict this administration in a way to make the people see clearly what has been done to them.

Bulldozing Counsel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial entitled "Bulldozing Counsel," which appeared in the Washington Post of August 5, 1950, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was printed, as follows:

BULLDOZING COUNSEL

The fact that the National Labor Relations Board has had to ask the Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati to disregard a brief filed by its general counsel is, to use Walter Lippmann's phrase, the grand piano that broke the camel's back. In this case, involving the Vulcan Forging Co. and the CIO United Auto Workers, General Counsel Denham ignored the specific instructions of the NLRB not to present the particular brief. The friction between Mr. Denham and the NLRB is "old hat," but the confusion it causes in labor matters is something else. President Truman recognized the anomaly of a semiautonomous general counsel in proposing in a reorganization plan that the functions of the counsel be consolidated with those of the Board proper—but Congress rejected the plan. Thus, the question of who is boss remains unsettled, and Mr. Denham obviously is forcing the issue. This is so flagrant a piece of nose thumbing that if Mr. Denham does not resign of his own volition it is hard to see how the President can avoid asking his removal for cause.

The Problem of the Aging

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, during the past week the National Conference on Aging held in the Nation's Capital assisted in emphasizing one of our country's most pressing problems—the plight of elderly American citizens.

To many of us in Congress the problem of the aged is well known. We have only to walk down the streets of our home towns to be reminded in personal interviews and observations that the elderly citizen is sadly neglected.

Since my election to Congress in 1938 we have only had one opportunity to vote in the House of Representatives on an old-age-pension bill and that was in the Seventy-sixth Congress when 101 Members of the House registered a vote in approval of the Townsend bill. At that time it required courage to stand up and be counted, for there were many in our midst who branded any advocate of pension legislation as a moron of the lowest type. I am proud that I am listed among the 101 Members of the Seventy-sixth Congress who sincerely believed that the issue of an adequate old-age pension was not one that could be dismissed lightly, but that in fairness to our elderly citizens it deserved Nationwide study and positive action.

Since the vote on the Townsend bill in 1940, 10 long years have passed and an adequate old-age pension is still in the discussion stage. Here in Congress for the past 10 years we have had all kinds of excuses ranging from war to a plea to wait until the Social Security Act could be carefully studied and recommendations made as to how the subject of old-age pensions could be handled.

In the interim, time has marched on and the misery of old age for millions of American citizens continues to be shunted aside as our Government ponders over programs designed to aid backward nations and their inhabitants.

It is time that we abandon pussyfooting and recognize the plight of elderly citizens who by hard work and untold sacrifices have helped to build this Nation that now is inclined to turn a deaf ear to the anguished appeals for an adequate old-age pension system in America.

The following editorial from the August 15, 1950, issue of the Washington Evening Star paints a verbal picture of the plight of our aging population. The statistics and the facts compel us to take immediate action on a situation that has long been a national disgrace.

The editorial is as follows:

THE PROBLEM OF THE AGING

The national conference on aging—which comes to a close here today—has been overshadowed by news about war and rumors of war. But the problem it has been dealing with is nevertheless one of paramount importance to the future well-being of America, politically, economically, and socially.

In 1900, 1 out of every 25 Americans was aged 65 years or over—a total, all told, of 3,080,000. Today, a half century later, the total in this oldster bracket, out of a national population of 150,000,000, is 11,514,000, or 1 out of every 13. The figure, moreover, is growing at such a rate that it is expected to reach 20,000,000 within the next three decades.

Proportionately speaking, owing to improved medicine and surgery and to the striking gain in average life expectancy since 1900, what this means is that the number of Americans 65 years or over is growing faster than the number of the young. In itself, that fact would not necessarily constitute a serious problem, but the unfortunate reality is that most of our aging people are finding it more and more difficult to support themselves and lead happy and constructive lives after their retirement from gainful full-time employment—a retirement that is compulsory in many of our industrial enterprises.

Thus, of the 11,514,000 Americans now in the 65-and-up age group, approximately a third—3,500,000—have no cash income whatever. Another third have an income of less than $500 a year. Of the total, according to the Census Bureau, only between 10 to 20 percent have attained financial independence. In other words, most of our aging citizens are dependent on Government aid, private charity and/or the help of their younger relatives, who in large numbers are reluctant to bear the burden. In short, the situation is one in which the average oldster is having a tough and lonely time trying to keep body and soul together.

Under our program of social security, old-age benefits this year will amount to $2,735,000,000, or close to five times the total in 1939. A decade from now, when 14,700,000 Americans are expected to be over 65, this aid, if it is kept within its present individual limitations, will involve an outlay of $6,767,000,000 annually, and if it goes up to $100 a month, it will cost more than $17,000,000,000. These staggering figures serve as a measure of the problem of the aging—a problem whose solution, in economic terms, is likely to require a system of part-time employment and broader private pension plans.

Further, wholly apart from its economic aspects—including the oldsters' importance as a great consumer market whose purchasing power has a key bearing on our over-all prosperity—this highly complex problem has significant political and social implications. As far as politics go, such a big segment of our population, if shabbily dealt with, would be meat for the demagogs. And socially, of course, as a simple human matter, it is in the Nation's interest that its aging citizens should be able to live out their sunset years in reasonable contentment.

Needless to say, this is not a problem that can be solved overnight by a magic formula. But a sound, step-by-step solution to it can be worked out by just such conferences as the one now drawing to a close. At any rate, though put in the shade by more critical and more urgent world events, it is serious enough to require sober thinking and planning—not least of all because our average life expectancy is steadily increasing and may, according to some scientists, be in excess of 100 years in the predictable future.

Economic Controls Seen Posing Political Problems for Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial appearing in today's New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sullivan has brought to our attention the welfare of a very important segment of our Nation's population. Certainly Mr. Truman has to give the country's savers very careful and serious consideration. These people have been taking the brunt of our inflation for the past few years and practically nothing has been done to help them. We used to urge thrift and that qualification has accounted in a large degree for our economic success. Now the tendency is quite the opposite and I regret that people give such little thought to their future security. Mr. Truman has a problem here which calls for much more than snap judgment and it will be interesting to see how he deals with the situation. The editorial follows:

ECONOMIC CONTROLS SEEN POSING POLITICAL PROBLEMS FOR TRUMAN—MARK SULLIVAN SAYS ADMINISTRATION MAY HAVE TO COUNTER DEMANDS OF FARMERS AND LABOR

(By Mark Sullivan)

President Truman will shortly have authority to impose several controls on the country's economy. The authority, as contemplated in discussion in Congress, is to be discretionary. After Mr. Truman gets it the important thing will be what ones of the controls he chooses to exercise.

Two of the proposed controls are to be over wages and over prices, including prices of food. To control these, in the sense of preventing further rise in them, would run counter to two groups, labor and farmers. These two have had, during the Truman administration, an extraordinary position in the country's economy and in politics. They were the main reliance to whom Mr. Truman appealed in his 1948 campaign for the presidency, and they have had corresponding deference from his administration.

This deference was an outstanding part of the picture of the country, as a country and as an economy, at the moment when sudden and utmost strain was put upon it, almost its very capacity to survive challenged, by the outbreak of war in Korea. On that fateful 26th of June were two conditions which, both symbolically and actually, went to the heart of the administration of the country's economy and government. If any future historian should write an account of the country's economy as it was during early June—Russian communism hopes the account would be an obituary—he could reasonably stress these two conditions as symbolic.

POTATOES BOUGHT UP

In North Carolina and elsewhere in the South, where the early crop of potatoes was ready for picking, an immense agency of the Federal Government, the Department of Agriculture, was buying millions of bushels—photographs of Government-bought potatoes piled in heaps were printed in the Raleigh Observer of June 21. The potatoes were bought at prices fixed artificially high by the Government, and for the purpose of keeping up the price received by farmers and paid by consumers.

To that distortion of the country's economy through deference by government to a group as distinguished from the common interest of all, a companion picture was an exercise of power by organized labor. A strike by railroad workers, after several weeks of unsuccessful negotiation, took effect on the day of the Korean outbreak; and for more than a week, during which mobilization of the country's economy for war was urgent, suspended traffic on four western railroads.

If President Truman is to exercise effectively and justly the authority for controls he is about to be given, he will need to set his face against the two groups to which in the past he had paid deference. The picture as it was on June 25 continues to the present time. The Government is still buying food in order to hold it off the market and support prices. Within organized labor important unions make demands for higher wages with threats of strike to enforce them. During the last 10 days there have been local strikes which crippled public transportation.

HIS THEORIES CITED

Mr. Truman will need to go counter not only to groups to which formerly he has paid deference and from which he has solicited and received political support. He will need to go counter also to the economic theory he has proclaimed. Seven weeks before the Korean crisis, in a speech at Pendleton, Oreg., May 10, Mr. Truman exulted over an increase of $100,000,000,000 in the total national income during the last 10 years; and set up as a goal an increase of another $100,000,000,000 during the next 10 years. A President thus committed to increase of the national income for the sake of increase will find it embarrassing now to resist increase of prices paid to farmers for their crops and increase of wages to labor.

Besides, regardless of the war and from the broadest viewpoint, Mr. Truman needs to settle with the country's savers, greater in number than labor and farmers combined. Persons who have savings in bonds, life-insurance policies, and the like, have seen the purchasing power of their saved dollars practically cut in half during the 10 years of increase in the national income which Mr. Truman exulted over. The effect of past policies of the Truman administration on savings as savings and on thrift as an economic virtue has been itself a threat to the country's economy.

Fire Louis Johnson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Altoona Tribune for August 14, 1950:

FIRE LOUIS JOHNSON

Before we get any deeper into war, this country should make one major change in our leadership:

We should have a new Secretary of Defense.

Mr. Louis Johnson has met with dismal failure the first great test placed upon him and his new "unified" department.

And, this time, there is less excuse for it than, perhaps, at any time in our history, since, on this occasion, we, ourselves, have been talking about the Soviet peril for 5 years, and it has been a major topic of discussion by every one of our top leaders—including Mr. Johnson.

Yet, this much-discussed Soviet peril materializes suddenly in the form of a shooting war, and we find ourselves no better prepared than we were in World War I, and not as well as in World War II.

This is not a situation to be tolerated by the American people.

Congress, apparently, is willing to let this governmental failure slide. A general whitewash of Mr. Truman, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Acheson seems to be in the making.

There appeared an abortive attempt a few weeks ago to lay the Korean failure at General MacArthur's doorstep—something like the Pearl Harbor situation, in which Admiral Kimmel and General Short were left holding the bag for shortcomings of the administration and high command.

But, General MacArthur forestalled this one quickly. He got the truth out at once—that he, as commander of Japan, had nothing to do with Korea, which was the State Department's responsibility—a responsibility, by the way, which it had been eager to eliminate according to its own record.

Columnist Ray Tucker reported recently that "documented evidence presented to the House Armed Services Committee by Rear Adm. ROSCOE H. HILLENKOETTER, head of the Central Intelligence Agency, convinces both Democratic and Republican members of that body that President Truman, Secretary Acheson and Secretary Johnson were given full warning of the North Korean attack on June 25, but failed to heed it."

And, as plain indication of his unfitness for the task of head of our unified Armed Forces, Mr. Johnson was instrumental in the elimination of our Navy and Naval Air Force as immediate defense arms.

The President undoubtedly shares Mr. Johnson's guilt in this respect.

Carriers and other warships, had they been readily available, could have carried marines and naval aircraft to the scene of the Korean war within hours after it started. Much perhaps could have been done by a hard-hitting blow at once, the kind of assault our Pacific task forces delivered so effectively against the Japanese.

The Navy lost several of its top-bracket veterans in the disagreement last year in the Defense Department over the role of the Navy and Air Force.

Mr. Truman and Mr. Johnson held out for trimming the Navy, and for abolishment of plans for the proposed giant aircraft carrier United States.

The Defense Department backed the Air Force in a dispute brought to a head by Altoona's Representative JIMMY VAN ZANDT over the big bomber, the B-36—about which nothing has been heard in the Korean war.

Representative VAN ZANDT was critical of the B 36. So was Admiral Denfeld, who was later fired as Chief of Naval Operations for defending his own branch of the service.

It seems beyond belief that our Government could pursue a course of such international ramifications as ours, combined with a constant feuding with Soviet Russia, without realizing the necessity for maintaining a well-rounded Armed Force.

Yet, despite the victory of the Chinese Communists, and the critical Asiatic situation, nothing was done to strengthen the Navy or our Army Air Force in the Far East.

Mr. Johnson misled the people of this country when he assured us that his program of reorganization and economies had made us a stronger armed force. It has done nothing of the kind; quite the contrary.

Mr. Johnson's record deserves recognition: Instant dismissal.

Americans do not want to pay with the lives of their boys for the mistakes of such incompetent executives as Mr Johnson.

Mr. Truman has indicated he would not displace him Mr. Truman should face a demand by Congress and the people that he fire Mr. Johnson.

The country's welfare, the lives of our fighting men, deserve the protection of the best leadership we can get.

Mr. Johnson's record does not show that kind of leadership.

Let's Have an End of Demagogic Appeals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of August 15, 1950:

LET'S HAVE AN END OF DEMAGOGIC APPEALS

Judging from the statements of candidates for public office in Pennsylvania thus far this year, the only issue confronting a troubled people is communism. Every candidate seems to feel that he has to outdo the opposition in ferocity of attitude toward the Reds.

This has led to a number of proposals, not all of them judicious by any means, for dealing with the enemy. This strikes us as a demagogic approach to the November election. The candidates for high office in Pennsylvania must surely be capable of something better than that, and the people ought to let them know that they expect something better.

Let us concede without argument that all of the Republican and Democratic candidates for office—like all good Americans in every walk of life—are militantly opposed to communism. We believe that they will do anything within reason, or even beyond reason, to combat subversion on the home front.

All right. Now, let's get on with the business of discussing other issues, many of them bearing indirectly on the issue of communism, in this year's campaign.

The candidate who rattles on interminably about putting Communists in jail, or taking similar action, puts things all out of focus. It is not enough to try to eradicate a disease once it has broken out. Even more important is a sound program of preventive medicine.

An effort to punish those few Americans already lost to communism is essentially a negative approach to the problem of disloyalty. What we need is a positive approach aimed at strengthening democracy so that communism will not attract that vast majority of Americans who are loyal citizens.

Instead of talking about hanging Communists or hounding them out of the Commonwealth, the candidates ought to tell us what can be done to preserve our basic freedoms. It is better to build confidence in our present system of government than to boil Communists in oil or ride them out on a rail, however pleasurable such pastimes may be.

Confidence in the American system can be built in a number of ways readily available to citizens in public life. It is helped by weeding out of office those who abuse public trust. It gets a boost when the citizen feels that he is equably taxed and that his money is not squandered by a profligate government. Confidence and pride attend the republic that takes an enlightened interest in the economic welfare of its citizens, that provides a measure of security consistent with basic freedoms, that develops adequate programs for education, public health, and military defense, that avoids the violent fluctuations of inflation and depression, and is subject to continuous reorganization in the interests of economy and efficiency.

The man who feels that his government exists to serve rather than to enslave him, that it will help create and preserve job opportunities in a healthful environment, that it will protect his right to work, to worship, to speak freely, and to compete on equal terms, does not readily fall prey to communism.

Communism becomes a menace only where freedoms are denied. It thrives in an atmosphere of want and discontent. The man who is hungry, who feels discriminated against, who has been made to feel that constitutional guarantees of freedom and equality are a mockery rather than a reality—there is the most likely candidate for communism.

In the world struggle of democracy versus communism, on the ideological level no less than on the field of battle, a strong offense is usually the best defense. Let us proceed to discuss intelligently ways in which we can make democracy a living, breathing reality not only here in Pensylvania but wherever men aspire to freedom. Candidates who do that need not throw a single Communist to the lions in order to win the favor of the electorate.

Reaping the Red Whirlwind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, Harold E. Stassen, former Governor of Minnesota and now president of the University of Pennsylvania, made a very important address over a national hookup of the Columbia Broadcasting System on August 15, 1950. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

I have an estimate from the Public Printer that this will make approximately 2½ pages of the RECORD at a cost of $205.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REAPING THE RED WHIRLWIND

(An address by Harold E. Stassen)

My fellow citizens, for the next few minutes I should like to talk to you earnestly and straight from the shoulder about the position of the American people in the world today.

Our country is in grave danger. It is in greater danger today than at any time in the last 50 years.

We face across the world an unfriendly power with far greater military strength than was possessed by either Hitler or the Kaiser.

It is an unfriendly power which in 5 years of cold war has established its dictatorships over one-third of all of the peoples of the world—in Poland, eastern Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, North Korea, and China. It is an unfriendly power which behind its Kremlin walls undoubtedly made the decision which sent the North Korean aggressors slashing southward through the Republic of Korea. It is an unfriendly power which has active fifth-column agents throughout the world. It is an unfreindly power under a leadership which follows an ideology that might makes right, that man is meant to be dominated by other men, and that there is no God.

For 5 years that unfriendly power has been practicing a ruthless, vicious imperialism toward other peoples and other nations more destructive to their liberties, more degrading to their dignity, more crushing to their independence, more repressive of their worship, and more devastating to their standard of living, than any other imperialism in all history.

We face this unfreindly power with our own country under an executive administration which during those same 5 years has made a series of tragic major mistakes in policy. These men with responsibilities for our country's administration have been almost unbellevably confused and inefficient. They have been wasteful and neglectful. Thus they have added to the strength of this foreign opposition and have sadly weakened our own preparedness.

This administration of our country has sown so many pink seeds that now the American people must reap a red whirlwind.

It is with reluctance that I use such strong words, but I believe that a correct appraisal by the people of their executive leadership is an essential prelude to wise national action. And I do believe that history will adjudge our country's administration in these 5 years to be one of the most incompetent in our Nation's lifetime.

Tonight is not the moment to dwell in either anger or disappointment upon the familiar story of how we got into this perilous position. Our thoughts must be concentrated on how we move forward from here to national security and a brighter prospect of lasting peace.

It is late, but not too late. I am completely confident that the United States can and will win through. We can and will win through, not only to preserve our own safety and freedom, but to expand the freedom and progress of all mankind. But to do so we must recognize the basic facts and then move with that firm courage and unshakable determination of which our great, free people are capable. We must especially realize that the situation calls for a quality of leadership in Congress such as ordinarily is not required.

We should all observe that Congress as a whole has been more right these last 5 years than has the executive administration. Therefore, public opinion and the press should encourage Congress to exercise increasing leadership. The situation requires statesmanship of a high order in Congress. The statesmen are there and they are beginning to respond.

In a democracy there is a normal tendency to criticize, even belittle the legislative branch of Government, which necessarily moves somewhat more slowly and always includes a few members of very questionable judgment; and at the same time, a tendency to take the side of the executive branch against the legislative branch. In normal circumstances, such tendencies are understandable. But I submit that under the circumstances which our country faces, the people and the press would do well to look to Congress for increasing leadership. What are we to expect of that leadership? On what are its policies to be based?

First of all, the only safe basis for our future policy is to conclude that the ruthless rulers in the Kremlin have world domination as their grim, fixed objective; that they seek to realize that objective through bringing all other nations under national Communist dictatorships, with each of these dictators in turn subordinate to the central dictatorship in Moscow; and that they have a program and plan to carry out that objective.

No one can conclusively prove that that is their objective. But certainly the actions of the Politburo in these last 5 years, and the writings of Stalin and Lenin, and their excessive armament program, point unmistakably in that direction. Certainly also, their actions in these last 5 years reveal no sincere desire for peace and progress. Therefore, we cannot base our American policy on any other concept of Kremlin policy.

It would further appear that their program for pushing toward this objective may employ one or more of the following four sets of action:

First, the conquering of other nations one by one, moving first on the weakest, and using methods of infiltration, of civil war, of external pressure, and of armed invasion.

Second, the continuous embroiling of the major free nations of the world, including the United States, in minor wars at distant, difficult points to tire and weaken us and bleed us white.

Third, an effort by repeated threats of aggression to overstretch the American economy so as to cause an economic crash and chaos and weakness in this center of the free world.

Fourth, a direct surprise attack upon the United States as the strongest opposing power, by land through Alaska, by air through the northland, by sea through submarines, and by subversion, sabotage, and Communist terrorism.

If this analysis is correct, then America must develop policies to meet any one of these four alternatives. In addition we should include some positive actions and programs of our own.

Clearly we cannot permit the other nations of the world to be picked off one at a time with the weakest and ripest falling first. With the callous willingness to spend human lives which characterizes the Kremlin's policies, the satellite nations of the Communist dictatorship can overrun almost any nation on which they border, unless the United States throws its power, through the United Nations, into the balance.

But if, following Korea, the Kremlin directs an attack of the Chinese Communists down into Indochina or into Burma, or of the Bulgarian Communists into Greece or into Turkey, or of the east German and Polish Communists into western Germany, or of the Hungarian Communists into Austria, or orders other similar moves; and if the United States attempts to meet each of those aggressions where they occur; our armed strength will be dissipated and spread out in jungles and mountains and valleys in distant points of the world. Our young men will die facing satellite troops of which there will be no end in numbers, and we will become a giant pinned to the earth by our own errors of policy, weakened and laid open to direct assault.

Do not these two alternative facts mean that it must be American policy that if further aggressions occur at any point in the world by these Communist imperialist forces, we shall hold the Kremlin strictly responsible? Must it not be our policy to ask the United Nations Assembly to fix that responsibility upon the Kremlin? Should we not make it clear that an attack in Indochina, or Burma, or Greece, or Turkey, or Germany, or Austria, will not simply mean that war comes to Indochina, or Burma, or Greece, or Turkey, or Germany, or Austria, but will mean that war will come to Moscow, to the Urals, and to the Ukraine? Can the situation be thought through on any other basis? And if this is the logical conclusion, should we not then make it plain well in advance? Should not Congress declare it to be, by appropriate resolution, the policy of the United States of America, in its determined desire for world peace and justice and freedom? Should not this policy be then laid before the United Nations Assembly for approval? I believe and urge that this should be done.

Let me make it clear that I definitely am not proposing that the United States start a preventive war. But I am saying that we should set forth with unmistakable clarity that if the Communist leaders do in fact start world war III by aggression through their satellites and puppets, we and our associates in the United Nations intend to finish it, in due time, against the Kremlin itself.

To reemphasize this analysis let me state it this way: Uncle Sam is a world-champion fighter when he is aroused, when he understands the necessity of the fight, and when he is prepared. We must not permit Uncle Sam to be chopped down finger by finger, arm by arm, by preliminary fights for which he is not prepared. If the persistent, ruthless actions of others makes a world fight unavoidable, a ready, alert, wise Uncle Sam must move directly to the main fight.

Once this broad basic policy is established our military leadership will know how to prepare and for what. It should be said that the repeated statements of policy by the State Department and the President that we would not defend Korea and Formosa and the eleventh-hour reversal of that policy placed our military in a very, very difficult position. It is to the credit of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and to the everlasting credit of each and every soldier, sailor, airman, and marine in the Korean war that they are discharging, as well as they are, the sudden responsibility placed upon them by the administration's belated reversal of policy.

Under this vital policy America must be prepared to bring war directly to the centers of Communist power if they persist in starting world war III through satellite aggression. America must be prepared to defend itself against a direct assault, including a civilian-defense program such as England had in World War II. America must assist in arming the free and peace-desiring nations for their joint defense, provided they move decisively and effectively to arm themselves. To do these essentials will require a total of $35,000,000,000 or more per year for a number of years. Thus we must turn our attention to how we can do this job and yet not so overextend or damage our own economy as to cause our own crash and failure even if war does not come. In other words we must be prepared to fight a world war and also be prepared to remain sound and strong at home if no war comes. To do this is increasingly difficult because of the inflationary policies that have been followed by the administration these past 5 years. The war in Korea has had such upsetting effects upon our prices and our economy at home because America was already in an inflationary situation. Thus it is absolutely essential that as we move into this military program we must also move upon the financial and economic policies that go with it. Otherwise we will stretch our economy so thin that the Communists will need do no more than keep us under such intense economic pressure for a period of years and we will crash after a mad inflation.

The medicine to cure this fever of inflation is not a pleasant medicine to take. It is not a popular medicine to prescribe. Inflation itself is a political coward's method of meeting of meeting financial problems. But inflation is a disease that brings in its wake a pernicious anemia in any economic system.

These then are the steps America must take as we move in this crucial armament program.

We must cut down on nondefense Federal spending by at least $4,000,000,000 per year, and preferably by as much as $6,000,000,000 per year. We must cut down on nondefense State and local spending by at least $1,000,000,000 per year. These cuts, of course, can only be made by real reductions in the handouts of Government and in other activities which may be desirable but are not essential under these conditions.

The hard facts of the rearmament requirements must cause a reevaluation of all other programs of our Government and of friendly governments as well. For example, it will mean that the United States will be buying such quantities of rubber and tin and other supplies from the British sterling area and from other nations, that the dollar-gap question of the Marshall plan is entirely changed.

The United States must not attempt to carry on Government as usual, nor Marshall plan as usual, nor pork barrel as usual, nor even services as usual during these next crucial years while priority is given to adequate rearming of ourselves and our friendly associates in the United Nations.

The Government must also increase taxes of all types upon everyone to raise a minimum additional $10,000,000,000 per year.

The Government must follow through and reinstate controls over the credit systems of our country, keeping a steady check on installment credit and shrinking to an appropriate degree all forms of credit which add to the inflationary pressures.

Finally, we must place into readiness a system for allocations, price and wage ceilings, and rationing; using it only when needed; but definitely having it promptly and completely set up and ready to go.

Such a system will be adopted with understandable reluctance because of the distastefulness of controls to the American people and because of lack of confidence in the administration and fear that clumsy administration will seriously handicap production and that the controls might also be used for Socialist purposes because of the many Socialist schemes that have been proposed by the administration in these last years.

The public and the Congress should insist that these controls be administered by a special emergency agency under an executive, not in politics, confirmed by the Senate, who has the confidence of both political parties, who has business management and labor and agriculture of excellent qualifications to administer these key economic mobilization controls and regulations.

Congress must also place time limits upon the control legislation and should provide that the controls can be lifted in whole or in part by congressional resolution to further prevent the President from abusing the power.

The experience of our country in both World Wars shows that an economy can be mobilized effectively only if the mobilization program is in the hands of a central coordinated agency, and that it depends so much upon the ability of the men in charge and upon the confidence placed in them. Thus Congress should rise up and refuse to permit these emergency powers to be scattered among the present politically appointed members of the Cabinet, or any of the other present members of the administration who have been involved in these weakening internal feuds and errors of basic policy.

The people of the United States have not received their money's worth from the fifty billions spent for defense in the past 4 years.

The public and the Congress should insist that a top caliber man, not in politics, be brought into the administration to take charge of armament production. Only in that way will the American people get their money's worth for the increased billions which must now be spent. Far more important, only in that way will the job be done. Only in that way will our fighting men have the armament they need.

Coupled with these military and economic policies we must embark upon a major offensive in the cold war. There is an understandable tendency to shift all attention right now to the Korean war. But we must not forget that one of the reasons that we are engaged in this Korean war today is the administration's failure to wage the cold war successfully. It must become increasingly clear to the many millions of peoples of the world on both sides of the iron curtain that it is the sincere objective of America and of the United Nations to advance their standards of living, to recognize their human dignity and their rights regardless of color; and to expand their individual freedom. This requires the early initiation of a comprehensive Asiatic economic program, parallel to the Marshall plan, and yet different because of the different conditions in Asia.

It should involve only a small fraction of the amount of money spent on the Marshall plan, both because we do not have the resources to spend more and because the nonindustrial economy of Asia has different and lesser needs in terms of dollars.

In many instances American surpluses can materially assist in Asia. As one specific example, India today needs wheat. India has needed wheat badly for the past 10 months. India has sought 36,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat from America. America has over 300,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat on hand. Yet America has not shipped any of this surplus wheat to India. This is an inexcusable shortcoming in American action. American surplus wheat should be promptly shipped. In fact America can quite likely receive valuable raw materials, in future years, useful to our production and to our stockpiles, in repayment.

Initiative in developing an economic program for Asia should come from leaders of Asia itself. Such men as Pandit Nehru and Liaquat Ali Khan and Carlos Romulo and Elpidio Quirino should be encouraged to work out an economic plan for Asia, and under their leadership, America and the United Nations should move upon a far-reaching Asiatic economic advance. Such action has been requested by Congress in the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, but the State Department has not acted.

America should constantly point out the imperialistic aims and evil objectives of the Soviet Union and contrast this with new deeds of a nonimperialistic, modern, enlightened approach of the Western World to Asia.

Assistance and encouragement should be given to all of those throughout the world who wish to advance the cause of freedom, including those millions within the countries now under Communist dictatorships. This part of our program should best be characterized as the front line of our offensive in the cold war. It should be placed under able leadership of high caliber, preferably someone who has had successful experience in a position of leadership in the Office of Strategic Services during World War II The methods and details cannot be spelled out in advance, but if able men are given the responsibility and the resources to conduct a cold war offensive, I am confident of excellent results.

We should always remember that a cold war can only be won with hot ideas.

As these major policies unfold consistent efforts should be made to have Great Britain and France and India and other members of the United Nations move with us. One of the most difficult problems in this regard is the question of the application of the Communist Chinese government for the seat in the United Nations. Clearly this application should not be granted. But Great Britain and India have voted for it. It would appear wise to ask Great Britain and India to join with us in the United Nations for the appointment of a special commission to go to China and investigate the application. The seat carries with it a veto power and thus it is a situation without precedent. Thorough inquiry should be made before passing on the appliciation as to whether or not the applicant government is under the complete domination of another power and as to its recognition of its international obligations and of the fundamental human rights of its own people. This commission should also observe the Manchurian-Korean border and the Chinese-Indochina border to determine whether the Chinese are violating the United Nations Charter.

If such a United Nations commission is refused entry to China, all nations will then have clear ground for rejecting the application for the veto seat. If entry is permitted, the resulting period of investigation will constructively ease the present tension and may well result, through the good offices of Nehru and others, in a trend toward the better in the entire confused Asiatic scene.

A further United Nations request should be issued to its Korean Commission and to the United Nations commander, General MacArthur, to assemble and report all information bearing upon any assistance given, following the cease-fire order, to the invading North Korean forces by any member of the United Nations.

Through it all we must exercise moral leadership in keeping with our fundamental philosophy and the teachings of our great religions. We must express a continuous willingness to meet in conference at any time, seeking the avenues for true peace. We must make it clear that our experiences have been such that we will not accept mere words or documents or treaties as assurances of peaceful intentions; but that we will look for actions that will definitely reduce the tensions of war, increase the freedoms and independence of people, and move toward a just and lasting peace. We must clearly indicate that we are not seeking to freeze a reactionary status quo, that we do encourage genuine progress in the well-being of men.

In spite of my grim over-all analysis, I do not consider that world war III is inevitable. I am certain that the non-Communist millions among the people of Russia do not want war. I believe that if the United States and her peace-loving associates quickly and steadily build sound armed strength and at the same time carry on an alert, intelligent idea and economic offensive against the Communist dictatorships, we have a better than even change of winning a just world peace without incurring the horror of world war III.

For the good of the people of Russia and of the United States and of the world, I pray

God this peaceful competition of systems without war will be the answer.

We must show leadership toward the strengthening of the United Nations. It should now be apparent to all that the United Nations in its present form is not adequate for coping with world conditions. If it had not been for the boycotting absence of the Russian delegate from the United Nations Security Council, the Korean action could not have been voted, for a veto would have stopped the Security Council. The return of the Russian delegate and his actions since his return clearly show that the veto will be used in future events. Likewise, the lack of United Nations police forces in being and, consequently, the heavy burden that fell upon our unprepared American divisions; and the slowness because of individual national decisions of other nations to reach the point of battle, clearly points out the need of a genuine United Nations police force.

The United States, then, should take the leadership in planning a future convention to rewrite the United Nations Charter, which can be done under article 109 without a veto, and to strengthen it in the light of experience and of common sense. At the same time, within the present Charter, through a special Assembly motion, action would be taken by those nations which are in accord with us to enlist and equip and train a truly United Nations police force, permitting any man to enlist therein, from any nation in the world, provided he can convince the recruiting officers that he is sincerely interested in serving to advance the objectives of the United Nations. This would permit the enrollment not only of citizens of the democracies which are members of the United Nations, but also of refugees from the iron-curtain countries, and of young men of Italy, of Germany, and of Japan. These forces could have great effectiveness in deterring future aggressive moves anywhere in the world or in containing the aggressors at remote battlefields during the period that the resulting world war would of necessity be fought directly against the Kremlin.

Finally, it is high time that the free countries of the world, including the United States, reexamine their policies toward the Communist Party. For too long our governments have been blind to the vicious subversive nature of these foreign Communist Party organizations. For too long these fifth column organizations have assisted in the recruitment that has resulted in spying and stealing the most important scientific, atomic, and diplomatic secrets. The legal privileges extended to these fifth column organizations should be removed. These privileges should be removed with the greatest care to preserve the fundamental freedom of speech, and of thought, and of academic and scientific inquiry. But freedoms are not served by giving legal shelter to organizations so clearly a part of a world conspiracy directed by an unfriendly foreign power. Freedoms are truly endangered by such soft and confused thinking—such coddling of organized communism.

As you review this message you may get an impression of measures too far reaching and of a scope too extensive. Let me plead that you realize that we are in this desperate condition in the world today because we have not had policies with vision far reaching enough, with a scope broad enough, with a perception deep enough. Our problem is no less than that of the future well-being and freedom of all mankind. Our stake is no less than the survival of this great free Nation. Our responsibility is no less than that which devolves upon the leading nation of the world which with one-sixteenth of the world's people, is producing one-third of all the world's goods and services. Our challenge is no less than the most fundamental one in all of history. It is a clash of basic ideology that can be traced back to the first philosophers of ancient Greece. Unless we think deeply, unless our plans are broad, unless our vision is farseeing, we will fall. But if this great Nation and its people have a sense of their mission in this critical hour, if they draw strength from their faith and their heritage, if they keep in mind the fundamentals upon which their nation was founded, we will win.

If the United States waits until the last minute to think these problems through and if we shift and reverse our decisions at a late hour, our entire national defense will be as desperate and unprepared and costly as the small-scale action in Korea has been. The Red whirlwind would then indeed be devastating.

My fellow citizens, let us face this grave danger with a clear understanding of its nature and power and with a calm determination to win through. Let us make the sacrifices. Let us take the decisions. We can win through. We must win through.

It will require treasure and toil, thoughtfulness and blood. But I believe, under God, we will win. And in victory we may yet find that out of these dark days will come the brightest dawn for freedom and for the happiness and well-being of mankind that the world has known. I have faith that this is so because I have faith that the underlying philosophy of our way of life is right. Man was meant to be free. And there is a God.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask that immediately following the address of Harold E. Stassen, which was submitted for the RECORD by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] there be inserted in the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Policy That Can Win," published in the Washington Daily News of August 16, 1950. The editorial makes comment on Mr. Stassen's address.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A POLICY THAT CAN WIN

On numerous occasions, this newspaper has urged the need of a firm, positive American foreign policy which would meet the challenges confronting us as a nation. By permitting the Russians to call the turns—in our opinion—we were letting them lead us into a war we could lose.

Harold E. Stassen has offered the Nation a policy with which our country can confront Russia.

There isn't anything namby-pamby about it. It will not appeal to the faint-hearted, who deal in half measures and appeasement. It does not offer any quick or easy way out. But it is a policy that can win, if it is advanced with the same courage, candor, and clarity with which it has been presented to the American people—provided it is backed by the determination and stamina it will take to see it through.

Mr. Stassen has his sights trained right on the bull's-eye.

Russia is the only real threat to world peace, and—

If our armed strength is dissipated and spread out in jungles and mountains and valleys in distant parts of the world we will become a giant pinned down to the earth by our own errors of policy, weakened and laid open to direct assault.

That assault can come by a direct surprise attack upon the United States by land through Alaska, by air through the northland, by sea through submarines, and by subversion, sabotage, and Communist terrorism.

So if further aggressions by Communist forces occur at any point in the world, we should hold the Kremlin strictly responsible and take the war directly to Moscow, the Urals and the Ukraine.

We should make our intentions plain and well in advance, by a joint resolution of Congress and by presenting our plans to the United Nations for approval.

This is not a proposal for a so-called preventative war, as the former Governor of Minnesota points out. It is public notice to the Russians that if they start world war III by prodding their satellites and puppets into aggression, we and our associates intend to finish it against the Kremlin itself.

Of course, we must be prepared to back up our brave words with everything it takes, if it comes to a show-down.

We must be prepared for war.

The money for this will demand reductions in nondefense spending far more drastic than anything Congress or the administration has proposed. Mr. Stassen puts the reductions in Federal spending at not less than $4,000,000,000, and preferably as much as $3,000,000,000. Similar reductions must be made in State and local budgets. Nothing can go on as usual, here or among our allies abroad. Great sacrifices are essential. A minimum of $10,000,000,000 will be needed in new taxes, Mr. Stassen estimates. A system of price-and-wage ceilings and rationing should be placed in readiness.

To do this job we'll need abler men in the Government than we have at present. We'll need much better machinery in the Government.

But all of these things may be necessary if our country is to surmount this crisis. It's better to be safe than sorry. The stake is the survival of this great, free Nation. The challenge is the most fundamental one in our history.

A third world war is not inevitable. Courageous, determined action now may forestall it. But we can't stop a steam roller by passing resolutions and appointing committees. We've got to be prepared to fight.

That demands the mobilization of all of our resources.

We are facing a ruthless enemy that can be stopped by nothing less than a show of superior force. To produce that show of strength will require sacrifices by all of us.

The tempting alternative is to relax and enjoy ourselves until the avalanche hits us. Then it may be too late even to be sorry.

New Deal Alibi for Failure in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the New Deal has charged the American people with the responsibility for failure of our foreign policy in Korea. But the record is too clear that this debacle was caused by its short-sightedness and a prejudiced view in its far eastern policies. I am including an article by that outstanding journalist, David Lawrence, that appeared in the Washington Evening Star on August 15:

PEOPLE BEING BLAMED IN NEWEST ALIBI FOR FAILURE IN KOREA—WAVE OF CRITICISM RISES AS TRUMAN REFUSES TO SHAKE UP TOP COMMAND

(By David Lawrence)

There's a new alibi around here—it seems that now the American people are to blame for the failures in Korea. Nobody in Washington presumably had any responsibility—it was just the failure of the people to let Washington spend more money.

This type of argument assumes that the military men in our top command must forget their duty as military advisers and be swerved by political considerations and public opinion's desires about spending. Evidently they must not speak up and tell the country what is really needed for military defense and safety.

But the people will not be fooled by these alibis. They are insistent that something be done about the blunders—no tanks, no aircraft carriers, no Marines, no tactical aviation in the Far East when trouble came. The bitterness of feeling against the President is growing. Letters from different parts of the country show that his recent refusal to shake up the top command and the civilians who bungled the job is turning a wave of new criticism against him.

ORDER ISSUED IN 1946

The President's responsibility will be a subject of wide discussion. For it was his Executive order issued in 1946—and reiterated regularly since—which has squelched the military men below the top group of political general and prevented them from speaking their minds.

The Executive memorandum was referred to in a speech in the House of Representatives on April 5, 1950, by Representative VAN ZANDT, Republican, of Pennsylvania, whose courageous demand for an investigation last year brought out a record of facts that tells the story of why there has been failure in Korea. The President's order, dated November 15, 1946, was addressed to the Director of the Budget. It has been the basic policy of his administration ever since. It reads in part:

"I cannot condone the practice of seizing upon any opportunity which presents itself to indicate an opinion, either directly or indirectly, that my estimates are insufficient.

"When you notify the heads of the various departments and agencies of the amounts to be included in the 1948 budget for their activities, I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of Congress."

This created a "yes-man" psychology. Any military man who differed conscientiously and tried to offer an expert opinion was called an insurrectionist. Admiral Denfeld was removed as an example. A rereading of the testimony in those House hearings last year tells what is wrong today. The President picked the wrong advisers—and still keeps them.

When the Navy's battleship Missouri ran aground, a fine naval officer was court-martialed and his career ruined—but that's the inexorable rule of the Navy.

NOBODY COURT-MARTIALED

Today, when the United States Army is without proper air support for ground troops in Korea or anywhere else, nobody is court-martialed.

Today, when the United States Navy has most of its aircraft carriers in mothballs and the Marine Corps has been cut to pieces by the combined votes of General Bradley and General Vandenberg in the Joint of Chiefs of Staff, neither the President nor Congress has taken the generals to task.

Only last fall the Marine Corps was fighting for its life—against dismemberment by Generals Bradley and Vandenberg. But the Marine Corps managed somehow, with the help of Congress, to keep some of its integrated combat teams, with their own airplanes. And here is the payoff as told in a dispatch this week from a United Press correspondent at the Korean battlefront:

"The smash down the coast was the acid test for close air support. Two units—one Army, one Marines—of the same comparative size jumped off at the same point at the same time against similar enemy concentrations in identical terrain.

"The Marines, with close air support, moved 27 miles in 4 days with light casualties. The Army, which had just the usual air coverage, bogged down after suffering heavy casualties."

That's the tragic story of the colossal blunder made by a majority of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff that is depriving the United States Army of its own air-support units.

There is too much politics in Washington or else there would be some heads removed, both civilian and military. Softness and political thinking have no place in a wartime set-up, as lives are being sacrificed. It may take more indignation from the people before they get the changes they want.

If we can only get this national administration to turn over a new leaf and make national welfare its objective rather than personal aggrandizement or party welfare, the procession to victory would be speedier with fewer lives and less treasure lost. Raise our national administration above the status of door mat for groups or individuals with votes to wield.

There is one feature of public spending that can and should be stopped immediately. Bureaus, departments, etc., are voted vast sums annually or for specific periods. If, as the periods draw to a close, divisions of Government have funds remaining in excess of what they really need, they spend recklessly to use the total allotment for fear that when money is next voted to them it will be reduced by the amount they did not spend (see August issue Reader's Digest, p. 11, too).

The reckless waste of the funds that taxpayers are called upon to supply is common knowledge among people who supply Government agencies. For heaven's sake, stop that.

With the earnest hope that you will devote your time while in office exclusively to the welfare of the Nation, I remain,

Yours very truly,

What the People Are Saying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave that has been granted me I include for the RECORD the following letter that has come to me from my district.

It is typical of what the people are saying and demanding:

JULY 25, 1950.

Hon. LEONARD W. HALL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HALL: Every real American will support President Truman until the United States is again victorious in an unfortunate, needless war. The national administration, however, owes it to the citizens to prosecute a war, not a political show. In its debt to the citizens the national administration certainly should install men in whom public confidence has not been impaired by their undue political activities or their incompetence. I have in mind, specifically, Acheson and the so-called Secretary of Defense, Johnson.

Our far-eastern policy has been such a horrible fiasco that men are dying daily. Surely Acheson is not the man to aid effectively in the prosecuting of war in the far-eastern theater. The policy which provoked the war was either a result of nincompoops' or traitors' efforts, and the citizens can have no confidence in such public officials during a period as serious as that which now exists.

Without attempting to be facetious at all, I honestly believe it would be in the public interest to have Acheson, Johnson, and Tydings, and perhaps Truman himself, for he has been a party to the policy, join the men in Korea, for there is no reason why they should not do the fighting, since they have helped bring it on.

Coudert Bids Truman State World Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL K. McCONNELL, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of August 16:

COUDERT BIDS TRUMAN STATE WORLD POLICY—OFFERS HOUSE RESOLUTION CALLING ON HIM TO SAY WHERE UNITED STATES WILL FIGHT

(By Robert L. Moora)

WASHINGTON, August 15.—Representative FREDERIC R. COUDERT, Jr., Republican, New York, introduced a resolution in the House today calling upon President Truman to tell the American people specifically what this country would do in the event of new Communist aggression elsewhere in the world.

Charging that the Korean situation was painfully convincing proof the administration had no consistent foreign policy and military strategy to support it, he submitted a list of 81 questions about American policy in 18 sensitive areas all over the globe.

URGES POLICY BY CONGRESS

Should the President fail to answer the questions, Mr. COUDERT proposed that Congress itself establish a special committee to recommend a national foreign policy designed to meet the vital questions pressing for decision by the American people.

"The American people, Mr. COUDERT told the House, "have a right to know what is the foreign policy of their Government, the right to assess that policy before they are called upon to shed their blood and spend their treasure in wars all over the world. There must be a truly national policy, openly and freely arrived at in traditional American fashion. No secret, personal Presidential substitute will do."

The administration's foreign policy also came under attack again today in the Senate. Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr., Republican, Massachusetts, charged that the President's program to win the Korean conflict and arm to resist aggression elsewhere does not go far enough.

"We have got to go further and say this is a struggle for existence and act accordingly," he asserted. "If you ask a man to make a sacrifice you must give him a great objective, and that hasn't been done yet."

He called for immediate and all-out measures to regain the initiative in the struggle with communism. With luck, he told reporters later, this could be accomplished in 3 or 4 years.

The Senator defended the foreign policy statement issued Sunday by four Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee, which was the subject of hot debate on the floor yesterday. It was not a political statement, he said, but a constructive and helpful one framed to promote the best interests of the country.

OPPOSES "YES MAN" ATTITUDE

"It is utterly pernicious to attempt to play politics with foreign policy at any time, and particularly at a time when the nation is in danger," he said. "But," he added, "to be bipartisan doesn't mean you become a 'yes man.'"

Representative COUDERT's questions led off with Korea, Formosa, and Communist China.

"What does the United States intend to do," he asked, "if and when the North Koreans are forced back to the thirty-eighth parallel—and what are its plans if the North Koreans succeed in driving our forces out of Korea?"

"What does this country plan to do," he asked, "if Formosa is attacked by the Communists, and what if it should be conquered?"

About Communist China he asked: "Is the policy of the United States to go to war with the 450,000,000 people of Communist China in support of Formosa, Indochina or any other Asiatic country?"

ASKS ABOUT PACT NATIONS

Regarding the North Atlantic Pact countries, Mr. COUDERT asked: "What is the policy of the United States now if (a) Soviet satellite forces or (b) Russian forces attack a North Atlantic Pact nation? Is it intended to make unlimited commitment of American Ground Forces in defense of Atlantic Pact nations?"

LISTS 15 OTHER AREAS

Then he listed 15 other sensitive areas in the world and asked what this country's policy would be if any one of them should be attacked by Russian or satellite forces, or conquered by them, or overthrown by a Communist internal revolution.

The areas he listed, along with their populations, were: French Indochina, 25,000,000; Hong Kong, 1,000,000; British Malaya, 5,000,000; Thailand, 17,000,000; Burma, 17,000,000; Pakistan, 70,000,000; Tibet, 3,700,000; Iran, 18,000,000; Turkey, 19,000,000; Greece, 7,800,000; Yugoslavia, 16,000,000; Finland, 4,000,000; western Germany, 48,000,000, and the North Atlantic Pact nations.

"The magnitude and difficulty of securing the above-mentioned countries from aggression is evident from a consideration of their populations," Representative COUDERT said. The total population of these Asiatic countries is well over 1,000,000,000. Western Europe has a total population in excess of 250,000,000.

"Americans are certainly entitled to demand immediate answers to these life-and-death questions. * * * They have a right to know now what their Government intends to do with the men and resources which it is now mobilizing. It is not enough merely to mobilize. Where and to what extent are American military forces to be committed? Americans want to know that now and should know it now. The rest of the world should know it.

"We were caught by surprise in Korea. Six weeks have elapsed since that attack. We must not be caught by surprise again. We must know where we are going and what we are going to do. Our political plans and commitments must not exceed our military capacity."

"Mariposa" and "Monterey"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, the people in the San Francisco Bay area witness the accumulation of war material and men for shipment out into the Pacific areas day by day and see the ships in which the men and materials depart. It continues to cause comment that men are traveling on slower ships designed to carry cargo while two very splendid transports which might have been available continue to lie at the local docks unavailable for want of completion of reconditioning, which might still be quickly done.

I include as a part of these remarks an editorial from the San Francisco Examiner of August 8 which is as follows:

WASTED SHIPS

Two fine Pacific ships with splendid records in peace and war lie idle and temporarily useless at Alameda.

They are the Mariposa and Monterey, of the Matson Steamship Line, once luxury liners and during World War II efficient troop transports.

Congressional delays, disputes, and red tape have halted their reconditioning.

Now if they were in shape they would be valuable, swift troopships such as are needed in the Korean war—and whatever else may happen.

Engineers estimate that the Mariposa and Monterey could be made ready for transport service in about 3 months, at a cost of about three and a quarter million dollars each.

Now they are loafing in the bay off Alameda.

The vessels were put out of commission by the long dispute between the Matson Co. and Washington. Several compromises between the Matson interests and the Government have been considered, but Congress has withheld approval.

The Defense Department's rush to get other ships out of mothballs shows the need for such ships as these two 26,000-ton craft, with speed of 21 knots. Each would carry 7,000 troops, and of American vessels they are second only to the Atlantic liner America in value to their country.

But they lie in the estuary as idle as painted ships upon a painted ocean—when the real ocean is being churned by war.

H. R. 8195, Rescinding Order for Curtailment of Postal Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. VORYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, this bill directs the Postmaster General to maintain delivery and other services on the basis existing immediately prior to April 19. I cannot vote for it. This is the first chance we have had since Korea to vote on a nondefensive expenditure. There is a lot of politics in this. I suspect Mr. Donaldson may have cut two-a-day delivery because he hoped there would be public clamor to increase his appropriations. The committee, however, never gave him a hearing on this bill. He said over the phone yesterday that it would cost $70,000,000. In the absence of hearings and cross-examination, I think we have got to take his word for it. I cannot justify a vote to require such increased expenditures for postal services now. I voted for the bill to increase postal charges. If the Post Office Department would put into effect the Hoover recommendations they could make two-a-day deliveries without extra cost. Any private business would be seeking to increase service in order to increase revenues, but that is not the way the Post Office does things.

I think the Post Office Department plays politics with service. They have cut out station B in the Republican north end of Columbus. I hear they intend to restore service at this substation just before election, in a way to help Democratic candidates. They may do the same thing with two-a-day deliveries. I realize that many people in my district are suffering inconvenience and business losses from slow mail deliveries. Much of this is not connected with the April 19 order, but is due to the inefficiencies pointed out in the Hoover report. The fact remains, however, that we cannot put efficiency in and politics out of a department by passing a law. The fact remains that a vote for this bill, without hearings, will be used to justify a $70,000,000 increase in nondefense expenditures. I cannot vote for it.

Democracies and Music

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEONARD W. HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, it is but rarely that musical comments appear in the RECORD. Under the leave that has been granted me, I desire to include a very short, but most interesting, review made by Felix Deyo, music critic of the Baldwin Citizen, of the 1950 concert by the Baldwin (Long Island) Junior-Senior High School bands and orchestras.

This condensed review by Mr. Deyo is taken from the Baldwin Citizen of April 27, 1950, and is as follows:

DR. EDWIN FRANKO GOLDMAN GUEST CONDUCTOR AT HIGH SCHOOL CONCERT

(By Felix Deyo)

The 1950 concert, in the now well-established annual series, by the Baldwin Junior-Senior High School bands and orchestras, was held last Friday evening at the high-school auditorium, under the artistic direction of Gene North. It was a brilliant event, made additionally so by the presence of Dr. Edwin Franko Goldman as guest conductor and impromptu speaker. Naturally, this superlative occasion attracted a very large and socially distinguished audience.

Opening with the Tannhauser march, Gene North's program, cleverly arranged, alternated popular items with equally favorite classics. In the former category were such characteristic members as Stardust, Knights of Honor, Coast Guards march, Lochinvar overture, Sleigh Ride, Call to Victory march, Chimes of Peace, the last named with Beverly Lish at chimes, and Constance Garguilo at glockenspiel. The playing of these selections call for elan and accuracy, of which Baldwin's high-school instrumentalists possess an abundance.

Gene North continues his wonders to perform in achieving artistic finesse with the treasure trove of tenn-age musical talent at Baldwin High School. The band and orchestra ensembles are splendidly synchronized both in technical prowess and interpretative viewpoint.

And now the guest conductor, another redoubtable figure to honor Baldwin by his visit here. In retrospect we recall Morton Gould's local appearance at one of Asta Nygren's conservatory concerts. And 1950 will have yet other guests of national fame, it is our professional prediction.

Edwin Franko Goldman is the foremost band king of today. For many, many years now have his free summer concerts—a Guggenheim gift—at Central Park in Manhattan and Prospect Park in Brooklyn been a pivotal attraction for the vast outdoor music loving public at large. It is a fact that prosperous democracies strengthen their purpose and stamina by the possession, among other assets, of superlative concert bands, sponsored both governmentally and as independent enterprise. That is a historical symptom, strikingly so, in these our beloved United States. Goldman's predecessors include such notable figures as John Philip Sousa and Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, magnificent pioneers in the development of the concert band.

Dr. Goldman's reading of Jean Sibelius' monumental Finlandia inspired the senior-high-school band to give all that they had in a performance of quality heights. Of course, the group of Goldman marches was eagerly anticipated. These included World Peace, Jubilee, Builders of America, University, and, for extra measure, that great favorite—On the Mall. In this latter the audience members participated, lifting their singing voices aloft to the syllables "La, la." It was community singing at its happiest. Dr. Goldman's felicitous remarks disclosed him as a humble recipient of vociferous applause. Such tribute, he stated, actually should be bestowed upon Gene North and fellow teachers of the high school. The celebrated bandmaster Goldman reminds one of the late David Belasco, America's supreme stage director. No doubt they are kindred masters in accomplishment, personal grace, and colorful sense of humor, and humanity. The country takes to its heart such men as these. They are historical milestones.

Even Baruch May Be Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a release by Willford I. King, dated August 14, 1950, and an editorial from the Chicago Tribune indicate that, even when great men speak, their statements should not be accepted without examination and consideration.

The release and the editorial follow:

Mr. Bernard M. Baruch is justly regarded as one of our most outstanding citizens. As a financier he has been eminently successful. Everyone recognizes that he is a man of the highest integrity and is thoroughly public-spirited. His plan for control of atomic energy is a masterpiece and deserves the support of all those who wish to protect the safety of the people of the United States. Because of the facts just mentioned, it is by no means surprising that his remarks before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on July 26 were given by the Senators unusually careful consideration.

It appears, however, that in his testimony before the Senate committee Mr Baruch assumed a greater knowledge of economics than he actually possesses. Despite his wide experience in controlling industry during World War I, it is obvious that he never realized the paralyzing effect of price controls upon production. He did not understand that when the price of any goods is kept below the level which would be attained in a free competitive market marginal producers are eliminated and hence the goods becomes scarce.

He took it for granted that when the Government enters the market with war demands it necessarily raises the general price level. However, in fact, this is not really the case if the war is paid for by taxes, for, in that case, the shrinkage in the total demand of the taxpayers is exactly equaled by the expansion in the Government's demand for goods. Neither did Mr. Baruch understand that taxation curtails civilian expenditures far more effectively than can any system of Government controls. What he recognized was that when one control is imposed it immediately generates the need for other controls, but he completely failed to understand that all of the controls are undesirable.

Mr. Baruch, furthermore, betrayed his ignorance of the facts when he assumed that inflation and its effects can be prevented by price controls. During World War II, the OPA, with a vast number of employees, was doing its best to hold prices down while the Government was inflating the currency supply. But, despite all the efforts of the OPA, the price level kept pace with the rising money supply. Although prices of the necessities were held down nominally, the black-market prices of the same articles climbed so that, eventually, it became impossible to purchase many articles, except in the black market. Moreover, the prices of all unrestricted services and material goods increased to a far greater extent than would have been the case had the Government not intervened by price fixing.

Mr. Baruch completely failed to grasp the fact that the price increases following the beginning of the war in Korea were occasioned not at all by inflation but entirely by fear on the part of the public that the Government would soon engage in price fixing and rationing.

Only a few weeks before the war in Korea started Mr. Baruch made a speech lauding the advantages of free enterprise. Since free enterprise maximizes production in peacetime, logic would seem to indicate that it constitutes the best productive system for wartime, but Mr. Baruch takes the opposite point of view and assumes that in wartime we should have a completely fascistic regime. He could not come to this conclusion if he realized that free competitive pricing and unrestricted profits are essential features of the free-enterprise system, and that no other forces have yet been discovered which control production so effectively for maximum output.

It is, indeed, unfortunate that the Senators assumed that because of Mr. Baruch's outstanding ability, success in business, and patriotic service, he was in a position to give them sound advice concerning the economics of Federal finance, for there is every probability that if his advice is taken and our whole economy is regimented our production, both for war purposes and civilian needs, will be greatly curtailed, and the difficulty of winning the war will be correspondingly increased.

[From the Chicago Tribune]

HOW BARUCH GOT THAT WAY

Bernard Baruch appeared before Congress Wednesday to urge all-out mobilization, including rationing and the freezing of wages, prices, and rents. For years Mr. Baruch has been talking this way. Thus in June 1947 he urged immediate passage of a law empowering the Government to draft men and women for farms and factories as well as for military service

After making millions in railroad, steel, copper, rubber, and other stocks and promotions, Mr. Baruch became interested in politics An acquaintance with William F. McCombs, chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 1912, and a large campaign contribution that year, put him in on the ground floor with the Wilson administration and he was made head of the War Industries Board.

This experience with the functioning of the Government so impressed him that he has ever since constituted himself the adviser to Presidents, Cabinet members, Members of Congress, and candidates for public office. When he was with the War Industries Board Baruch didn't have all the authority he thought he should have had, and no doubt that is why he can usually be found on the side of giving more authority to office holders.

In 1946 he told a congressional committee that wartime price control ought not to be allowed to lapse. This was at a time when the price-fixing regime had resulted in discouraging production and disorganizing distribution. So large a part of the meat produced was going into the black market that the Department of Labor was obliged to say that it could not report what the price of meat was because there was none for sale in the stores from which it regularly obtained quotations.

In spite of the fact that Mr. Baruch's proposal for the continuation of OPA had Mr. Truman's enthusiastic support, and in spite of the fact that the Democrats were in control of Congress in early 1946, OPA was allowed to lapse. Thereafter goods came back to the market and production of consumer goods assumed truly remarkable proportions. Within a short time all shortages which had existed under OPA disappeared, except one—housing. Continued rent control was responsible for that. Where the whole economy would have been if Congress had followed Baruch's advice in 1946 is indicated by the unrelieved shortage of rental housing.

That Mr. Baruch is not the great genius some people seem to suppose him to be is indicated also by the part he played in the early phases of the Roosevelt administration. Baruch's outstanding contribution to the first Roosevelt administration was NRA He contributed his $25,000-a-year employee, Hugh Johnson, to the brain trust to work out and direct the NRA, which was sometimes referred to as a Baruch masterpiece.

The National Recovery Act, it will be remembered, was the act signed by President Roosevelt June 16, 1933, providing for industrial codes of fair competition which, it was asserted, would restore the country to prosperity by increasing employment and raising wages. The act was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court on May 27, 1935, in the Schechter, or sick-chicken, case.

Baruch's NRA did not have the expected effect. Prof. Garfield Cox, of the University of Chicago, reported to an annual meeting of the American Economic Association that the 4-month drop which followed the introduction of the NRA has never been equaled except in the panic collapses of 1893 and 1907. On the other hand, the advance which followed the Schechter decision against NRA is the broadest and best sustained to date.

Mr. Baruch's testimony is that of a Washington character who had a Government job the war before last and ever since has regarded himself as a sage.

Goods Produced by Slave Labor Compete With American Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, American workingmen and American manufacturers cannot be expected to maintain competition with slave laborers and State-controlled industries abroad. Yet, under the present administration's trade policies, this is exactly what is happening.

Goods of all types are pouring into the United States from behind the iron curtain, competing with goods produced by Americans and because of much lower prices are actually stealing the American market from under our nose.

During the past several years there have been frequent reports of the use of slave and forced labor in the Soviet Union and her satellites. But because a curtain of secrecy is maintained, our Government has no way of proving these reports. It is assumed by the administration, therefore, that because we don't know what kind of labor is producing goods behind the iron curtain, it must be free labor. Existing law prohibits goods produced by slave or forced labor from entering this country.

I need not go into great detail about the shipments from Soviet-dominated areas. Large quantities of furs, hats, pottery, glassware, jewelry, and shoes have come into this country. The people of my district are particularly angered by shipments of hops and crabmeat from Soviet-dominated areas. Just yesterday, 80 tons of canned Russian crabmeat valued at a quarter million dollars arrived at New York aboard a British ship.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] today has introduced a bill in the House which would overcome the bad situation which today allows these goods to enter our land. It provides that if the Treasury is unable to investigate and determine the facts and inspection is prohibited or restricted, then the products of that country are assumed to be products of slave or forced labor and, therefore, are barred. A country without such slave or forced labor has nothing to hide.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Members of the House to join in support of this bill. In giving it such support, they will be halting aid to the forces of tyranny which are running amok in the world today. And they will be giving help and encouragement to the American businessmen and workingmen who then must no longer compete with a standard of living far, far below ours in the United States.

A. F. of L.'s Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF RFPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following statement by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, August 10, 1950:

The unwarrantable and unjustified invasion of South Korea by Soviet Russia cannot be regarded as an isolated incident. Communist aggressors may start another conflict at a number of key points whenever their leaders determine the time is opportune. Indeed Soviet Russia and her satellites would not hesitate to attack the United States directly if they believed they could do so successfully. Our national program and that of free democratic nations of the world must therefore be sufficiently broad and inclusive to meet any and all of these contingencies. It cannot and must not be confined merely to the immediate needs of the present situation in Korea.

When the United States undertook its defense program in 1939, we had idle factories, unemployed workers and copious supplies of materials available. Today, with peacetime industrial production at an all-time peak defense orders for new equipment cannot be filled without curtailing a substantial portion of our going national economy.

Our foreign-aid program is an integral part of our national and free-world defense program. The ECA and point-4 program supplement our defense effort and are equally essential to combat the Communist threat to world peace. They cannot be curtailed without inviting danger to ourselves and the free world.

These considerations lead to the inescapable conclusion: We can no longer safely continue on a "business as usual" basis. We must mobilize for defense. We must increase our production and adjust our economy to meet our needs and those of the free nations of the world.

There is no painless way to make the necessary changes in our national economy. The defense program initiated has already precipitated a wave of speculative buying, unjustified price increases, hoarding, and a serious threat of runaway inflation. Prices of basic commodities have advanced 15 percent since June 23.

These trends and developments cannot continue without serious consequences to the well-being of all our people. It is evident an unchecked inflation can and will wreck our defense program. It can only help those who wish to weaken and destroy our order and institutions. We must deal with this problem promptly and realistically. To meet this situation the executive council of the AFL offers the following program:

1. Prices: Price controls should be put into effect as soon as possible at levels prevailing during the month of June preceding the outbreak of the Korean war.

2. Taxes: Taxes must be increased, on a basis reflecting a genuine equality of sacrifice. There must be effective excess-profits tax because the best way of combatting inflation is to take the profits out of profiteering. Tax loopholes should be closed, estate and gift taxes should be strengthened. Congress should enact a progressive schedule of income tax rates, in accordance with ability to pay, as recommended to the Senate Finance Committee by the tax committee of the AFL.

3. Wages: We realize that inevitably wage controls may become necessary. However, we would point out that any attempt to freeze wages at present rates would do an irreparable injury to the economy and deal unfairly and unjustly with the wage earners of our land. Wages have already fallen far behind the rising cost of living. Wages therefore must be permitted to rise through the process of collective bargaining and otherwise, to meet these higher living costs and to establish a basis of parity. Wage adjustments must embrace as well compensation for increased productivity and in addition machinery must be provided for the adjustment of labor disputes and adjustment of grievances and labor must be adequately represented on such boards or commissions.

4. Rationing and material controls: The President should be given stand-by power to ration consumer goods whenever shortages develop and to regulate heavy industries and allocate scarce materials so that defense needs will have adequate priorities.

5. Manpower: There is no need for compulsory and rigid manpower controls. The problem of providing sufficient trained workers to man defense industries can be best solved by the voluntary cooperation of labor, management, and Government representatives. Any attempt to draft workers for jobs in private industry, operating for private profit, will defeat itself and prove disastrous to the war effort.

The foregoing program is not an easy one for the American people to take, especially as there is no present indication as to when the defense emergency may terminate. However, we are ready to make every necessary sacrifice to prevent a third world war. And we are certain that the only way to prevent such a war is to achieve an overwhelming superiority in armed strength on the part of the democratic nations of the world over the forces of Communist aggressors.

In this national and world emergency in order that labor may exert its full influence in maintaining peaceful bargaining relations with employers, enhance production and in all other ways render service to our National Government it is important that the Taft-Hartley law with its unfair and unjustified restrictions upon trade-union activities be annulled. Repeal of this obnoxious and undemocratic restrictive law is important and essential if we are to advance and further real and effective labor-management cooperation in this emergency.

Far East Already Lost to America by Failure To Change Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD,

I include a very truthful, thoughtful, and wise article by Dorothy Thompson which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of August 15.

We would do well to pause and heed these words of wisdom before it is too late.

The article follows:

FAR EAST ALREADY LOST TO AMERICA BY FAILURE TO CHANGE FOREIGN POLICY

(By Dorothy Thompson)

Those of us who believe that the American foreign policy is utterly reckless and leading us straight into catastrophe are effectively disfranchised. There is only one party, and it is a war party. There is no patriotic leadership that challenges the course on which we have embarked, or has the brains or the courage to chart another.

The present course is to offer ourselves as the policemen of the world, to enforce, by the sacrifice of American lives and fortune, the court orders (as it were) of United Nations countries who will not or cannot themselves fight to enforce them, and to put down aggression wherever it may raise its ugly head, in whatever corner of the globe.

The "law against aggression," which Mr. Truman, the generals, and the majority of Republicans have committed us to "police" is now law. There is not even a definition of aggression in the UN Charter. There is no impartial judgment to which it can be referred The judges include the charged aggressors or their partisans. There is no international police force to execute judgment, nor is any nation required to commit its own forces.

ARENA FOR POWER POLITICS

The United Nations, divided into two factions sharing no common notions of civilization, law or order, is, as an institution to enforce peace, pure fiction. It is, in fact, an arena for the great game of power politics. Stalin and company, who know this, use it for what it is and play the game supremely well, while our vacant-minded leaders appoint the American people to be the Galahads of the world, to liberate all victims of aggression—whether they want to be liberated or not. Since the process, once the initial aggression has succeeded, involves the wholesale destruction of the countries and inhabitants to be liberated, enthusiasm is notably lacking. That is the lesson of Korea.

The Russian game is to fight for nobody except Russians. It is to use the armies of its allies to fight Russia's enemies, under the conditions Russia picks.

Now, I submit that if the United States irrevocably commits herself to fighting for all who won't or can't fight for themselves, while Russia pours into the fray only her allies' resources while reserving her own, there can be but one outcome. The final phase of the conflict will find the west utterly exhausted, its forces dispersed, and unable to defend itself on its own ground.

WAR WE CANNOT WIN

Stalin's game is to involve this country in war with China. It is a war we cannot win, morally, politically, or militarily.

We cannot win it morally because no Asiatic trusts the foreign devil, no matter what banner he carries.

We cannot win it politically, because we have not one ally in Asia—having already done our best to extirpate all western influences and sympathetic powers. A policy which commands the British to get out of India and the Dutch out of Indonesia, and then decides to support the French in Indochina—who desperately need their troops to defend France in France; which refuses to support Chiang in China, and then decides to support him in Formosa; and which totally disarms Japan and then decides to defend it, is not a policy. It is a tale told by an idiot. Nehru's recent bitter words about both Russia and America were spoken by a true Asiatic.

We cannot win a war involving China militarily. If there is any general who can tell us how to accomplish what Asiatic Japan could not, or how to overcome by any sort of superduper weapon the numerical superiority of half a billion Asiatics, fighting on familiar terrain, highly trained in guerrilla tactics and utterly careless of death; or how to blockade a land mass with interior sources of supply that reach from the Yellow Sea to the Elbe in Europe, let that genius arise and tell us how.

We have already lost Asia, chiefly by the great Nationalist revolts that the last war let loose, aided by our own past policies.

It is a loss we can acknowledge and sustain.

For Stalin has not yet won Asia. He wants us to win it for him, by a war with China, which will force China into servitude to Russia.

Wisconsin Conservation Congress — A Symbol of Badger Pioneering in Conservation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 16 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress, a grass-roots organization embodying the very finest ideals of public participation in regulation of sports and wildlife activities. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the statement be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that there be appended to it the Conservation Congress Roster for 1950-51.

There being no objection, the statement and roster were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. President, I might preface my remarks by referring to the conservation pledge:

"I give my pledge as an American to defend from waste, to work for wise use and good management of my country's natural resources—its soil and minerals, its forests, waters, and wildlife."

This pledge symbolizes the ideal of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress. In the current issue of the Wisconsin Conservation Bulletin, published at Madison, Wis., there is a very fine write-up on the work of this splendid organization. The bulletin describes the Madison 1950 meeting of the Conservation Congress, representing all 71 counties of my State and constituting a symbol of the Badger State's pioneering in grass-roots decisions on fish and wildlife regulation.

The 1950 congress was described as the best in the 15-year history of the congress. The meeting came up with recommendations on fish and game which were based on the best interests of the 3,500,000 people of Wisconsin and the natural resources with which they have been blessed.

I point out the Wisconsin Conservation Congress because I feel a tremendous sense of pride that it is America's Dairyland—wonderful Wisconsin—a fishing paradise, which is showing the rest of the Nation how citizens can get together, discuss the facts on varied subjects like combating of stream pollution, opposition to unnecessary engineering projects and dams, restoration of wildlife habitat, greater cooperation between Federal, State, and local wildlife authorities, hunting safety programs, stream stocking, game licenses, hunting seasons, and dozens of interrelated issues.

In the past we in America have been prodigal in dissipating our precious resources. We have looked on with indifference to the deepening scarcity of what has been summarized as "fin, fur, and feather." We have watched our forests being chopped down, our streams being befouled, our most beautiful recreational areas being defiled. No wonder our Waltonians have risen in response to this challenge.

The Wisconsin Conservation Congress shows how the average man in the street, the merchant, the laboring man, the salesman, the doctor, the lawyer, and every other type of individual can develop leadership at the grassroots to cooperate with a State conservation commission and State conservation department.

The Wisconsin experiment has been watched eagerly by all 47 other States in the Union. Upon its continuing success will depend much of the success throughout the rest of our country in preserving our resources. Make no mistake, conservation does not mean merely having more fish to catch, more birds, and deer. It means having a total program for preservation of the tangible as well as the intangible values of American field and stream.

I salute, therefore, all of the folks in all of the 71 counties who have worked so hard toward making the Wisconsin Conservation Congress the symbol of American conservation leadership. I express moreover my sincere appreciation to them for their many gracious endorsements of my efforts on behalf of conservation. Their kind letters and telegrams encourage me to carry on in the fight.

A Good Medical Prescription by Dr. Fair Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Louisville Times of August 7 states the case for Federal aid to medical education well and concisely; it stresses the importance of this crucial legislation to national defense as well as to the survival of many of the Nation's medical schools:

A GOOD MEDICAL PRESCRIPTION BY DR. FAIR DEAL

In the present crisis, which is not likely to be over soon, the Times believes that Congress ought to submit to highly critical scrutiny any social legislation involving large expenditures. The country's situation is not exactly what it was in the years 1941-45, when President Roosevelt said Dr. New Deal had been replaced by Dr. Win-the-War. Nevertheless, a time has certainly come when it behooves Dr. Fair Deal to go into at least partial retirement. Dr. Fair Deal has, however, written at least one prescription which still ought to be filled. He wrote it before the crisis, but the crisis has only increased its importance.

It is in the form of the administration-backed Biemiller bill to extend a 5-year emergency Federal-aid program to medical, dental, nursing, and related schools. International events are obviously not going to relieve this country's shortage of doctors, dentists, and nurses. Instead, the Korean crisis already has sent the Armed Forces in quest of these people and has emphasized again the fact that there are too few of them.

Professional education—especially medical education—is a long process. The Biemiller bill plainly could not increase the supply of doctors, dentists, and nurses at once. But it is a prudent measure of preparedness, civil and military, whether the future holds war, or an indefinite prolongation of what we have now, or peace.

We find impressive support for filling Dr. Fair Deal's prescription in a statement made late in July by Dr. George W. Bakeman of the Medical College of Virginia: "Up to this time the administration of the Medical College of Virginia has hesitated to take any strong stand in regard to the question of Federal support for medical education, as we have hoped that under peacetime conditions the somewhat slower but more normal current development of institutional facilities would take care of the increased demand for medical personnel. We have felt keenly the need of additional funds in this medical center, but we have at the same time so strongly disapproved of increasing Federal expenditures that we have been reluctant to give voice to our own needs.

"Now, however, the national emergency is going to require so many more doctors in the Armed Forces that there seems no possibility of our existing schools meeting the requirements of the country over the next 10 years without materially increased funds. I doubt very seriously that we can obtain sufficient support from local sources."

Thus Dr. Bakeman now supports Federal aid. So for some time has Dr. Murray Kinsman, head of the University of Louisville medical school. The subject is of vital importance to the Louisville school, Kentucky's only one, and to the State as a whole, where doctors, dentists, and nurses are in extremely short supply. According to Lorenzo Martin, the Times' Washington correspondent, the Biemiller bill will be considered probably this week in the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. We hope that Kentucky's member of that committee, Representative TOM UNDERWOOD of Lexington, will support it.

Old-Age Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, the problem of providing economic security to the retired worker is today a matter of top priority. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial relating to the old-age security problem which appeared in the August 15 edition of the Washington Evening Star:

THE PROBLEM OF THE AGING

The National Conference on Aging—which comes to a close here today—has been overshadowed by news about war and rumors of war. But the problem it has been dealing with is nevertheless one of paramount importance to the future well-being of America, politically, economically, and socially.

In 1900 1 out of every 25 Americans was aged 65 years or over—a total, all told, of 3,080,000. Today, a half century later, the total in this oldster bracket, out of a national population of 150,000,000, is 11,514,000, or one out of every 13. The figure, moreover, is growing at such a rate that it is expected to reach 20,000,000 within the next three decades.

Proportionately speaking, owing to improved medicine and surgery and to the striking gain in average life expectancy since 1900, what this means is that the number of Americans 65 years or over is growing faster than the number of the young. In itself, that fact would not necessarily constitute a serious problem, but the unfortunate reality is that most of our aging people are finding it more and more difficult to support themselves and lead happy and constructive lives after their retirement from gainful full-time employment—a retirement that is compulsory in many of our industrial enterprises.

Thus, of the 11,514,000 Americans now in the 65-and-up age group, approximately a third—3,500,000—have no cash income whatever. Another third have an income of less than $500 a year. Of the total, according to the Census Bureau, only between 10 to 20 percent have attained financial independence. In other words, most of our aging citizens are dependent on Government aid, private charity and/or the help of their younger relatives, who in large numbers are reluctant to bear the burden. In short, the situation is one in which the average oldster is having a tough and lonely time trying to keep body and soul together.

Under our program of social security, old-age benefits this year will amount to $2,735,000,000, or close to five times the total in 1939. A decade from now, when 14,700,000 Americans are expected to be over 65, this aid, if it is kept within its present individual limitations, will involve an outlay of $6,767,000,000 annually, and if it goes up to $100 a month, it will cost more than $17,000,000,000. These staggering figures serve as a measure of the problem of the aging—a problem whose solution, in economic terms, is likely to require a system of part-time employment and broader private pension plans.

Further, wholly apart from its economic aspects—including the oldsters' importance as a great consumer market whose purchasing power has a key bearing on our over-all prosperity—this highly complex problem has significant political and social implications. As far as politics go, such a big segment of our population, if shabbily dealt with, would be meat for the demagogs. And socially, of course, as a simple human matter, it is in the Nation's interest that its aging citizens should be able to live out their sunset years in reasonable contentment.

Needless to say, this is not a problem that can be solved overnight by a magic formula. But a sound, step-by-step solution to it can be worked out by just such conferences as the one now drawing to a close. At any rate, though put in the shade by more critical and more urgent world events, it is serious enough to require sober thinking and planning—not least of all because our average life expectancy is steadily increasing and may, according to some scientists, be in excess of 100 years in the predictable future.

After Korea?—China?—Formosa?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, the Korean war came as a great surprise to the American public and the Congress.

Early in June 1950 President Truman had said that peace was nearer than at any time since 1945.

The first that Congress knew of the proposed action was the reading of the press release announcing the President's decision. No message to the Congress. In fact no message came for over 3 weeks Even now, as then, the President has never admitted that we are at war, or that any national emergency exists. But, the casualty lists come in daily.

The Korean conflict was called a police action against bandit gangs armed with heavy tanks to support the plea of the United Nations which we invited. No such reason was given for sending the Seventh Fleet to protect Formosa. That was Truman's own decision.

In the early days some military men referred to the Korean affair, somewhat callously, as a "game." Losses of life, they said, must be expected. "That's part of the game." It is not a game in my book, and I am sure the hard faces of life, and death, have not convinced them that it is not.

The question everyone is asking now, in spite of the President's reassuring words, is: How did we get this way?

It's a long story, but I will try to tell it as briefly as possible:

Since China is such a vital part of the Far East, let's go back as far as the Cairo conference late in 1943. With Russia not in the war against Japan, Stalin was absent. Present were Churchill, Roosevelt, and Chiang Kai-shek, then known and heralded as the "Great Christian General" and the "Washington of the Orient." China had been weakened by many years of war with Japan, and had come to the point of "throwing in the sponge." We needed China's help against the Japs. President Roosevelt, with Churchill's OK, promised Chiang that if he would keep on fighting, Manchuria, control of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and other Japanese-captured provinces would be restored to the Chinese Republic. Chiang fought on.

Then came Yalta, in February of 1945, just before Roosevelt's death, where Alger Hiss was FDR's adviser. You can't say right-hand man. Hiss was too far left to be right of anything. Chiang was not present, since China was not in the war against Germany. Churchill and Roosevelt there promised Stalin that if he would get into the war against Japan—which he did a very few days before the surrender—Russia would be given, among other concessions, Manchuria, South Sakhalin, and the Kuriles. Russia has them now. Sakhalin and the Kuriles are much more dangerous daggers pointing at Japan than South Korea.

Somewhere, some time—it's quite a mystery—it was agreed that Russia should enter North Korea to accept the surrender of the Japanese north of the 38th parallel. Although she helped not a whit to beat Japan, Russia was in North Korea weeks ahead of our entry into South Korea, where we were to take the surrender of the Japanese—all this was confirmed by Truman at Potsdam—the Russians stayed in North Korea, built up a nation of stooges and an army, equipped it well, and defied the United Nations when it tried to hold a Korea-wide election. Then, on June 25, 1950, came the attack. More of this later.

Back to China:

For some unfathomable reason—love of Russia, sheer stupidity, or the influence of men like Hiss, all unforgiveable—China, once Japan was conquered, was blacklisted. With Japan out of the way, Russia could then get going in that land of teeming millions, especially after we turned over the fabulous resources of Manchuria. Russia lost no time. Communist China moved fast. We pulled our troops out of China, gave up bases at Shanghai and Tsingtao, left millions of dollars of supplies behind us, and brought the Marines back to the United States. Chiang was driven back to Formosa.

How did that happen? Uncle Sam, upon advice of our State Department—Hiss, Acheson, Lattimore, et al.—said the China situation was just a revolt of Chinese agrarians—farmers—against, according to State Department propaganda, the corrupt, wicked, vile Chiang—the same man who for so long fought Japan for China.

Since they had started playing "footsie" with the Commies, our State Department decreed that Chiang must take the Communists into his arms. General Marshall was sent to China to force Chiang to accept Communists into his government. Chiang knew that would be the end of the Chinese Nationalist Republic. He refused. Marshall was angry. Upon his return he became Secretary of State. All military aid to China was stopped. It is still stopped. Though we had furnished them guns, planes, combat vehicles, and weapons, the United States denied them ammunition, fuel, and repairs. The rest is history. Without our military aid China, with rich resources and 600,000,000 people to be enslaved to work for Russia, fell to the Communists.

China is the heart and soul, the key, to all the Far East. Without Communists in Manchuria and China there would have been no Communist North Korean Army. With no Communist North Korean Army, American boys would not today be fighting and dying in Korea, the lousiest place in the world to fight—to die, where our military and economic strength can be sapped—and for what? Certainly nothing of any real permanent value.

Let us look at some other angles regarding Korea. Remember, I was there 2½ years ago.

I felt then that they did not like us; they wanted us out; they resented our trying to change their way of living. They stole us blind. Our military leaders then informed us South Korea had no military or strategic value. North Korea, with its power and industry, is the rich part. South Korea was and is impoverished. Now it is battle-scarred, blasted, desolate, ruined. We were told that if Russia wanted to, and would use the force she could muster, we could not hold it; that with no roads or railroads as we know them, with a 28-foot tide affecting the two harbors worthy of the name, we would face a most difficult problem of supply and reenforcements.

We eventually withdrew our troops and left in Korea over $125,000,000 worth of military supplies, such as jeeps, trucks, light arms, ammunition, clothing, and food.

From that time on Korea was no longer under MacArthur's Far East command. The State Department and the United Nations took over, and South Korea was denied tanks, planes, and any heavy military equipment. Such was the situation on June 25, 1950.

Undoubtedly MacArthur was surprised. I am sure he had little notice that he would be called upon to send an expeditionary force into South Korea. With what he had, with his men trained and equipped only for occupation—internal police—duty, not combat, he and the American troops serving under him have made a remarkable record. It takes weeks to assemble and prepare the men, munitions, material and supplies, for even a small military operation.

Since Formosa is also a key operation, let us look at it for a moment:

In December 1949 our military leaders recommended that a military mission be sent to Formosa to see what the needs were. The next day a secret message was sent by the State Department to its representatives saying military aid to Formosa would be useless—its loss was a foregone conclusion.

In January former President Hoover and others urged defense of Formosa, with our Navy if necessary. On January 5, 1950, President Truman said:

> The United States Government will not pursue a course which will lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China. Similarly, the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa."

That was followed by a statement by Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations:

> No, Mr. President, I shall not favor sending a single American boy with a gun in his hand to Formosa to settle a civil war six or seven thousand miles away from home, in order to appease the political ambitions and the oratorical frothings of Senators * * *. Mr. President, it is my belief that if we did what certain Senators propose, if we should go into Formosa and occupy it, we would have a liability on our hands instead of an asset.

Note: Korea was then not in the picture.

On January 12, in a news release, Mr. Truman still maintained we would give no aid to Formosa. On that same day Mr. Acheson in effect told Russia we would not defend Korea or Formosa when he declared our defensive line runs along the Aleutians, to Japan, to the Ryukyus, Okinawa, and the Philippines.

In March General Chennault predicted an early attack on Formosa. In May the American consul advised all Americans to leave the island.

All this time, however, our military leaders felt Formosa was strategically valuable—especially important that we should keep it out of enemy hands. Apparently the State Department's view that we should shun it then governed the President's decision, for, on June 23, 1950, Acheson said our policy of nonintervention in Formosa had not been changed.

Finally, on June 27, 1950, President Truman suddenly changed his mind and ordered the Seventh Fleet to defend Formosa, while ordering air and naval operations in support of South Korea. Confusing? Certainly.

There has been a lot of loose talk about Korean aid. Let us look at that:

Many of us who had been in Korea, who had seen how little results had been obtained from the hundreds of millions we had spent on economic aid while the Army was there, felt that it would be money wasted in more ways than one. Knowing, too, as we did, that South Korea could and possibly would be invaded at Russia's will and pleasure, we could see no good reason for fattening the Korean pig—for the Communist thief to steal. Neither could we see why the United States should carry the whole load. We also realized that what we spent came out of the pockets of American taxpayers who could ill afford to pour more dollars into a losing proposition.

There had been repeated reports of possible invasion. Border raids at the thirty-eighth parallel were daily occurences. Read these words from the Committee Report on Economic Aid to Korea, July 26, 1949:

There are factors which indicate that such a program is foredoomed to failure. Korea is hopelessly out-flanked by the adjacent land mass of China, and the peninsula has no connecting (land) link with any friendly continental power. * * * The flanks and the frontiers of South Korea are open to attack at any time by the militantly hostile forces of Communist aggression. * * * Every authority who has testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to the Korean situation has acknowledged that there could be no effective defense against an armed aggression originating in the northern half of the country.

If this is the case (that Soviet troops attached to the North Korean puppet government armies are in positions of command as well as acting as advisers) and there is no reason to doubt the report of the South Korean Government, the Soviet has actually entered the conflict along the frontier. This development may well presage the launching of a full-scale military drive across the thirty-eighth parallel. Unless this Nation is prepared to meet force with comparable force, economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety or the integrity of South Korea. To the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the lending of economic assistance at this time will only enhance the prize to be taken by force of arms and internal intrigue.

Our forces, with the exception of an advisory mission, have been withdrawn from South Korea at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation. With our forces on the scene of action, there might have been advanced substantial arguments in favor of economic assistance, but without the presence of an adequate force to protect delivery of, and guarantee practical utilization of, the great volume of material and supplies, it appears folly of the highest order to embark upon the program.

Admittedly this country has no policy with respect to the Orient. * * * What Korea requires, what China requires, what the United States requires is a statement of policy with respect to our future conduct in the Pacific and on the land mass of continental Asia. * * * Our position is untenable and indefensible.

It should be remembered, too, that the Lemocrat leaders in Congress and the administration failed to bring this bill for economic aid for Korea up for a vote until January 1950, 6 months after the committee had reported it. Apparently they did not think it very important then.

In other words, many of us who opposed it believed that, if any aid was to go to Korea, it should be military aid to make them secure against attack and the loss of whatever our help would later build up. In October 1949, $10,000,000 of military aid was granted for Korea, but actually only $200 worth of this aid ever got to Korea. That was some signal wire. None of the economic aid finally voted in February 1950 ever got there.

The State Department was in control all this time. It must have the answer. Maybe that answer is to be found in the words of Owen Lattimore, who now says we should admit Red China to the United Nations, published on July 17, 1949, in a liberal if not a radical paper—the Sunday Compass:

The thing to do was let Korea fall but not let it look as though we pushed it.

So, there it is, with South Korea washed out by the State Department, the Army withdrawn, and South Korea considered as of no military value, there was no reason to feel there was any wisdom in spending more money there. There was no reason for the military to ever believe they would be called upon to defend, let alone to hurriedly send an under-armed, under-manned expeditionary force into South Korea.

We are there.

So, the question is: Where do we go now?

Back, eventually, to the thirty-eighth parallel? That is the minimum, I suppose. That in itself will cost heavily, and would leave us just where this war started, with a divided Korea, a strong armed force in North Korea—plus a war-torn South Korea—which I assume we will be asked to rebuild—and the necessity for maintaining a strong defense force for a long time at a huge cost.

Go north of the thirty-eighth parallel? How far? Undertake a major war to drive Communist forces back to the Manchurian border? Manchurian and Chinese Red forces are there too—close to their supplies. Should we go up that far and be in a position to be squeezed between Chinese and Manchurian forces?

I have written the State Department and the Department of Defense trying to find out what, if any, plans they have. They have none. The Truman administration is still drifting from hour to hour, from day to day. We need—we must have—a plan, a program, a goal, and men capable of carrying it out and bringing us victory. Personally I do not trust those who got us into this mess to get us out of it. Acheson either cannot or will not. It is time for a change.

Since hundreds of thousands of Chinese Nationalist guerrilla troops are still fighting the Communists in China, perhaps an answer is yet to be found in China, by paying, or subsidizing if you prefer, the Chinese province generals to fight on Chiang's side—our side—against the Chinese Communists. We would probably have to pay the Chinese soldiers under these generals, possibly $1, American, a month. There is no Chinese Army as we know an army. It is composed of separate little armies each under its own leader. We may have to see that the rice gets into the mess gear of these soldiers. We will have to see that they are clothed and warm. And, finally, we will have to supply them weapons and ammunition. That done, I am sure, from what I learned when I was in China, millions of Chinese would fight for the Chinese Republic years on end. That would make Russia pull her forces out of North Korea. It would keep them out of French Indochina, Burma, and Siam, for they would have their hands full in the depths of China. Chiang does not ask for American lives and blood, he wants military supplies.

Frankly, we have a bear by the tail. If we let go it may turn on us and destroy us. If we hold on we will get dragged, bruised, and possibly killed.

Whether this is the prelude to world war III or not, no one knows. Whether it can be localized in Korea, nobody can foretell.

The outlook is dark. The answer is not here. There is one refuge: Our faith in God and the prayer that in His infinite wisdom He, as He alone can, will give us the answer and the wisdom and strength to carry on.

Questions and Answers on Old-Age and Survivors Insurance—Questions and Answers on State-Federal Public Assistance and Welfare Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleagues will welcome any assistance that may be furnished to them in these burdensome days, in answering inquiries relating to social-security legislation. There has been prepared at my request a series of questions and answers explaining the social-security law as it now exists and the changes under H. R. 6000 when it shall have become law. I hope this will prove useful to my colleagues.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting in the Appendix of the RECORD the questions and answers to which reference has been made:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE

1. What is the purpose of the old-age and survivors insurance program under the Social Security Act?

(a) Present law: It is to insure workers in covered employment against wage loss of old age and to provide survivor insurance for these workers in the event of their death. Supplementary benefits are provided to the aged wife and dependent children under age 18 of such retired workers and survivors benefits are provided for widows, children, and sometimes aged dependent parents of deceased workers.

(b) H. R. 6000: In addition to the above protection furnished to workers by the present act, monthly benefits are provided for dependent aged husbands and widowers of insured women workers and also on a more liberal basis to surviving children of deceased women workers.

2. To what are the monthly benefits in each case directly related?

The monthly benefits in each case are directly related to the wages earned by the worker in employments covered by the program.

3. In general who does old-age and survivors insurance cover?

(a) Present law: In general, covers workers in industry and commerce and excludes the following: The self-employed household workers (domestics), employment in agriculture, nonprofit organizations, Government employees, and railroad employees.

(b) H. R. 6000: In addition coverage (beginning in 1951) is provided for the following new groups: The self-employed, except farmers, and certain professional workers (such as doctors and other medical men, lawyers, engineers, accountants, etc.), nonprofit organizations on an elective basis, regularly employed domestic workers, agricultural processing workers off the farm, and regularly employed farm workers, Federal, State, and local employees not covered by a retirement system (such State and local government employees on an elective basis), Americans employed by an American employer outside the United States, and employment in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

4. Are teachers, policemen, firemen and other State and local government employees already covered under their own retirement systems brought into social security by H. R. 6000?

No. State and local government employees already covered by their own retirement systems are specifically excluded from coverage under H. R. 6000.

5. The amount of the taxable wages paid to the worker is reported to whom?

The amount of the taxable wages paid to the worker is reported to the Bureau of Internal Revenue every 3 months by the employer, who pays at the same time his and his employees' contributions, or premiums, as required under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act.

6. What portion of the wages of a covered employee is taxed?

(a) Present law: All wages up to $3,000 a year paid a covered worker by each of his employers subject to that act are taxable.

(b) H. R. 6000: All wages up to $3,600 a year paid a covered worker by each of his employers subject to that act are taxable.

7. What is the contribution rate on these wages?

(a) Present law: The contribution rate on these wages is 1 percent each for employer and employee for all years up through 1949. In 1950, the rate is scheduled to rise to 1½ percent each, and in 1952 and thereafter to 2 percent.

(b) H. R. 6000: The contribution rate for employer and employee is scheduled to be as follows: 1½ percent each for 1950–53, 2 percent each for 1954–59, 2½ percent each for 1960–64, 3 percent each for 1965–69, 3¼ percent each for 1970 and thereafter.

The self-employed persons who are covered contribute 1½ times the employee tax rate, or, in other words, three-fourths of the combined employer-employee rate, namely: 2¼ percent in 1951–53, 3 percent in 1954–59, 3¾ percent in 1960–64, 4½ percent in 1965–69, 4⅞ percent in 1970 and thereafter.

8. What special provisions as to taxes apply for employment by nonprofit organizations and State and local governments?

(a) Present law: These groups are not covered under present system.

(b) H. R. 6000: The nonprofit organization is not required to pay tax as an employer; however, the organization may waive the tax and elect coverage and then for such coverage to be effective at least two-thirds of the employees must concur in coverage. All employees concurring in coverage and all new employees are then covered. Employees of State and local governments are covered only if they are not under an existing retirement system and if their employer elects such coverage.

9. Who keeps the wage records?

The employer wage reports are forwarded by the Bureau of Internal Revenue to the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance of the Social Security Administration which keeps a continuous record of each worker's wage credits under his individual social-security account number.

10. What do these wage credits determine?

They determine the worker's insured status and the amount of benefits for which he and his dependents may qualify.

11. What amount of the worker's wages is taxed?

(a) Present law: Not more than $3,000 a year; if any tax is collected on more than this amount, the excess is refunded.

(b) H. R. 6000: Not more than $3,600 a year; if any tax is collected on more than this amount, the excess is refunded.

12. What is the maximum wage credits allowed a worker for any calendar year?

(a) Present law: Cannot exceed a maximum of $3,000.

(b) H. R. 6000: Cannot exceed a maximum of $3,600.

13. Upon what is the amount payable to persons entitled to monthly benefits based?

The monthly benefits are based on the worker's average monthly wage.

14. How is the average monthly wage determined?

(a) Present law: It is determined by dividing his total wage credits by the number of months he could have worked under the system—that is the number of months between 1936 or beginning with attainment of age 22, if later, and the first month of the quarter in which he becomes entitled to benefits or dies.

(b) H. R. 6000: In general, it is determined in the same manner as under existing law except that a "new start" average beginning after 1950 may be used for those having 6 quarters of coverage after 1950.

15. How is the worker's retirement (or primary) benefit computed?

(a) Present law: It is 40 percent of the first $50 of his average monthly wage plus 10 percent of the next $200, with the resulting amount then being increased by 1 percent for each year of coverage (a year in which the worker received $200 or more in covered employment).

(b) H. R. 6000: For those with a "new start" average wage (see previous question), it is 50 percent of the first $100 of his average monthly wage plus 15 percent of the next $200. For all other individuals (including present beneficiaries, the benefit is computed under present law (but with no 1 percent increase for years after 1950), and is then increased by means of a special conversion table (described in question No. 18). Further those who do have a "new start" average wage may use the conversion table if it produces a larger benefit than this new formula.

16. Give an example showing how the primary benefit is computed under the present law.

Assume that the worker's average monthly wage is $150 and that he has 20 years of coverage. Then his monthly benefit is 40 percent of $50 (or $20) plus 10 percent of $100 (or $10) plus 20 percent of the preceding two items (or 20 percent of $30 which equals $6) giving a grand total of $36.

17. Give an example showing how the primary benefit is computed under H. R. 6000:

Assume that the worker's average monthly wage is $200. His benefit is then 50 percent of $100 (or $50) plus 15 percent of $100 (or $15) giving a total of $65.

18. What is done about the amount of the benefits for those now on the rolls?

A special conversion table is provided which adjusts these benefits upward, effective after September 1950, by as much as 100 percent for those with the lowest benefits to 50 percent for those with the highest benefits (with the average benefit increasing by 77½ percent). This is done, in part, to recognize the increase in the cost of living and in part to recognize the more liberal benefit formula for those who will retire in the near future, including those who will retire in the immediate future.

19. To what are the benefits payable to worker's dependents and survivors related?

The benefits payable to a worker's dependents and survivors are related to the amount that his wage record would yield as his own primary benefit at the time the computation is made.

20. At what age can a fully insured worker become entitled to a primary old-age benefit?

(a) Present law: He must be at least 65 years old.

(b) H. R. 6000: He must be at least 65 years old.

21. If the worker is fully insured and has become entitled to a primary benefit, what supplementary benefits are payable to his dependents?

(a) Present law: Supplementary benefits equal to half the primary benefits are payable to his wife if she is at least 65 years old, and to each unmarried dependent child under age 18.

(b) H. R. 6000: Supplementary benefits equal to half the primary benefit are payable to his wife if she is at least 65 years old, or if there is an unmarried dependent child under 18 present, and to each such child. In addition, under certain circumstances, such benefits are payable to the dependent husband if he is at least 65 years old.

22. What is the amount of a widow's benefit, and when is it payable?

(a) Present law: The widow's benefit is three-fourths of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death, and it is payable after the widow reaches age 65.

(b) H. R. 6000: The widow's benefit is three-fourths of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death, and it is payable after the widow reaches age 65. In addition, under certain circumstances, such a benefit is payable to a dependent widower after he reaches age 65.

23. What benefits are payable to a deceased worker's widow when children are present?

(a) Present law: The widow's benefit is three-fourths and each child's benefit is one-half of the monthly amount of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death.

(b) H. R. 6000: The widow's benefit is three-fourths and each child's benefit is one-half the monthly amount of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death. An additional one-fourth of the primary benefit is payable to the family.

24. What is the amount of a parent's benefit, and under what conditions is it payable?

(a) Present law: The parent's benefit is one-half the monthly amount of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death. It is payable after the parent reaches age 65 and only if the deceased worker left no widow or children under 18 and if the parent was chiefly dependent on the deceased worker.

(b) H. R. 6000: The parent's benefit is three-fourths the monthly amount of the insured worker's primary benefit computed from his wage record at the time of his death. It is payable after the parent reaches age 65 and only if the deceased worker left no widow, dependent widower, or children under 18 and if the parent was chiefly dependent on the deceased worker.

25. What are the minimum and maximum amounts of monthly benefits payable to a retired worker without considering any supplementary amount for his dependents?

(a) Present law: The minimum is $10 a month and the maximum as of 1950 is $45.60 a month.

(b) H. R. 6000: The minimum is $25 a month unless the average monthly wage is less than $35 (then the minimum is graded down to $20 for average monthly wages of $30 or less) and the maximum for the next year and a half is $68.50 a month.

26. What are the minimum and maximum amounts of monthly benefits payable on the basis of any worker's wage record?

(a) Present law: The minimum for the total benefits payable is $10 a month, while the maximum is $85, twice the primary benefit, or 80 percent of the average monthly wage, whichever is least.

(b) H. R. 6000: The minimum is $15 a month, while the maximum is $150 a month, or 80 percent of the average monthly wage, whichever is least.

27. Under what conditions are lump-sum death payments made, and how is their amount determined?

(a) Present law: The lump-sum death payment is made if there is no survivor immediately entitled to monthly benefits. The payment amounts to six times the worker's primary benefit and is made to the surviving spouse; if there is no such spouse, then the lump sum is payable to the person who paid the funeral expenses (but in no case can it exceed such expenses).

(b) H. R. 6000: The lump-sum death payment is made for all deaths of insured workers. The payment amounts to three times the worker's primary benefit and is made to the surviving spouse; if there is no such spouse, then the lump sum is payable to the person who paid the funeral expenses (but in no case can it exceed such expenses).

28. Show by a table the monthly amounts payable to a single retired worker and to a married couple on the basis of various assumed years of coverage and average monthly wages.

(See table 1.)

29. Show by a table the monthly amounts payable to the survivors of a deceased worker.

(See table 2.)

30 Show by a table the lump-sum death payments payable in respect to a deceased worker.

(See table 3.)

31. How does the covered employee qualify for a retirement benefit?

(a) Present law. He must be fully insured.

(b) H. R. 6000: He must be fully insured.

32. When is a covered employee fully insured?

(a) Present law: He is fully insured if he has received $50 or more in covered employment in at least one-half the number of calendar quarters elapsing after 1936 (or attainment of age 21, if later) and the quarter in which he reaches age 65 or dies (whichever is first). A minimum of 6 such quarters of coverage is required, and a maximum of 40 such quarters will make a worker permanently fully insured. For workers now near age 65, or beyond, such insured status can be acquired with fewer quarters of coverage.

(b) H. R. 6000: Same as present law except that a "new start" provides that the quarters of coverage (which may be acquired any time after 1936) must at least equal half the quarters after 1950 (or attainment of age 21, if later) and the quarter in which he reaches age 65 or dies (whichever is first). There is the same minimum of 6 quarters of coverage required and a maximum of 40 such quarters. Thus all persons now age 62 or over need have only 6 quarters of coverage whether acquired in the past or in the future in order to be fully insured. However, this "new start" is not applicable for deaths prior to September 1950.

33. On what basis are survivor benefits payable?

All types of survivor benefits are payable if the deceased worker was fully insured. Even if the deceased worker were not fully insured, the lump-sum death payment and monthly survivor benefits for children and the widowed mother are available if the deceased worker was currently insured.

34 When is a worker currently insured?

The worker is currently insured if at his death he has received $50 or more in covered wages or $100 or more in covered self-employment in at least 6 out of the last 13 calendar quarters including the quarter in which he died.

35. What conditions as to income and retirement from gainful work are imposed on beneficiaries?

(a) Present law: Benefits are not payable for any month in which the beneficiary has wages of $15 or more from covered employment. There are no restrictions on the amount of income from investments or earnings from noncovered employment.

(b) H. R. 6000: Benefits are not payable for any month in which the beneficiary has wages or self-employment income of more than $50 from self-employment income or more than $50 from covered employment. There are no restrictions on the amount of income from investments or earnings from noncovered employment.

36. What special benefits are provided for veterans?

(a) Present law: Special survivor benefits are payable for veterans who died within 3 years after discharge if no veterans' pensions are payable.

(b) H. R. 6000: The above provision is continued, and in addition wage credits of $160 for each month of military service are given to veterans and also in respect to those who died in service.

37. What provisions are made for Government contributions to the financing of the system?

(a) Present law: Authorization is provided, although it has not as yet been used, for appropriations from the general Treasury as may be required to finance the program. In addition, the added cost due to the special veterans' benefits described previously is currently being met from the general Treasury.

(b) H. R. 6000: There are no provisions as to appropriations from the general Treasury for financing the system since it is anticipated that the rates provided will be sufficient to make the system self-supporting.

38. Are farm workers covered under H. R. 6000?

(a) Present law: Not covered.

(b) H. R. 6000: Yes; but in order to be covered a farm worker must work 3 months for a single employer and then in the following quarter must work 60 full days and receive $50 cash wages from the same employer.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON STATE-FEDERAL PUBLIC ASSISTANCE AND WELFARE SERVICES

1. What is the purpose of State-Federal public-assistance programs?

Notwithstanding old-age and survivors insurance, there will always be some persons in the population who cannot meet their needs through their own efforts and who are not covered by or entitled to insurance benefits, and also persons entitled to benefits who need supplementary income; therefore the Federal Government makes grants-in-aid to the States to aid them in giving financial assistance to groups of needy persons.

2. What groups of needy persons are eligible for State-Federal public assistance?

(a) Present law: The needy aged 65 years of age and over; the needy blind; and dependent children—under the age of 16 or under the age of 18 if regularly attending school, who are living with relatives and have been deprived of parental support or care by reason of death, continued absence from the home, or incapacity of a parent.

(b) H. R. 6000: The needy aged 65 years of age and over; the needy blind; dependent children—this program would be modified so that the relative with whom a dependent child is living is classified as a recipient for Federal matching purposes, and needy children as under present law; permanently and totally disabled needy persons. Federal grants-in-aid to the State would be provided for assistance to this group on the same matching basis as for old-age assistance and aid to the blind.

3. To what extent does the Federal Government share in the costs of State-Federal public-assistance programs?

(a) Present law: (1) Old-age assistance and aid to the blind: For Federal matching purposes the maximum payments are $50 per month. The Federal share of expenditures within these individual maximums is three-fourths of the first $20 of the State's average monthly payment plus one-half the remainder. Thus, for an individual payment of $50 or more, the maximum Federal share is $30.

(2) Aid to dependent children: For Federal matching purposes the maximum payments are $27 per month for the first child and $18 for each additional child in a family. The Federal share of expenditures within these individual maximums is three-fourths of the first $12 of the State's average monthly payment per child, plus one-half the remainder. Thus, for an individual payment of $27 or more for the first child in a family the maximum Federal share is $16.50, and for each additional child receiving a payment of $18 or more the maximum Federal share is $12.

(3) Administration costs: Federal Government bears one-half the expense incurred by the States in administering the programs.

(b) H. R. 6000: Federal share for aid to the permanently and totally disabled is the same as under present law for old-age assistance and aid to the blind. For aid to dependent children, there is included for Federal matching purposes all payments within individual maximums of $27 for the relative with whom the children are living. Administrative costs continue to be shared 50 percent by the Federal Government and 50 percent by the States for all categories.

4. May State-Federal assistance be furnished to individuals without regard to their income and resources?

(a) Present law: No. All income and resources available to a claimant of old-age assistance or aid to the blind or aid to dependent children must be taken into consideration in determining eligibility for or the amount of the assistance payment.

(b) H. R. 6000: (1) No change as to old-age assistance and aid to dependent children and the same requirement as for these two programs would apply to aid to the permanently and totally disabled.

(2) Aid to the blind: In order to encourage and assist blind persons to become self-supporting a State must, effective July 1, 1952, disregard earned income up to $50 per month (prior to then the State may disregard such income).

5. Are the State and local agencies administering aid to dependent children required to take any action to obtain support from their parents when children are on the rolls because they have been deserted or abandoned?

(a) Present law: No action is required.

(b) H. R. 6000: The agency administering the program would be required to notify the appropriate local law-enforcement officials of the furnishing of aid to any child who has been abandoned or deserted by a parent.

6. Are the States required to provide State-Federal public assistance to all individuals who are eligible under the State plans approved by the Federal Government?

(a) Present law: No specific Federal statutory requirement.

(b) H. R. 6000: The States would be required to furnish assistance to all persons who qualified under the State plans.

7. Is State-Federal public assistance furnished to persons in public institutions?

(a) Present law: No; except for persons in public medical institutions for short-time treatment.

(b) H. R. 6000: Recipients of old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled may reside in public medical institutions including nursing and convalescent homes without regard to the duration of such residence. Recipients residing in such mental institutions or tuberculosis sanitariums are not eligible for assistance.

8. How are other needy persons in the population who cannot qualify for one of the State-Federal public-assistance programs cared for?

The other needy persons are cared for under general assistance which is financed by States and/or local governmental units without Federal financial participation.

9. How do the public-assistance provisions apply to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands?

(a) Present law: Federal funds for public assistance are not available to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

(b) H. R. 6000: The four categories of assistance are extended to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The Federal share, for old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled is limited to one-half of the total sums expended under an approved plan up to a maximum payment for any individual of $30 per month. For aid to dependent children the Federal share is limited to one-half of the expenditures under an approved plan up to individual maximums of $18 for the first child and $12 for each additional child in a family. Administrative costs are matched by the Federal Government on a 50–50 basis. However, the maximum annual Federal grant shall be $4,250,000 for Puerto Rico and $160,000 for the Virgin Islands.

10. To what extent does the Federal Government participate in the costs incurred by the States for child-welfare services for neglected children, children in danger of becoming delinquent, etc.?

(a) Present law; Federal appropriations of $3,500,000 per year is authorized for grants to the States for child-welfare services.

(b) H. R. 6000: The authorization for Federal appropriations for this purpose would be increased to $10,000,000 per year.

11. What other changes would be provided by H. R. 6000 relative to child-welfare services?

A State would be authorized to use Federal funds to pay for the costs of returning runaway children to their homes in other States.

12. To what extent does the Federal Government participate in the costs incurred by the States for maternal and child health services?

(a) Present law: Federal appropriations of $11,000,000 per year is authorized for grants to the States for maternal and child health services.

(b) H. R. 6000: Authorization for Federal appropriations for this purpose would be increased to $15,000,000 for fiscal year beginning July 1, 1950, and to $16,500,000 for subsequent years.

13. To what extent does the Federal Government participate in the costs incurred by the States for services for crippled children?

(a) Present law: Federal appropriations of $3,500,000 per year is authorized for grants to the States for services for crippled children.

(b) H. R. 6000: The authorization for Federal appropriations for this purpose would be increased to $12,000,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1950, and $15,000,000 for subsequent years.

American Federation of Labor's Denunciation of Fake Peace Petitions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the RECORD on Monday, at page A5830, I reported on a new form of peace petition entitled "Petition To Ban H-Bomb and A-Bomb" and stated that it was alleged to be under the sponsorship of the National Labor Conference for Peace of Chicago. I inserted extracts furnished me by our Legislative Reference Service from the Daily Worker referring to this so-called conference for peace. In at least two places, the Daily Worker sought to leave the impression that this was an organization of delegates from the A. F. of L., the CIO, and independent unions. I also inserted an editorial from the Chicago Sun-Times referring to a vigorous repudiation of this petition by the Chicago Industrial Union Council, the central body of the CIO's 250,000 members in that city and vicinity. I shall now insert an equally vigorous and forthright statement by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor issued August 5. So as to emphasize them, I want to quote the first and the last paragraphs, although the whole statement is worthy of careful study and is a significant contribution to the effort being made by so many American groups and individuals to make crystal clear that this is the rank fraud which the executive council of the American Federation of Labor calls it. These paragraphs are as follows:

The American Federation of Labor vigorously condemns the so-called Stockholm peace appeal as a rank fraud. We urge every workingman and workingwoman to spurn the peddlers of this spurious petition. We call upon every loyal American, every true lover of peace, to refuse to sign or circulate it. We cannot urge too strongly every self-respecting American to treat those who are the organizers of this "Stockholm movement" and the purveyors of its petitions as enemies of the American people operating under false colors.

The Communists are not waging a peace offensive. The Communists are waging an offensive against peace, liberty, and social progress. The AFL is confident that organized labor will lead the Nation in unmasking and upbraiding these enemies within our country with the same determination that our Armed Forces are fighting against the Communist enemy from without.

It is indeed encouraging to have this expression of confidence that organized labor "will lead the Nation in unmasking and upbraiding these enemies within our country with the same determination that our Armed Forces are fighting against the Communist enemy from without."

I urge that our House Committee on Foreign Affairs give us, as the representative body of the American people, an immediate opportunity to join with the President, the executive department, our press and radio, and these patriotic and intelligent groups of Americans in a counteroffensive against these efforts by these Communists within our country. The exact form of any resolution is not of any importance. The opportunity to act on some clear resolution expressing the sense of this Congress as to the deceptive and vicious nature of these activities at this time, to add its voice to those who are exposing the nature of this outrageously false effort, and to indicate the way in which American citizens can support effectively honest efforts to secure peace in this world should be provided the Members of the House by its committee. I call particular attention to the fact that the schedule of these Soviet puppets points up to October 24. I submit that Members of this House should not be deprived of an opportunity to take effective action on House Concurrent Resolution 247 or some similar legislation in the immediate future.

The entire statement by the executive counsel of the American Federation of Labor is as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The American Federation of Labor vigorously condemns the so-called Stockholm peace appeal as a rank fraud. We urge every working man and working woman to spurn the peddlers of this spurious petition. We call upon every loyal American, every true lover of peace, to refuse to sign or circulate it. We cannot urge too strongly every self-respecting American to treat those who are the organizers of this "Stockholm movement" and the purveyors of its petitions as enemies of the American people operating under false colors.

Not only in far-off Korea do enemies of the American people disguise themselves as Americans. In our own country, in our factories, shops, offices, churches, schools, and on our streets, enemies of America also disguise themselves and pose as Americans. Camouflage is a Communist weapon of war which can be just as deadly against our sons and brothers in the United States as in Korea. The so-called Stockholm petition is precisely such a weapon.

This fake peace petition does not oppose all aggression with all weapons. It singles out only one weapon—the one in which our country still holds the lead and which provides our country and the other democracies with a measure of military security against the gigantic Russian war machine. Unlike America and the other democracies, totalitarian Russia never demobilized but only remobilized its fighting forces at the end of World War II in 1945. Were this fake peace maneuver to succeed, were the United States to fall into the Russian bear-trap of banning atomic weapons—while Russia rejects America's plan for their effective international inspection, control and elimination - the possibility for Communist world domination by the Soviets would be enormously enhanced. That is just what the petition-promoters and the sinister signature-seekers want.

As long as the democracies have atomic superiority, the Russian warlords fear and hesitate to use their own massive armies as direct instruments of aggression and conquest. They rely instead on Chinese, North Korean, Indochinese, anti-democratic Germans and other puppets and satellites for extending totalitarian tyranny and engaging in adventurist aggression. Since the policy of our country has been not to use atomic weapons against satellite aggressors and since the democracies have—under the Marshall plant and point 4—mobilized for peace and are unprepared for war, Moscow figures that its indirect, yet wanton, aggression can proceed unchecked.

Clearly the so-called peace petitioners seek to ban America's use of atomic weapons in order to enable Russia to catch up with and surpass our country in this field and to aid Moscow's catspaw aggressors by rallying public sentiment against the United States ever using such weapons against them. Cruel confirmation of this strategy of the Stockholm petitioners is at hand in Korea. That is why the Communist drive for signatures coincides with the Moscow-directed invasion of South Korea. It was carefully planned to hide and help the brutal aggression of the Soviet dictators against the people of Korea, the American people and the United Nations as an effective agency of world peace. In fact, nearly every man, woman, and even child in North Korea was forced to sign—or rather thumbprint—this "peace" petition only a few days before the Russian-inspired invasion of South Korea was started.

Moscow's "dove of peace" is only a lead pigeon out of which are made poisoned bullets against democracy. Those who sign this so-called peace petition are, knowingly or otherwise, serving Russian imperialism, aiding its bloody adventure in Korea, and helping the Soviet dictatorship to plunge mankind into another world war. Those who sign this petition are striking a dastardly blow at the United Nations. Those who circulate and sign this document are stabbing our own country in the back at this critical hour when thousands of Americans are giving away their lives in order to preserve peace, freedom, and human decency.

The Communists are not waging a peace offensive. The Communists are waging an offensive against peace, liberty, and social progress. The AFL is confident that organized labor will lead the Nation in unmasking and upbraiding these enemies within our country with the same determination that our Armed Forces are fighting against the Communist enemy from without.

National Security Panel for Independent Laboratories

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting excerpts from the report of the American Council of Commercial Laboratories, Inc., which sponsored the national security panel for independent laboratories. This report takes into consideration the cooperation that must exist between Government and independent laboratories with regard to research and development for defense if the country is to remain strong. It explains both the military side from the Government viewpoint and the independent laboratories viewpoint.

The report follows:

On December 2, 1949, the American Council of Commercial Laboratories, Inc., participated in a panel discussion of military procurement which was addressed by a group of distinguished speakers from the Department of Defense. Dr. Gustavus J. Esselen, of Boston, vice president of ACCL and vice president of the United States Testing Co., presided. In view of the military emergency a number of the statements made will repay a careful review.

Dr. Esselen said:

"The meeting will help to get better acquainted on both sides. It is a meeting of representatives of the Research and Development Board, the Munitions Board, Army, Navy, and Air Force under the auspices of the American Council of Commercial Laboratories.

"Speaking for the council, we feel we have a really vast amount of scientific talent and scientific equipment and experience which we'll be very glad to place at the disposal of whatever branch of the armed services can use them, and we are interested in finding out the best way of accomplishing this.

"Our first speaker is Dr. S. D. Cornell, Director of the Planning Division, Research and Development Board, of the Office of the Secretary of Defense."

QUALITY OF RESEARCH

Dr. Cornell said:

"Given the most perfect planning in the world, the quality of the research and development program is still in the last analysis entirely upon the quality of the laboratories and of the men and women who actually carry on the work. Planning is an important function. But without planning you can still get along; with the people doing the work, you cannot. And I am reminded of Dr. Esselen's little story—the people that do things are the important ones. The Board recognizes that ultimate success or failure of the research and development programs in assuring the technical supremacy of this country in the art of war depends on laboratories and staffs such as your own, and, of course, many, many others."

PRAISES ACCL AND SIMILAR GROUPS

Excerpts from the remarks of Col. Lewis S. Griffing, Chief of the Research Branch, Research and Development Group, Logistics Division, Department of the Army:

"I have been made constantly aware of the importance of yours and similar organizations in making available to the Government the materials with which a war is to be fought. It is such a truism that I almost hesitate to say it, but the contributions of American industry, particularly that of independent testing laboratories in the last war in speeding the production of the mass of essential items that were required, especially in the mass production of the innumerable small items that require special tooling, special testing, and particularly precise controls to insure that they meet the rigid specifications that the military set up—it was here that your laboratories made a tremendous contribution. It was so great as to be one of the number one things that American industry did. You must be particularly gratified at having played such an important part, and the fact that you are here today to discuss with the Army the ways and means indicates to me that you are anxious to continue to serve and be available for any emergency that we may have.

"I realize, of course, that your primary interests are with the American public. That is where the big market lies, and during peacetime, of course, that is where the life blood of industry is directed. But because that is true I think you are even better equipped to do your job with respect to the military than you would be otherwise.

"Organizations such as this council can be of very real aid to us in discharging our responsibilities, and you can do it best by passing on to us whatever pertinent information you have. We would like to know all you care to tell us of what you are doing. You may have some new devices. We are interested in them, of course, but more valuable to us may be the techniques or uses which you are developing.

"You may have some new methods in precision measurements that shorten testing time or which improve recording or controlling, or you may have made other progress in technical phases of production of such diverse items as tools, vehicles, electronic devices, fuels and lubricants, protective surfaces, etc."

Dr. Esselen said:

"May I say that while it is true that many of our organizations emphasize the side of their testing and analytical work, there are also many of our members which are research and development organizations, and still others which have research and development divisions to supplement the testing. You will find that the council is a well-rounded group and can help not only in your testing problems but in your research and development problems as well."

NAVY HAS RESEARCH SETUP

The next speaker was Dr. Alan T. Waterman, the deputy chief and chief scientist of the Office of Naval Research. Dr. Waterman is the author of a book entitled "The Combat Scientist."

"The Navy differs from the other departments in having a special office for research only, known as the Office of Naval Research which was established by act of Congress in 1946. It is the function of this office to coordinate research for the Navy and by its own program to supplement the work in the bureaus of the Navy. This does not mean that all the research for the Navy is done by the Office of Naval Research by any means.

"As a matter of fact, the Office of Naval Research encourages the research of the bureaus and in many cases actually supports it. But it does recognize the fact that research can be of a general nature which is of value to all developmental work, and that is one kind of responsibility of the Office. It also provides an agency which can keep in touch with all developmental work in the department and see to it that if bottlenecks develop on the research side, the office can be of assistance."

Excerpts from the remarks of Col. J. Stanley Holtoner, Chief of the Aircraft Branch in the Engineering Division, United States Air Force:

"Every business and industrial organization in the country which has the capacity for the development of Air Force matériel is of interest to us. The supply of technical personnel and the development facility afforded by all these organizations, is our most effective instrument for peace."

INDEPENDENT RESEARCH INTERESTS AIR FORCE

"Our organization for pursuing programs of research and development consists mainly of a small staff agency in the Air Force headquarters, and the operating agency at Wright Field, the Air Matériel Command. In addition, we have electric research and development stations at Cambridge, Mass., and Red Bank, N. J. Our aircraft flight testing is conducted at Muroc, Calif., and guided missile testing at Holloman in New Mexico. Our programs are developed on a continuing basis by Wright Field under the supervison of the Air Staff personnel of the Research and Development Directorate.

"The resulting programs are reviewed and approved by the Research and Development Board of the Department of Defense. The contracts for individual projects within a program are negotiated by the Procurement Division at Wright Field. These are based on procurement requests which have been furnished by the Engineering Division of Air Materiel Command.

"We realize that the wide dispersal of research and development activities is essential to defense against the potentialities of modern warfare; that the broad distribution of the research and development work contributes to the national potential; and that aggressive and progressive research and development requires new and radical points of view and approaches. When we make an analysis of research requirements we find that there are many common problems of basic research, applied research, development, and engineering."

SMALL BUSINESS AIDED BY DEFENSE DEPARTMENT

The last speaker was Col. Alfred B. Denniston, Chief, Office of Procurement Methods of the Munitions Board:

"In the procurement field the Munitions Board has two main responsibilities—the coordination of the procurement plans of the three departments and the recommendation of procurement responsibilities among the departments. In connection with these two responsibilities, these two missions, I would like to emphasize that the procurement itself, under both the Unification Act and its recent amendments, and under the Procurement Act of 1947 which is a companion act, is our bible. As far as buying is concerned, the responsibility rests in each department. The Department of Defense itself and its creature, the Munitions Board buys nothing, nor does it direct the buying of anything. The three Secretaries in their fields, in their departments, have the final responsibility for procurement. I think it is well to bear that in mind because it is not too well understood. The Unification Act as generally known throughout the country, I think, is considered to assign more authority, more responsibility to the top than is actually so—certainty in procurement.

"I think it will interest this group to know that we have in the Department of Defense what we think is a good small-business program. That, frankly, is one of our large problems. It is a difficult problem. We base that on several acts of Congress and the Procurement Act of 1947, in which there was the statement that 'it is the intent of the Congress that small business receive a fair share of military procurement.' Thirty percent of our dollar value in fiscal 1949 went to qualified small business directly. And a large additional volume of dollars went to small business as sustaining contractors."

Shall We Use the Veto?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include a very timely and pertinent editorial entitled "Must We Avoid the Veto?" which appeared in the August 12, 1950, issue of the magazine America. The article follows:

MUST WE AVOID THE VETO?

Developments at Lake Success have amply justified Russia's decision to end her 6½-month boycott of the Security Council. They have also justified her choice of Jacob A. Malik as the mouthpiece of the Politburo. Mr. Malik has skillfully exploited his position as president of the Council. He has exhibited, too, a viciousness and a venom unequaled by either Vishinsky or Gromyko.

Malik's outrageously mendacious propaganda speeches, which he injects into the proceedings at will, are directed at the still independent peoples of Asia. There, we may be sure, they will be used with good effect by the local comrades. Even if the representatives of the free nations on the Council were skillful enough to throw Malik's lies into his teeth, which they are not, their rebuttals would not be heard in far-eastern lands. It appears, therefore, that we must reconcile ourselves to paying this price to maintain the fiction that the United Nations is a real world organization for peace. Some may find consolation in the widely held hope that as long as the Russians are allowed to shout they won't shoot.

Mr. Malik's efforts in the Security Council are not limited to shouting. He is under orders to secure the admission of the Chinese Red Peiping regime, and has already served notice that he will continue to work toward that end. The United States has declared that it is opposed to the admission of the Chinese Reds, but that it would not use its veto if seven of the Council members voted affirmatively.

That, however, was before the Communist aggression in Korea. While there is no evidence to date that the Chinese Reds have materially aided the North Koreans, there is no doubt that they have given their moral support. In his August 1 protest against including the question of Chinese representation on the agenda of the Security Council, United States Delegate Warren R. Austin declared:

"At a time when the United Nations is faced with overt defiance of its authority, it is pertinent to recall official statements made by the regime which the Soviet representative would like to have seated in the Security Council. That regime has denounced United Nations action in Korea as 'armed aggression,' as 'intervention in the internal affairs of Korea,' and as a 'violation of world peace.' These and other statements amount to giving assistance and encouragement to the regime against which the United Nations is taking preventive action. It would be particularly unwise to consider at this time the seating of a regime that has officially condensed the efforts of the United Nations to halt aggression in Korea."

In Mr. Austin's denunciation of the Peiping regime, there is encouraging evidence of a stiffening official United States attitude toward it. In view of his critical remarks about what he called "the declared opponent of the United Nations' effort (in Korea)," it is hard to see how the United States could refuse to exercise its veto against the admission of the representative of the Chinese Reds if the occasion demanded it.

Malik's Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following excellent item that appeared in the editorial section of the Boston Globe, Boston, Mass., Tuesday, August 15, 1950, which warrants the attention of the Members of Congress:

LET HIM TALK

With American boys fighting and dying in Korea, many of us are finding it hard to take the remarks of Soviet Delegate Jakob Malik in the Security Council. We have all heard people ask, "Why don't they throw him out?" With the feeling that causes the question to be put, it is impossible to avoid sympathy.

In the Council itself, there was a belief last week that Mr. Malik should be compelled to end his tactics of obstruction. Among the alternatives considered was a revision of the rules of procedure to eliminate the Soviet delegate as presiding officer for August. Such a move would have undoubtedly driven Russia from the United Nations. It was decided, instead, to meet Mr. Malik's propaganda argument point by point, at least for the time being. The decision was a wise one.

It is worth recalling that Russia, in the diplomatic field, like General MacArthur's forces in the military, have been fighting a delaying action, following an initial surprise. Either because Mr. Malik's grossly underestimated the effect of the Korean aggression on American opinion, or because the Politburo would not believe its delegate's size-up of the situation, he was still boycotting the Security Council when the conflict on the thirty-eighth parallel began. Mr. Malik was not present to interpose a veto when the Council issued a cease-fire order in Korea and declared a breach of the peace when it was defied, then set up a United Nations command of the forces repelling armed Communist attack, and even voted arrangements for the care of refugees. When Mr. Malik returned to the Security Council, he was under the disadvantage of being compelled to discredit what had already been done with the support of 47 of the 59 United Nations. This he attempted to accomplish in two ways. First, as dignified official spokesman, he has argued that the Council's actions in his absence had been illegal. He has argued this case with great skill, but with a construction of the UN Charter, which is so strict that it is belied by precedents already set with Soviet consent. Second, as Communist propagandist, he has spread the world party line.

This has forced him to ride two horses simultaneously under the spotlight—perhaps it would be better to say three, for he has also had to maintain some appearance of being a fair presiding officer in the Council. He has had to combine the roles of statesman and hatchet man, which the politically wise in America always know enough to separate. The result is that Mr. Malik has carried little conviction anywhere outside the iron curtain, except in Asia. Sometimes he has done the reverse. Certainly no single human being could have done more than the Soviet delegate to unite the American people behind a strong military and foreign policy. There is even some danger that he will create here a mood that will demand war against Russia.

His obstructionist tactics have obviously disgusted the other Security Council members, including the delegate and Government of India. If, as some fear, he intends to use his position to prevent Council action against further Soviet aggressions, the whole world is now alerted. The General Assembly, which has no veto, could be got together in 2 weeks to do what the Council did in the Korean case.

Mr. Malik's multiplicity of roles has even hobbled him somewhat as a propagandist. It will surprise most people, who have just begun to follow the Security Council closely, to learn that the world spotlight upon him has caused him to pull his punches. The day he returned to the Council some correspondents regularly assigned to its sessions found themselves scooped. They had long ago given up reporting Russian insults. One actually wired his news service, what many believed, that Mr. Malik was below his usual form.

Communist propaganda will continue whether he speaks in the Security Council or not. It is effective chiefly in Asia—among undernourished peoples and nations now, or until recently, unfree. But the picture at Lake Success should do something to counter even this. On a world scale, Mr. Malik, to quote Thomas Jefferson, is a monument "of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." We lose little by the airings of the Korean war and stand to gain something. Mr. Malik has been wearing out his welcome. It has been wise to let him talk.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Mineral Depletion of Soils Cause of Diseases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER FURCOLO
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the District Health Officer gave a talk that again focused attention on a matter I have mentioned many times in the past. The talk follows:

Dr. Daniel L. Seckinger, District Health Officer, yesterday placed part of the blame for chronic diseases on mineral-depleted soils.

Through unchecked erosion, the health officer said, the soil loses mineral elements essential to vigorous plant growth. The end result thus menaces human health, particularly increasing the problems of degenerative diseases, he said.

The District Health Officer, a member of the Interstate Commission, Potomac River Basin, described the Potomac as a sick river, comparable to many rivers beset by industrial wastes, sewage wastes, sewage diposal, and the weight of soil erosion.

Soil erosion, he said, menaces health not only by depleting the soil of its minerals but by adding to the pollution of the streams. As a result of this mineral depletion, plants cannot pick up the minerals which humans get through eating the plants.

Wanted: A Formula for Formosa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appears in the August 19 issue of America, titled "Wanted: A Formula for Formosa":

WANTED: A FORMULA FOR FORMOSA

Neither the shouting war in the Security Council of the UN nor the shooting war in Korea should make the United States forget Formosa. There are alarming indications that the Chinese Reds will invade that strategic island during the next month, before the monsoon season sets in.

We know that most experts do not believe the Chinese Reds will strike so soon. The Chinese, they argue, would not venture out against the United States Seventh Fleet without assistance from Soviet submarines and fighter planes. The Soviets could not help them without bringing on war with the United States, and they do not want such a war at this time.

This argument is not too reassuring. The Russians have been helping the North Koreans in many devious ways and have gotten away with it. Will not their success in embroiling the United States in one costly little war tempt them to try the same tactics in the case of Formosa?

What should increase the temptation is the deplorable and dangerous fact that the United States has done nothing during the 8 weeks since its original action on Formosa to relate that action to the United Nations. On June 27 President Truman bluntly declared: "I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa." That was a unilateral commitment and remains a unilateral commitment. This, despite our repeated protestations that the United States bases its foreign policy squarely on the UN Charter.

If the Chinese Reds attacked Formosa tomorrow, it is entirely possible that the United States would be at war with Red China all by its already harassed self. Which of our reluctant allies could be counted on for assistance?

We were careful to secure the sanction and support of the UN for our intervention in Korea. At the same time we acted unilaterally in Formosa and for some unaccountable reason have drifted along all alone in our own little boat ever since.

The Russians have not been slow to take advantage of our sluggishness. Their delegate, Jacob Malik, has argued in the Security Council that the Korean war is a civil war, like the American and the Chinese civil wars. Walter Lippmann was quick to warn that Malik may be preparing an argument for use later "when the Formosa question comes to a head." Since the war between Chiang and Mao is a civil war, by what right, we may expect Mr. Malik to ask, does the United States intervene? Is that not aggression, which the United Nations must condemn?

Even though an invasion of Formosa were not imminent—and we pray that it is not—we believe the United States must speedily find a formula for Formosa which will, at least, make it harder for Russia to isolate us from our allies and discredit us among the Asiatics.

Mr. Lippmann believes that "it is not possible for the Truman administration to take the initiative in extricating itself from the vulnerable position it is in." The reason? "This is an election year and, moreover, it is never easy to reverse a reversal." Because they are not as entangled as we are, he suggests that our allies could, acting within the framework of the UN, "raise a new standard of hope and of peace to which the people of the world could rally."

Mr. Lippmann may have in mind some fruitful moves our allies might make, but he does not describe them. We believe that the nature of the move that must be made is fairly obvious, and that Mr. Truman should make it, election year or no election year. He will gain more credit for courageously "reversing his reversal" than by exposing the United States to a fighting war, all unaided, with Communist China.

The United States delegation to the UN should bring up the Formosa crisis at once. Since recourse to the Security Council would be fruitless as long as the Russians remain, our delegation should ask Secretary General Trygve Lie to convene a special session of the General Assembly at once. Mr. Lie told interviewers August 7 that he would not hesitate to call an extraordinary session on 24 hours notice if necessary. The Charter provides, it is true, for an interval of 14 days between the time of call and the special session, but, as Mr. Lie stated, "a simple majority would be sufficient to make it (the special session) a legal assembly."

Let the United States delegation then ask that Mao's threats, the shelling of Quemoy, and the concentration of an invasion force be considered a threat to the peace, that a UN watchdog commission be dispatched to Formosa forthwith, and that the United States be authorized by the UN to provide forces to forestall any invasion.

He Makes People Proud of Their Jobs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOSTER FURCOLO

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Members to an article entitled "He Makes People Proud of Their Jobs," beginning on page 105 in the Reader's Digest for August.

It seems to me that every employer and employee in the Nation, and everyone interested in their welfare, should read this article.

Defense Jobs in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURR P. HARRISON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Members of the House will be interested in a summary of questions most frequently asked at the Civil Service Commission in connection with Federal employment by defense agencies during the present emergency.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, therefore, I am inserting the questions and answers, as prepared by the Commission:

Since the announcement was made in July that the defense departments would be expanded during the current emergency, thousands of persons have called at the Civil Service Commission's main building, Seventh and F Streets NW., for information concerning the defense program. Although most of the inquiries have come from people who are not now in the Federal service, many have been received from Federal workers who are also interested in the new defense jobs.

Following are the answers to the questions of general interest that have been asked most frequently by persons who are not now employed by the Government:

1. How should I go about getting one of the new jobs in the defense departments?

The best way is to take and pass any of the civil-service examinations that are announced from week to week for which you can qualify. Most of the jobs, except those for stenographer and typist, are now being filled from the Commission's registers of eligibles. Persons living in the Washington, D. C., area are certified first for the new emergency-indefinite appointments authorized for the defense departments.

2. I have taken no civil-service examinations and do not have permanent status, but I would like to go to work soon. Are there any possibilities of quick employment for me?

Yes, if you are a good typist or stenographer. The defense departments have authority to make temporary appointments directly to typist positions in grades GS–1 through 3 and to stenographer positions in grades GS–2 through 4 in the Washington, D. C., area.

3. How about people who are not typists or stenographers and have never worked for the Government? Is there any chance of an immediate appointment for them?

Generally speaking, the answer is "No." Thus far, with the exception of typists and stenographers, the Commission has been able to fill most requests for personnel from its registers of eligibles. As long as a sufficient number of qualified eligibles are available from the Commission's registers, appointments of other persons (except those with permanent status and certain former defense employees) will not be authorized.

4. I was offered a defense job, but declined. Will my name be put back on the register and, if so, how long will it take? Do I have to take any action?

Appointing officers normally have 21 days in which to make their selections. By the end of that period, they report the selections made and the Commission restores the remaining names on the certificate to the register. No action is required on your part, and inquiries about your individual case cannot be handled. The Commission is rapidly certifying the names of eligibles to the defense departments, and if it delayed the procedure by checking each individual's standing at his request, the entire process would slow down, with the result that everyone would have to wait longer to get a job.

5. If I accept a temporary defense job and later resign, will my name be restored to the register?

Yes, if the register is still in existence.

6. When I filed my Form 57, I indicated that I would not accept temporary appointment. Should I advise the Commission now that I will accept a defense job?

No, it is not necessary. Since emergency-indefinite appointments differ from the usual temporary appointments, the Commission disregards applicants' answers to this question in certifying for the new type of appointment.

7. How much leave will I earn under an emergency-indefinite appointment

The same amount earned by a permanent employee—26 days of annual leave and 15 days of sick leave each year.

8. Will within-grade salary increases be possible for persons with emergency-indefinite appointments?

Yes.

9. Does the "members-of-family" rule apply to emergency-indefinite appointments?

No.

10. I understand the Defense departments need draftsmen. I have been on such a register for a long time and have never been contacted. Why is that?

Probably because there have been a sufficient number of people with higher ratings than yours to fill the needs thus far.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ABOUT CLERK JOBS

Because of the large number of persons in the Washington area who have eligible ratings in the clerk examination, more questions have been received about the possibility of getting clerk jobs during the past few weeks than about any other types of job. Following are the most frequently asked questions about these jobs:

1. I passed the clerk examination. Why haven't I been offered a defense job?

It may be because your rating has not been reached on the register. Or it may be that when your name was certified to an agency, the agency chose someone else instead of you. An appointing officer has the right to select one out of three available eligible for any job he has to fill.

2. I passed the clerk examination. Can you give me any idea of what my chances are of getting a clerk job?

If your rating is in the nineties or the high eighties, you have a good chance of being certified by the Commission, and you will be considered for selection by the agency to which certified. The Commission cannot predict whether you will be selected.

3. If I take an emergency-indefinite appointment as a clerk and my name is removed from that register, will my chances for appointment from other registers, such as the junior professional assistant, be affected?

No. Your name will remain on other registers, and you will be certified for appointment when your name is reached.

4. My legal residence is the District of Columbia. I have been offered an emergency-indefinite appointment as a clerk. If I should decline, could I, a nonveteran, expect to be offered a permanent appointment in the near future?

No. The Commission does not believe that nonveterans with legal residence in the District of Columbia or in the nine States that are in excess of their quotas under the apportionment law—these nine States include Maryland and Virginia—will be certified in the near future for probational (permanent) appointments from the clerk register for the apportioned service.

5. I did not take the clerk examination when it was announced and have never worked for the Government. As the examination is now closed and I will therefore have no opportunity to take it, do I have any chance of getting a clerk job in the Washington area?

Your chances are poor. There is little prospect for the appointment to clerk positions in this area in the foreseeable future of persons who have not already passed the clerk examination.

QUESTIONS OF EMPLOYEES AND FORMER EMPLOYEES

Following are the questions asked most frequently at the Commission's Information Office, Seventh and F Streets NW., by Federal employees and former employees:

1. Will the Defense departments have to call back former nonstatus employees who have been displaced before they can hire people from registers?

No. In fact, only under certain conditions may such employees be appointed (see next question).

2. I am a World War II veteran. I worked in one of the defense departments before being separated a few weeks ago, because I did not have status. Are there any special provisions for hiring former nonstatus employees in the defense departments?

Yes. Authority has been granted the defense departments to appoint such former employees, provided (a) that the former employees have veteran preference; (b) that they previously served satisfactorily in the Department for at least 3 months, and (c) that the positions to which they are appointed are in the same line of work as the positions in which they previously served. Former employees who are not veterans may also be given emergency appointments under the same conditions, but only after proper consideration has been given to any veterans whose names may be on certificates for the positions concerned.

3. If a permanent employee transfers to a defense department job, will he have reemployment rights in his old agency?

No.

4. If I have permanent status and transfer to a defense department, will I continue to have retention rights of a permanent employee?

It depends on the type of transfer or appointment you are given by the Defense Establishment. If you are given a transfer with status, you will be in the permanent group for reduction-in-force actions—the last group to go. If you are given an emergency-indefinite appointment, however, you will be in the war-service and temporary-indefinite group, and will have none of the rights that accrue to status employees in reduction in force.

5. I have read that retirement deductions will not be made from salaries of emergency-indefinite appointees. I have a permanent appointment with the Government now, and would like to have retirement deductions continue. Will this be possible if I accept the emergency-indefinite appointment I am now considering?

Yes. If retirement deductions are now being made from your salary and you take the new job without a break in service, deductions will be mandatory in your case.

Protecting the National Security of the United States—H. R. 7439

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on July 12, 1950, the House considered H. R. 7439, a bill to protect the national security of the United States by permitting the summary suspension of employment of civilian officers and employees of various departments and agencies of the Government, and for other purposes.

I offered an amendment which would have provided anyone separated as a so-called security risk with the right to an impartial review of his case by the Civil Service Commission.

This amendment offered by me received bipartisan support but failed to be included in the legislation by a 6-vote margin, which indicated the concern of almost a majority of the members regarding the inherent dangers in the bill which allowed the heads of certain departments and agencies to separate employees on secret charges without the right of an independent review. After the House passed the so-called security risk bill it was referred to the Senate Committee on Armed Services. Certain amendments to the legislation were adopted by that committee which carried out the purpose of my amendment.

The bill then passed the Senate unanimously on August 9, 1950, and on August 15 the House concurred in the Senate amendments, and the President will sign this measure within the next few days.

The amendments to H. R. 7439 approved by the Senate in effect provide that any person separated from one of the agencies covered by the bill on grounds that such person is a security risk, may ask the Civil Service Commission to review his case to determine whether he is suitable for reemployment in another Government department or agency. The right of the person under the provisions of the Senate amendment corresponds exactly to his right to an independent review of his case under my amendment which has now been approved by the House of Representatives.

As I have stated, there is a very definite difference between a person who is disloyal to the United States and one who may be classified as a security risk. It would have been unfortunate had the Congress approved this legislation without the inclusion of an amendment such as the one I offered, or such as the one adopted by the Senate and approved by the House after the Senate took action.

The sacred American tradition of the right to an independent review of an administrative action which affects the property or livelihood of an individual must be preserved, and this bill should not have become law unless a proper opportunity for such a review is provided.

I am pleased, as are my colleagues who supported my amendment, that the Senate saw fit in its wisdom to provide that a person discharged as a security risk would have the right to have his record cleared if the action by the head of the department or agency concerned was arbitrary and based upon unsupported charges.

The Senate also included an amendment which was adopted by the House providing that the right of the person who is suspended as a security risk should be protected by the requirement that such person be given a written statement of the charges against him within 30 days after his suspension, and a reasonable opportunity to answer such charges at a hearing or through the submission of affidavits.

In my judgment, the inclusion of the Senate amendments vastly improved this legislation, and in effect adopts my views, and for this reason I supported the legislation with such amendments.

Divine Guidance

REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT M. COLE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 30, 1950

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, each Member of the House of Representatives recently received a letter from a friend of mine. I think, however, today it is quite fitting and proper that I call it to your attention by reading it.

Here is his letter:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I feel that I am speaking for millions of other Americans when I say that we are vitally concerned and deeply disturbed over the utter disorder and the terribly confused conditions from which we are suffering. Your present task is unquestionably the most important in your lifetime. The lives of millions of human beings are at stake; so I plead with you to pray to Almighty God for divine wisdom and inspirational guidance in conducting the important post you now hold.

I know you are not indifferent to the challenge of this fateful hour, when the clock is telling of perhaps the end of the world that we have known. What is the challenge? The challenge is to throw aside all considerations of partisan expediency, to forget the usual prattle of politics, and with a deep sense of responsibility to strive only to meet the needs of the Nation. The challenge is to face the situation courageously and to be ready and willing to do something about it. I have every confidence that you, God's servant, will prove yourself equal to the task.

If I were in your position, I would ask for divine guidance to give me strength to withstand the influence of all pressure groups whose passions of misconceived self-interest must be restrained. Because of human nature man is the sole hope of mankind.

Divine guidance is necessary. Perhaps the many problems that face the world today and cause much misunderstanding, misery, and fear could more easily be solved if the men who meet at the conference tables would realize that men alone do not have the power to alter existing conditions until they submerge their egos, and in humility and sincerity call upon God for guidance in making wise and just decisions. For it is only by recognizing that any power we have comes from this source, and only when we appeal to this higher knowledge will we be able to live in truth, justice, and peace.

Patriotically yours,

HARRY R. NIGHTINGALE.

Mr. Speaker, the human race is sick. A regiment of doctors is sitting by our bedside, feeling our pulse, suggesting cures. Complicated treatments have been tried, but the patient lingers on. A few superficial improvements have been brought about, just as a hypodermic quiets fever for a while. But the real cause of our illness has not been touched, a real cure not even begun. The cause is that the human mind has run amuck; the cure is the recapture of our souls.

The cure of the disease with which we are afflicted does not consist of regulations, taxes, and codes, but of a rigorous spiritual diet. It is the only cure.

Address of Hon. Willard L. Thorp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, lest this little gem be lost to posterity, I include it in the Appendix of the RECORD:

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE WILLARD L. THORP, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC AFFAIRS, BEFORE THE AMERICAN AUSTRALIAN ASSOCIATION, UNIVERSITY CLUB, NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 4, 1950

When Alice tumbled down the rabbit hole and began her involuntary expedition to Wonderland, the report of her adventures states that she had "plenty of time as she went down to look about her, and to wonder what was going to happen next." She began to talk out loud to herself, and part of her monolog is reported verbatim as follows:

"I wonder if I shall fall right through the earth! How funny it'll seem to come out among the people that walk with their heads downwards! The Antipathies, I think—" (She was rather glad there was no one listening this time, as it didn't sound at all the right word) "but I shall have to ask them what the name of the country is, you know. Please, ma'am, is this New Zealand or Australia?" She never had the opportunity to put the question, because "Suddenly, thump! thump! down she came upon a heap of sticks and dry leaves, and the fall was over." Of course, if she had had proper navigation aids with her, she would have known that, if she had started in London, her probable destination would have been New Zealand, but that, if she had started her descent in New York City, the land nearest to her exit, to use subway terminology, would have been Australia.

Alice's notion that things would be reversed on the opposite side of the globe, is further supported by the conclusions of mathematicians. In spherical geometry, it is a simple theorem that a figure on one side of a sphere appears in reverse when reflected through the center to the opposite side.

Mr. Prime Minister, I wish today to denounce these false notions whether presented by fantasy or by mathematical theory. Antipathy certainly is the wrong word, and contrariness does not describe the relationship. The plain fact is that the Commonwealth of Australia and the United States of America have an extraordinary resemblance, a natural affinity, and a great area of common interest.

There are obvious elements of similarity—for example, that we speak approximately the same language. But it is more important to remind ourselves that we both have backgrounds of pioneering and all the effects resulting from the existence of an undeveloped frontier. We are not ancient societies bound by habits of thought and institutional forms developed and hardened over many centuries. We are new countries who have taken the values of the Old World, but have developed our own variations and invented our own innovations. With the assistance of space and extensive national resources, we have provided new opportunities for the vigorous and the venturesome. In the absence of ancient and rigid tradition, we have been free to develop our political, economic, and social institutions with greater freedom.

Even our political history has its striking similarity. Both countries developed originally as a group of separate British colonies. After considerable difficulty, we both achieved freedom to direct our own affairs, a condition which you seem to have won with somewhat less struggle than did we. And finally, we each have brought our various separate states together into a federal union under a constitutional form of government.

But if the past shows such resemblance, it is perhaps even more important to record that we seem to look to the future through the same window. We have both been strong supporters of the United Nations and its various specialized agencies. We have worked together in the effort to find ways and means to expand world trade. The most important of all, we are in basic agreement that aggression must be driven from the face of the globe. We in the United States will not soon forget that the first to join with us in the great United Nations effort to halt the criminal aggressors in Korea were members of the air force of the Commonwealth of Australia. This is not the first time that we have fought together in the cause of freedom, and it further strengthens the ties of our kinship.

Mr. Prime Minister, we are all exceedingly happy that you have visited us in our country. We hope that you are carrying away with you a sense of the warmth of our feeling towards you and your fellow countrymen. We hope that we can ever stand side by side, not only in military operations, but in building a world where freedom and democracy, where peace and prosperity, will no longer be challenged.

The Minute Women of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, August 8, page A5717, there appears some remarks concerning the Minute Women for Peace, from Springfield-Chicopee, Mass. The Minute Women of Connecticut and the Minute Women of the United States of America are in no way to be confused with the group in Massachusetts. Their aims are obviously very different and they are completely opposed in ideology. For a clear understanding of the intents and purposes of the Connecticut organization of the Minute Women, I am requesting that with my remarks, a statement of their principles be included. The National and State of Connecticut chairman of the Minute Women of the United States of America is Mrs. Suzanne Silvercruys Stevenson. The statement of principles follows:

The Minute Women of Connecticut is a voluntary group which welcomes into its membership, any woman citizen of this State, regardless of party affiliation, who, inspired by her faith in the traditional American way of life, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States, has the following purposes:

1. Actively to fight communism in every form.

Inasmuch as it has been adjudged libelous in some States to call any person a Communist, the Communist or any other party dedicated to the overthrow of our constitutional form of government, should be outlawed.

2. To demand the removal of supporters of socialism and communism in our Federal and State Government, and in our educational system.

3. To work for the rebirth of free enterprise, free production, free markets in our country, so that people can work, plan, risk, save, and dream for themselves, without governmental restrictions and regulations, except those which are indispensable for the defense of the United States.

4. To advocate just plain good housekeeping, economy and efficiency in Government, with the adoption of the waste-saving points of the Hoover Commission report, not, however, in any way weakening our national defense.

5. To oppose all measures under the guise of war measures, which aim to transform our free economy into state socialism.

6. To secure the passage of the constitutional amendment, limiting the tenure of office of the President of the United States, to two terms of 4 years each. (Until 1940, the two terms of the Presidency had been accepted as a tradition laid down by President George Washington himself. Since that precedent has been broken it can only be restored now by a constitutional amendment, which passed the House and Senate in 1947, and since that time, is being held up by various States, 36 of which must ratify it to become law.)

7. To pray for spiritual guidance for enlightenment and the ability to inspire others to join our crusade, thereby giving us the courage to work to achieve the above aims.

We pledge in honor, to vote at every election.

Growth of United States Economy Under Democratic Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that many Americans will be interested in facts and figures dealing with the expansion and progress of free enterprise in this country in the last 18 years. Free enterprise is still the basis of our economy and our political system. No other country in the world has made such tremendous progress in so short a period of time. In the 18 years between 1932 and 1950 our total national income has risen from $46,000,000,000 to nearly $210,000,000,000 and it is still rising.

It should be noted that all this was accomplished under the Democratic administrations, first under the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and now under President Harry S. Truman. To those who may wish to have the exact figures of this economic growth I commend the article United States Economic Gains Since 1932, by William M. Boyle, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, published in the August issue of the Democratic Digest. The article is as follows:

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC GAINS SINCE 1932

(By William M. Boyle, Jr.)

Americans have a tradition of teamwork, and during the past 17 years the most highly developed teamwork between businessman, farmer, and workingman in our history has paid off in the greatest expansion of productivity and rise of living standards any nation has even seen.

How the partnership of all classes and sections, blossoming under a progressive National Government, has brought about great gains in our free-enterprise economy is shown dramatically in the figures below. These figures are from a newly completed comprehensive analysis of official Government statistics on the expansion of the American free-enterprise system which has raised total national income from $46,300,000,000 in 1933 to $209,800,000,000 in 1949, an increase of 353 percent. After adjusting for price changes, the increase was about 150 percent.

The statistics, gathered by an independent analyst at the request of the Democratic National Committee, tell the story of the tremendous progress the United States has made since 1933.

BUSINESS AND WORKERS

In 1933 income payments to individuals in the United States totaled $46,273,000,000. In 1948 residents of the Nation received $211,900,000,000. This is an increase of 358 percent, or, if measured in constant dollars, about 150 percent.

There were 240,881 manufacturing establishments in the country in 1947. The average number of production workers employed in these industries during the year was 11,916,188. Total wages paid to production workers in 1947 amounted to $30,242,343,000. The value added to commodities and goods as a result of manufacturing processes totaled $74,425,825,000.

By contrast, in 1933 there were only 141,769 manufacturing plants in the Nation. The average number of production workers during the year stood at only 6,055,737. The total payroll for production employees in 1933 was but $5,261,577,000. And the value added by manufacturing amounted to only $14,548,018,000.

The payroll increase was 475 percent or over 233 percent in adjusted dollars. The manufacturing value added was 412 percent or 170 percent in adjusted dollars.

By September 30, 1949, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had made 51,028 loans totaling $4,078,529,660 to businessmen in the United States, aiding our free-enterprise economy to produce more goods, more jobs, and more profits. The Federal Government spent $152,624,785 in 1949 to help pay for the costs of carrying out employment service and unemployment insurance system services.

In the year ending June 30, 1949, the Bureau of Public Roads spent $410,396,000 for highway construction, and $30,390,000 was spent by the Federal Government to help build airports. Both helped speed the flow of goods.

FARM GAINS

Fair prices and increased production have brought the level of farm income and rural living standards close to parity from a position in which the farmer was the bell wether of depressions.

Following are the figures which show the farm prosperity which has been brought about during 16 years of national Democratic administration, despite the recent downward trend which has brought about Democratic proposals for an improved farm price-support program:

Cash income of United States farmers totaled $30,801,999,000 in 1948. It was only $1,800,000,000 in 1932. This means an increase of about 1,600 percent. In real terms, the increase was about 640 to 650 percent.

Hogs were selling for only $3.34 per hundredweight in 1932. The average 1948 price was $22.80. Corn was selling at only 29 cents a bushel in 1932. The average 1948 price was $1.30. Tobacco was selling for only 10½ cents a pound in 1932. The average 1948 price was 44 cents. Cotton was selling at only 6½ cents a pound in 1932. The average 1948 price was 31 cents. Farm mortgages, an excellent index of rural prosperity, have decreased steadily since 1933. More than $6,600,000,000 in mortgages was outstanding in 1940. On January 1, 1949, the debts had been reduced to $5,100,000,000. On June 30, 1949, 78.2 percent of farms had electricity. When the Rural Electrification Administration was set up in 1935, only 11 percent of the farms had electric lights.

In 12 years REA has helped farmers to energize 839,685 miles of lines.

On July 1, 1949, 69.5 percent of the farm land was included in soil-conservation districts.

In 1948 payments to the farmers under the agricultural conservation program totaled $124,503,000; 56 percent of the cropland was included under this conservation plan.

The Farmers Home Administration made 2,371 loans totaling $14,890,231 to help persons buy farms in the 1949 fiscal year. It also insured 1,181 farm-ownership loans in that year for $8,116,155.

In addition, the Farmers Home Administration made 125,354 operating loans totaling $93,053,951 in the 1949 fiscal year.

On June 30, 1949, the Production Credit Association had 252,458 loans valued at $528,026,386.

Federal land banks had 303,567 loans worth $880,137,999 outstanding on June 30, 1949.

Commodity Credit Corporation loans made on 1948 crops through August 31, 1949, totaled $2,189,479,334. Loans on 1949 crops on that date stood at $384,436,493.

The school-lunch program, started in 1935, served 6,700,797 children in the year ending June 30, 1949. A total of $91,051,145 was spent on the program in that year.

In the 1949 fiscal year $40,450,885 was spent for agricultural experiment station and cooperative agricultural extension work.

SAFETY FOR DEPOSITORS

Bank deposits have risen greatly, while bank failures which robbed depositors of their life savings have become a thing of the past. The following figures tell the story:

On June 30, 1932, only $35,484,000,000 was deposited in United States commercial banks. By June 30, 1949, deposits in banks had increased 288 percent to $137,520,000,000. In 1932, 1,453 banks with deposits totaling $706,000,000 failed. None failed in 1948.

From 1934 through 1948 the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation spent $266,976,000 to help 407 banks with deposits of $522,678,000. At the end of 1948, 95.1 percent of all money in banks was insured by the FDIC at the rate of up to $5,000 for each depositor.

A total of 12,922 commercial banks with assets of $147,640,821,000 were insured by FDIC in 1948.

HOUSING

More Americans own homes than ever before—many assisted by housing programs put into effect by the national Democratic administration to prevent foreclosure or to make home financing easier and cheaper. Here are the details:

On December 31, 1948, the Federal Housing Administration had outstanding in the United States, 8,735,620 insured loans on small homes and for property improvement. The FHA insurance on these loans totaled $3,338,550,000.

On that same date the FHA had insured 1,981,951 mortgages on one- to four-family homes for $9,904,058,000.

In addition, the FHA had underwritten the construction of 207,606 units in large apartment projects for $1,304,522,000 by the end of 1948.

As of July 25, 1949, the Veterans' Administration had guaranteed 1,528,607 home loans for $4,120,865,000.

There were 3,769 member institutions of the Federal Home Loan Bank System on December 31, 1948. At that time they had $9,689,792,000 outsanding in home mortgage loans.

At the end of 1948, 2,616 associations were insured under the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. The associations had $7,777,308,000 outstanding in home mortgage loans.

The Home Owners Loan Corporation aided 1,202,424 families refinancing home loans totaling $3,496,977,000. All but $319,342,000 of those loans had been repaid by June 30, 1949.

As of June 30, 1949, the Public Housing Administration had spent $3,173,689,000 on 1,159,583 public-housing units. These include special veterans' housing projects and war housing as well as units built under the United States Housing Act.

NATURAL RESOURCES

The United States has made great gains in developing power facilities, curbing floods, and making more waterways navigable.

In the 1949 fiscal year the Department of the Interior spent $96,157,200 for power facilities at or in connection with Federally constructed multiple-purpose developments. In addition the Interior Departmen spent $58,970,000 for construction of dams and reservoirs which have or will have power facilities.

In the same fiscal year the National Military Establishment spent $694,042,857 in the Nation for rivers and harbors projects to improve transportation and reduce flood damage. This compares with $116,586,376 expended for those purposes by the Army in 1933.

HUMAN RESOURCES

Federal assistance has enabled our people to do a better job of conserving and preserving the human resources in the years of national Democratic administration which followed the depression of the 1920's and early 1930's.

Here are the figures which show how Federal assistance has enabled the State to expand its activities in the fields of health, education and social welfare:

In the year ending June 30, 1949, the Federal Security Agency spent $2,058,530,544 to aid health, education and social welfare activities in the United States.

The Federal share of the old-age assistance program in the Nation accounted for $718,011,653.

During the fiscal year Americans received $607,036,339 under the old-age and survivors insurance program. FSA spent $26,145,531 for its vocational education program during the year and $5,030,000 was appropriated under the land-grant college program.

From 1933 to 1948 nearly $10,000,000,000 in Federal funds was spent for education in the United States.

Public Health Service expenditures in the Nation in the year ending June 30, 1949, included $13,138,382 for venereal disease control; $6,786,066 for tuberculosis control; $11,212,895, general health assistance; $7,924,403, mental health activities; $10,762,299, hospital survey and planning; and $2,360,905, cancer control.

TO HELP VETERANS

Medical and educational programs voted by a Democratic Congress are aiding war veterans to become trained, productive workers, successful businessmen, and useful citizens. Here are the details:

In the year ending June 30, 1949, the Veterans Administration spent $6,552,063,282 in the United States, distributed as follows:

During that 12-month period 2,905,786 veterans and survivors of deceased veterans received $1,850,028,748 in pensions and compensation and retirement payments. A total of $502,737,158 was distributed in the State under the unemployment and self-employment allowances programs. The number of veterans who were discharged from VA hospitals during the year totaled 543,214.

In the 1-year period the average number of exservicemen in training under vocational rehabilitation legislation was 216,729. They received $260,812,310 in subsistence allowance.

The average number under the GI education and training program stood at 2,017,739. They received $1,815,216,977 in subsistence allowance and $825,633,589 for tuition and equipment. From the start of its loan insurance program after the end of World War II through June 25, 1949, the VA had guaranteed 51,522 farm loans. The guaranties covered $1,051,064 while the total amount of the loans was $197,739,968. In this same 4-year period the VA has insured 107,244 business loans. These guaranties covered $127,129,820. The total amount of the loans was $337,628,543.

Freedom and Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Post of August 9, 1950:

FREEDOM AND SECURITY

The President has grasped both horns of the great dilemma of our society—the dilemma of protecting our liberties while safeguarding our security—in a singularly statesmanlike message to Congress. As Governor Dewey pointed out in his famous debate with Mr. Stassen at Portland, May 18, 1948, "We have 27 laws on the books, and I have the whole list of them in front of me, outlawing every conceivable act of subversion against the United States." However, agents like Gold who worked with Fuchs succeeded in evading all 27 of these laws in stealing the greatest secret in the history of this country in behalf of its enemies. It was crystal clear from then on that the time was overdue for a review of the laws against subversion with the view to improvement in case the law and not enforcement was defective. But the "there ought to be a law" pressure upon Congress produced bills containing clauses which threaten the liberties enshrined in the Bill of Rights—the Mundt bill, S. 595, and the Hobbs bill.

The President's answer to the dilemma falls into two categories. He would provide an extended statute of limitations beyond the existing 3 years in peacetime espionage cases, require persons who have received instruction from a foreign government or political party in espionage or subversion tactics to register under the Foreign Agents Registration Act, give broader authority than now exists for the President to establish security regulations concerning the protection of military bases and other national-defense installations. The second category of recommendations has to do with aliens. Legislation is proposed permitting the Attorney General to exercise supervision over aliens subject to deportation—legislation that would require them under sanction of criminal penalties to report their whereabouts and activities at regular intervals. All these proposals have been either suggested or backed from time to time in this newspaper. Another thing, in our opinion, ought to be done. There should be, as there was in the war, registration of the financial statements of groups appealing for public funds, for all subversive activity has to be financed, and could not exist if the light of day were cast upon the nature and source of its financing.

This program of action is vital to the defense of our country. It is, indeed, first business on the home front. Some people will not be satisfied that it goes far enough, but they are apt, in their overexcitement over the dangers in our midst, to overlook the liberties upon which our society was built. They likewise err in other respects. For one thing, they would push this country in the direction of a police state. Such action endangers rather than adds to security. For the history of police states, as the President reminds Congress, is marked by successive purges, and growing concentration camps, as their governments strike out blindly in fear of violent revolt. Once a government is committed to the principle of silencing the voice of opposition, it has only one way to go, and that is down the path of increasingly repressive measures, until it becomes a source of terror to all its citizens and creates a country where everyone lives in fear.

For another thing, extreme legislation of the nature of existing bills would serve Communist ends in discrediting our system of constitutional liberties. Finally, the extremists forget that laws themselves don't protect, what mainly count are the administration of those laws and the cooperation of public opinion, and the best insulation against inside danger comes from strict enforcement and from what the President calls a vigorous, functioning democracy which succeeds in meeting the needs of its people. Mr. Truman has furnished Congress with a new starting point in tightening up the laws against subversion.

Why Shouldn't We?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the editor of a South Dakota county seat weekly has written an editorial which more nearly sums up grassroots opinion of the day than anything which has come to my attention in some time. The editor's name is Harold Card and his paper is the Webster (S. Dak.) Reporter and Farmer. Under leave to extend, I place the editorial in the Appendix of the RECORD at this point:

WHY SHOULDN'T WE?

Patriotism and common sense dictate that full support be given to the present war effort in the undeclared conflict in Korea. As American citizens, we must and should cooperate in the mobilization of our manpower and material resources to cope with the present situation and be prepared for anything further that may come.

But we would be less than human if we did not "boil" under the collar at some of the things that have been happening.

It wasn't long ago that our Defense Secretary Louis Johnson made this gem statement: "If Russia starts war at 4 o'clock, the United States is ready 'to give 'em hell' at 5 o'clock."

The kindest observation that can now be made of Korea is that the United States clock stopped.

In the meantime, the people of a muddled world get the impression that Uncle Sam talks big but doesn't back up his talking.

South Koreans were told that Uncle Sam would act swiftly and effectively to protect their sovereignty. But in spite of Army Intelligence reporting troop concentrations in North Korea, Washington was caught flatfooted and Truman was away on vacation. Again we are confronted with the stark reality of our embattled GI's getting help "too little and too late." Now we are told it will be a long, hard struggle, and we see it with United States reverses being piled on reverses.

What is United States policy in the Orient? Is Korea important as a symbol of United States strength in the Far East? If so, do our present bumblings build up Uncle Sam as big and powerful? And in retrospect, are a few hundred thousand South Koreans more vital to United States security than were several millions of Nationalist Chinese to whom perhaps some help months ago would have drastically altered today's situation. Again in retrospect, are secret agreements made at Yalta, Potsdam, and Tehran now hitting us in the face?

Here at home, has the United States internal situation changed so quickly that a President who only a few months ago "poohpoohed" the suggestion of Communist infiltration in high places, on Tuesday pled for all possible help to the FBI to tighten its program against espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities? Is this lack of foresight building another "government by crisis," of which we have seen so many in recent years?

No patriotic American would for a moment hamstring the war effort, and by the same token, no patriotic American should condone mistakes that imperil our national security. We have a right to demand from our officials the same type of service our Government expects from us. Partisan politics has no place in today's crisis, but every definition of patriotism we subscribe to calls upon everyone to do all in his power to put an end to national leadership unequal to the task.

As another election approaches Americans are sure to hear the old canard, "Don't change horses in the middle of the stream." To which we answer, "Why not?"

And, as if in approving answer to the Webster editor's query, the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader, follows a reprint of the editorial with this brief one from the Council Bluffs (Iowa) Nonpareil:

Events of recent weeks made it plain that if we don't swap horses—elect a Republican Congress—the country may be sunk.

Secretary of State Acheson and Defense Secretary Johnson have demonstrated their incompetence in the present emergency and Truman may ditch both of them before election.

Their dismissal would not satisfy the voters, who are coming to realize that the whole administration is so incompetent that only the election of a Republican Congress will bring about any improvement.

Cannon or Automobiles—Keys to American Survival or Slavery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial expresses so sensible a viewpoint, I feel that every American should read it.

It translates from the dollar sign into the sacrifices which will be required of us if we are to meet our future obligations and survive.

CANNON OR AUTOMOBILES—KEYS TO AMERICAN SURVIVAL OR SLAVERY

(By Walter Leckrone)

The gentleman from Prague was openly admiring the modest, but still new and shiny car in which I'd volunteered to drive him to his hotel.

"I have never," he repeated in his heavily accepted English, "been able to afford a car like this."

The streets were full of cars like that, and better ones, too, so obviously plenty of people around there could afford them. He went on:

"But you do not understand. In Czechoslovakia I am not a poor man." (And he mentioned a list of his enterprises that certainly didn't sound like poverty.)

"For a long time my income has not been less than $50,000 a year, United States. On such an income I could not afford a car, not even an electric refrigerator. We have an ice box.

"You see we have to keep an army at our borders all the time. If you in America had to keep an army guarding your borders from an attack, perhaps you, also, could not afford luxuries."

MAUSERS OR MERCURYS

What he was saying, of course, was that if you spend part of your income on guns and bullets you'll have just that much less to spend on sporty convertibles.

Czechoslovakia, then a free though threatened nation, has disappeared behind the iron curtain now. But last week the Congress of the United States was beginning gingerly to say the same thing.

The Congressmen, to be sure, didn't use the same words. They talked about corporate levies and higher income-tax rates and credit and production controls.

From as far away as Indianapolis they seemed to be well ahead of the President in their thinking along that line * * * though still far behind the people around here.

For the first time in our history, it was becoming clear, Americans might have to choose between guns and gadgets, might have to lower their own living standards in order to go on living at all.

We haven't faced that before. "Miracles of production" got us by with hardly a jolt in every previous defense crisis. During World War II, even, the standards of living, in most ways and for most people in this country actually went up. America produced enough to keep vast armies supplied with everything, and enough more to keep everybody at home living in comfort.

National income, which is just the yardstick by which we measure the whole value of everything everybody produces, rose so high that even after you took out what we were spending on the war there still was more left for everybody than there ever had been before. Price went up * * * but wages and salaries and profits and incomes went up even farther.

Next time production may not be enough.

Last week we published a fascinating series of articles outlining some of the things that can be learned about production in Russia. The figures were startling. In munitions of war they appear to be almost ready to produce as much * * * or more * * * than we did even at wartime peaks.

No one seriously believes that Russia, a backward and primitive nation, actually can make as many things as we can make in America, of course. Not in totals.

The catch is that they don't even now, bother about making much for the people's comfort. They don't, for example, have to produce enough gasoline to run their war planes plus enough to keep millions of civilian automobiles running. There are no civilian automobiles. They don't have to make clothing for their army plus new clothing for the civilians. Civilians will just make out with what they have, as long as war lasts. They don't even have to build war factories plus houses for civilians who work in them. They just jam the civilians into what houses are already built * * * two, three, five families to a room.

If Russia could manufacture only half as much, altogether, as we can, Soviet armies might still have more weapons than ours. By Russian standards everything except the minimum essentials of bare existence can be used for war.

The production power of the United States, used like that, would be invincible. No nation on earth, and no combination of nations, could stand against it.

It is not, of course, going to be used like that. No one in Congress or out expects that American standards of living will be lowered to the Russian level * * * unless Russia wins a war against us.

We do, though, have to face the question presently of whether they should be reduced a little * * * in the common defense.

NOT UNTIL AFTER ELECTION

That's what the President proposes we don't talk about until after election, and what Congress is so cautiously talking about anyway, in Washington this week.

One-fourth of our national income would amount to about $50,000,000,000 a year * * * or just about what the Nation's defense chiefs believe it would cost the first year to fight a major war. If we turned over that much more for our national defense it would lower our living standards approximately 25 percent below what they are now. We'd have to do without one-fourth of the things we buy now * * * for the double reason that we wouldn't have the money to buy them and they wouldn't be for sale anyway.

We'd still have standards of comfortable living far above any others in the world * * * far above even those our own grandparents ever had.

Seems like a modest price for survival, at that.

The Mountain Has Labored and Brought Forth a Mouse

REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, suppose we get back to the United States for a moment and turn our attention to the welfare of that great segment of our people known as the American farmers—who are either enjoying the benefits of rural electrification or begging to have it extended to their homes.

I need not remind the Members of this House that the Rural Electrification Administration in extending this service to the farmers of the Nation has done more for the people living in the rural section than anything else that has ever been accomplished in all history.

I have before me a report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments which is really a report of the subcommittee which took it upon itself to investigate the Rural Electrification Administration. This subcommittee report reminds us of the mountain that labored and brought forth a mouse.

The report itself when studied and carefully analyzed thoroughly might not be so bad, but a press report based on that document has done the Rural Electrification Administration a great injustice that should be corrected. The truth of the matter is that the Rural Electrification Administration should be complimented instead of criticized for the reason that it showed such clean bill of health as few Government agencies could have shown under the circumstances.

The cases of impropriety or misconduct of any kind which were exposed by this investigation were few indeed; and none of them could be attributed to any misconduct on the part of the Rural Electrification Administration. In only three instances, out of more than a thousand cooperative power associations that have borrowed from the REA—in only three instances—was there shown to be any action by the cooperative personnel that might be termed dishonest in any sense of the word and in only one case was there any embezzlement—and that case was prosecuted as a result of the suggestion, and insistence, of Secretary Wickard, in 1945.

That was a case in which an individual in New Hampshire embezzled $14,000 of money belonging to a local cooperative power association. It was discovered in 1944, and Mr. Wickard, when he later became head of the Rural Electrification Administration, demanded that this man be prosecuted.

The Federal Government did not lose a dime in any of these cases, and I understand the power association in New Hampshire was adequately insured against such a loss. Yet this case is being paraded by the Power Trust for the purpose of discrediting the Rural Electrification Administration.

This report discusses nine specific cooperatives, under the heading "Administrative difficulties." But, as I said, in only three of these instances was there any action by a cooperative personnel that might be termed dishonest in any sense of the word; and in only one case were funds embezzled. That was the New Hampshire case to which I have just referred.

Now remember, the Rural Electrification Administration has made loans to 1,067 borrowers throughout the country. Remember also, that in 1934 when we first started this drive for rural electrification, there were only 743,954 farm homes throughout the entire Nation that were enjoying the use of electric energy. On June 30 of this year, there were 5,067,000 electrified farm homes throughout the Nation—as a result of the magnificent work of the Rural Electrification Administration.

The Rural Electrification Administration had already discovered the case of embezzlement referred to in the committee's report and had initiated corrective actions before the committee started its alleged study.

I wonder why the committee has not had printed the hearings in this investigation.

Let me call attention to the fact, also, that in none of the cases cited did the Federal Government lose a single penny. The officials of the rural electric power associations are bonded, and even this report shows that whatever loss was sustained in this single case of embezzlement has been made good. I repeat that neither the cooperative power association nor the Federal Government lost a penny.

Yet we find an alleged news article spread throughout the country smearing the Rural Electrification Administration and misleading the public into believing that its officials were guilty of misconduct.

Let me call attention to the fact that in 1934 we only had 10.9 percent of the farm homes of this country electrified. As a rule they were the farms right up near the large towns and cities. Today we have about 85 percent of the farm homes of this country electrified, and are moving forward to extend this service to every farm home that can be reached by the draft in times of war or by the tax collector in times of peace.

Let me also remind the House that during the fiscal year 1950 the Federal Government was repaid about $27,000,000 in principal, and paid about $13,500,000 in interest on REA loans. This brought the total repayments since the start of the program to $244,500,000, including more than $23,000,000 repaid ahead of schedule—while the loan payments that are overdue, more than 30 days, throughout the entire country, total only $763,000, or less than one-half of 1 percent of the total amount due.

I daresay there is not another agency of this Government, and few private enterprises, that can show a record for efficiency that even begins to compare with that of the Rural Electrification Administration.

I understand this committee now proposes to investigate loans for generating plants and transmission lines. I wonder who is behind that movement. It looks like the "hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob."

The Power Trust is doing its dead level best to get its hands on the water power of this Nation by browbeating Congress into stopping the construction of these transmission lines. If they ever succeed, it will cost the American people untold billions of dollars in overcharges for electricity in the years to come.

The power business is a public business.

Electricity is a necessity of our modern life. It must be handled by a monopoly, since the overhead expenses would be too great for a half dozen or a dozen concerns to attempt to supply electricity to the people of any one city, town, or community.

Besides, the water power of the Nation, which is the greatest wealth in America outside of the soil from which we live, already belongs to the Federal Government, as the Supreme Court of the United States definitely decided in both the Ashwander case and the Appalachian Power case.

To outlaw these transmission lines and turn this water power over to a private monopoly, with enough water in its stock to float the Navy—including the Missouri—would be one of the greatest outrages of modern times.

It must not happen.

These generating plants are necessary to firm this power up to the peak of the average year, or to supply electricity to those communities that are not able to secure an adequate supply at reasonable rates in any other manner.

If this committee is going to let itself be used to discredit agencies, such as the Rural Electrification Administration, which has rendered such marvelous service to the people of the Nation, then the committee ought to be abolished.

The Light of Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD an article written by Walter Lippmann and appearing in his syndicated column, Today and Tomorrow:

THE LIGHT OF ASIA

(By Walter Lippmann)

On Monday, in the Security Council, Sir Benegal N. Rau, representing the Government of India, offered, if he found enough support in principle for the idea, to move a resolution dealing with a settlement in Korea. The idea he presented is so well conceived, is so well timed in relation to the diplomatic situation in the UN and to the military situation in Korea, and has been put forward so deftly, that any government had better think twice before it fails to support it.

The crux of the idea is that the permanent members of the Security Council are, for the time being, not only incapable of agreeing on any settlement but that all are in varying degrees suspect in the eyes of the Koreans and the other peoples of Asia. The nonpermanent members only—none of them great military powers and none of them imperial powers—cannot, said Sir Benegal, "be accused or suspected of any expansionist ambitions."

There is no serious question but that this is a true expression of the judgment of Asia. Any proposal for a settlement originating among the Big Five is doomed to fail. It is doomed because the Big Five no longer dare to agree lest they appear to be weak. It is also doomed to fail because the suspicion of the peoples of Asia against the great powers is so very strong.

The Indian proposal would take the diplomatic initiative away from the great powers and give it to the small powers, led by India. Thus the proposals for a Korean settlement would be uncontaminated by the suspicion of imperialism and power politics, and they would bear the invaluable, indeed the indispensable, recommendation that they were the work of Asian thought and statesmanship.

The Indian action is well timed. The debate in the Security Council has reached a point where there was no chance of any understanding and yet there was nothing more to say. Mr. Malik had made his speech half a dozen times, and his principal arguments had been answered half a dozen times.

The law of diminishing returns had begun to set in for the arguments of both sides. Mr. Malik's constituents, having heard for 2 weeks that the United States is the aggressor in Korea, are soon bound to begin to ask what the great Soviet Union, the alleged lover and defender of the peace, is going to do about it. And our constituents all over the world, satisfied as they no doubt are that Mr. Malik is mischief bent, are beginning to ask what we are going to do about it except to make cutting remarks.

The time has clearly come when somebody has to act. But for the Russians as for ourselves the only actions left are to fight or to compromise. If neither is ready to fight and neither is willing to offer a compromise, then someone else, whose prestige is not at stake, must intervene.

The Indian action will help any government which has the sense to support it actively and cordially. It will embarrass any government which rejects it or evades it.

For it will provide the acid test in Asia, and almost certainly among the peace-loving masses of the western world also, of a disinterested purpose to achieve a just peace.

The Indian proposal is well timed in relation to the military situation. Though it is not as yet entirely certain, it is now probable that the United Nations forces will retain a foothold in Korea. In that event the world will not be dealing with the accomplished fact of the reunification of Korea by the North Korean Army. The campaign launched on June 25 will, despite all its successes, have been indecisive. The North Koreans will be faced with a long war unless there is a diplomatic solution. If there exists the plan of a fair and peaceable settlement for the whole of Korea, originated and sponsored by India and by the uncommitted nations of Asia, the North Koreans will find it hard to explain why the war must go on and why all the cities of Korea must be destroyed.

On the other hand, there is no use pretending that we too have not the strongest reasons for wishing to see a diplomatic solution. A victorious campaign back up the peninsula, assuming that the Korean war can be localized, is, of course, entirely within our power. Everybody knows that. Nobody would think of denying it. We do not have to prove to the world that the United States, supported by the British Commonwealth, is able to defeat North Korea.

What we do have to prove to the world is that we can help a country without destroying it. If we have to spend a year building up ground forces in the beachhead while the Air Force demolishes the roads, bridges, public utilities, and factories of all of Korea, the victory when it comes will indeed be Pyrrhic. Even if the operation is successful, the patient will be dead. We shall not have proved that we can contain aggression but only that we can wreck a country while the aggressor is trying to enslave it. That is not what we wish the Japanese, the Germans, the French, or anyone else to think that reliance upon collective security comes down to.

The Indian proposal is, therefore, most opportune as the Korean campaign is tending to end in what might be a long, expensive, and destructive stalemate.

Is Russia Ready?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Richard Wilson from the Miami Herald of August 11, 1950:

IS RUSSIA READY?—SPREAD OF UNITED STATES A-BOMB STOCKPILE HOLDS KEY TO WORLD WAR III

(By Richard Wilson)

WASHINGTON.—Russia's military might is big but it can be made a mere illusion if the United States takes the right road in the next 6 months.

This is the conviction of a group of younger officers—a Pentagon brain trust—which has been studying the relative strength of the United States and the U. S. S. R. for several years.

It takes imagination to grasp the new line of thinking which is taking root among the younger officers at the Pentagon. First, it is necessary to shed the concept that 350 or 400 atomic bombs—which is not far from our present supply—is a large stockpile.

Second, the idea must be abandoned that atomic weapons are costly. They are the cheapest form of destruction known to mankind.

Third, the idea must be rejected that one atomic bomb of the improved Eniwetok type is so destructive that a very few of them can achieve victory.

The general impression on how the bomb will be used pictures a valhalla of devastated cities: New York, Chicago, Washington in ruins. This could certainly happen if Russia should decide to use its growing supply of weapons in one-way missions against this Nation's industrial centers.

But military men are emphasizing more and more the "tactical" use of the bomb against troops and frontline installations, rather than the strategic use against cities and industrial concentrations.

Thus, an atomic bomb might be used to attack a 30-ship convoy crossing the Atlantic. Or, it might be used merely for the destruction of a bridge which was of crucial concentration of troops, on railway yards, on tank and truck parks.

If the Russians adhere to their military psychology of past wars that is the way they will use their bombs in world war III. Some doubters still think the Russians do not have an atomic weapon, citing as their only evidence one fact and one fallacy.

The fact is that President Truman referred only to an atomic explosion when he announced that the United States had detected atomic particles in the air which could have come only from the U. S. S. R. The fallacy is that a country must be big, rich, and like the United States in its industrial technology before it can make a bomb.

Physicists know, however, that once atomic fission is discovered the discoverers know how to make a bomb. Physicists also know that the technology of actually manufacturing bombs does not require a technology anywhere near the level of the United States, in spite of the popular impression to the contrary.

Therefore, qualified atomic scientists must assume, as most of them do, that Russia not only has an atomic bomb but a supply of them. It has known the theoretical secret and technology long enough to have manufactured a supply. The number 15 is chosen because of the time element involved since the first atomic explosion was detected.

Military planners looking to the war of the future, 3 to 5 years hence, must assume, therefore, that the Red army will have a formidable supply of atomic weapons. They already know that atomic development is given a higher priority in Russia than in the United States.

What should the United States do about it? The answer is simple if the concept of the advanced thinkers is followed. We should take the blinders off and begin a vast expansion of the atomic program on the order of 300 to 55 percent. This expansion might ultimately provide us a stockpile of 15,000 atomic weapons rather than 1,000.

We should, without any further delay, develop the whole panoply of weapons—atomic artillery shells, baby bombs (the full-sized atomic bomb in a small package), shaped charges (to penetrate tanks), atomic guided missiles, atomic fighter-bombers.

We should equip Europe's 17 divisions with these new death-dealing weapons at a rapid pace.

Furthermore, we should organize in Europe a plan of demolition in the path of a possible Red Army advance.

And then we should take a further step which requires us to think in new terms. We should recognize that for the first time in history it is possible for a nation to stockpile enough bombs so that even though the enemy could win the war, he could not accept the damage that would be inflicted on him. An atomic bomb does not become obsolete.

What nation would fight a war without a certain promise of victory?

What nation would start a war knowing that it would end in self-destruction?

Would the Russians move at all in Europe if they knew that England and France each had hundreds of bombs loaned or sold to them by the United States?

Why don't we take advantage now of our superior position in atomic production by vastly increasing it and by supplying the English and the French with bombs? What can be gained by further secrecy and limitation when the Russians already have the bomb?

These questions are still met by the familiar reply in Washington: "We must protect our atomic know-how." But a new line of thinking is developing which, if finally accepted at the highest level, at least arouses the hope that the atomic strength of a defender can be made so great that no aggressor will start a general war.

Private Enterprise Collects Federal Taxes Without Cost to the Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, actual costs of many phases of government today are hidden in services rendered the Government through private enterprise and at the expense of private enterprise.

These costs represent the time consumed in collection and the paper work involved in withholding taxes, social-security funds, and savings-bond sales. One firm for example, Chrysler Corp., recently released statistics showing that during 1949 Chrysler prepared and filed 255,000 separate tax forms and returns. Paper work in connection with taxes cost the corporation $500,000 a year. Also Chrysler collected in 1949 more than $20,000,000 in income withholding and old-age taxes. From July 1941 to June 30, 1950, it sold through its own staff and processed 6,161,379 bonds having a maturity value of $201,754,575.

Sometime ago I recognized the burden placed on private enterprise which is required to act as an agent for the Government in making tax collections, and I introduced H. R. 5230 to provide a reasonable reimbursement to firms for the expenses they incurred in such collections.

Since expenses of firms in behalf of the Government are reflected in higher costs of production and of necessity passed on to the public in retail pricing, no loss to the public and to the taxpayer would result if the Government assumed at least part of its rightful obligation for the cost of tax collections, and the American people would then know the actual cost of this function of Government which is now hidden and not calculated in Government expenditures.

In these days of fantastic budgets and fabulous spending, it is high time that we cease ignoring costs and examine our whole domestic budget with a view of charging all actual and necessary expenses to the Government and to eliminating all wasteful and nonessential spending.

The following is a copy of H. R. 5230 which, in my opinion, should receive the attention of this Congress. In the face of increased corporation taxes and many other expenses, it would appear only fair to give consideration to relief for private enterprise from the burden it must assume in the collection of taxes for the Government.

H. R. 5230

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code to provide compensation for employers required to withhold income tax at source on the wages of employees

Be it enacted, etc., That subchapter D of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the collection of income tax at source on wages) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 1628. Compensation to Employers for Withholding.

"(a) Compensation granted: The Commissioner shall, not less frequently than once a year, compensate each employer (other than a governmental employer) for the actual cost to the employer of deducting and withholding a tax at source on the wages of his employees, as required by this subchapter.

"(b) Claim required: No compensation shall be granted under this section to any employer for any period unless claim therefor is made and filed in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

"(c) Limit on compensation: The amount of compensation under this section to any employer for any period shall not exceed 10 percent of the aggregate amount lawfully deducted and withheld by the employer under this subchapter during such period.

"(d) Proof of cost: Compensation shall be granted under this section for any period only if the employer establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, the actual cost to the employer for such period of deducting and withholding tax under this subchapter.

"(e) Relation to income tax: For the purposes of the tax imposed by chapter 1—

"(1) compensation granted under this section shall not be considered income; but

"(2) to the extent that compensation is granted under this section for any cost, such cost shall not be allowable as a deduction for any taxable year.

"(f) Governmental employer defined: As used in this section, the term 'governmental employer' means the United States, or a State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any agency or instrumentality of one or more of the foregoing."

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this act shall apply only with respect to costs incurred on or after the date of enactment of this act.

Some Quotations on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article:

SOME QUOTATIONS ON KOREA—WHAT OUR LEADERS SAID, BEFORE AND AFTER

(Compiled by Richard Spong)

Given 4 or 5 months more training, American ground troops throughout the world will be able to take on anybody, any time, anywhere—Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff, November 3, 1949.

The reduced budget of $13,545,000,000 for the armed services offers an adequacy of defense for any situation that may arise in the next 2 years—Defense Secretary Johnson, January 10, 1950.

If South Korea were invaded, our attitude would be that South Korea would be able to resist—Secretary of State Acheson, January 12.

The defenses of the United States are in better shape than they have ever been when the country was not at war—President Truman, March 2.

The situation is now not nearly as bad as in the first half of 1946—President Truman, May 4

The basic reason I have for concluding that there will not be a war soon is because of the changed nature of war—General MacArthur, May 26.

The world is closer to peace now than it has been in the last 5 years—President Truman, June 1.

As you establish here a wholesome society of steadily expanding well-being, you will set up a peaceful influence which will disintegrate the hold of Soviet communism on your fellows to the north and irresistibly draw them into unity with you.—John Foster Dulles to Korean Assembly, June 19.

If we can hold for a month, the worst will be over—Gen. Chung I. Kwun, South Korean chief of staff, June 28.

The morale of North Korean troops is reported deteriorating under the continued pressure of United States air attacks—MacArthur headquarters, July 11.

The enemy has had his great chance but failed to exploit it—General MacArthur, July 20.

We aren't going to give up one more inch. We are going to stand and fight. There is no thought in the minds of anybody in this army that there is a chance—even if we were so disposed—that there could possibly be a Dunkerque—Gen. Walton H. Walker, July 29.

We had hell kicked out of us this morning.—General Walker, July 31.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Memphis Press-Scimitar:

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

On this fifth anniversary of VJ-day, we face this grim fact:

All-out war may come again to us, any day.

And we are not prepared for it. For we have neither the trained men nor the proper equipment to defend ourselves.

These deficiencies can be remedied, if we have time. We pray that we will.

Meanwhile, we must pay the price of our short-sightedness. It is a high price, too. Lives are being sacrificed in Korea. Lives which might have been saved had our troops been better trained and better equipped—and if we had had enough trained men to do the job our troops have been called upon to do.

This emergency has demonstrated that there is no adequate substitute for a sound system of universal military training. In no other way can we build up a reservoir of trained manpower of sufficient size to defend the Nation against attack.

Russia has 2,900,000 men in her army.

The United States has 591,700, and hopes to increase that total to a million within a few months. But more months of training will be required before the new recruits are prepared to take the field against troops as well trained as the Russians, or even many of the Soviet satellite troops, are known to be.

Until this new army is built up, largely from green draftees, and is ready to fight, this country will be in grave danger.

We would not be in this position if universal military training had been enacted in 1946 when President Truman, General Marshall, Governor Dewey, General Eisenhower, General MacArthur, and many other national leaders asked for such a law.

The plan provided for training 850,000 men each year. That would have given us trained Reserves of between three and four million men. If we had had that kind of force last June the Soviet probably would not have launched its campaign of aggression.

Britain is in much better shape than we are in this respect.

The British have a combination selective service and universal military training system. Under it, a million Britons have received training under actual service conditions since the end of World War II.

All qualified men between the ages of 18 and 26 must serve 18 months in one of the three fighting services. This period of full-time service is followed by 3 years of part-time service in the territorial army, similar to our National Guard. By 1954 the British Territorial Army will consist of 500,000 men who have had regular army service, most of it overseas. They also will have a million and a half trained men in reserve.

The legislation the American Legion currently is sponsoring calls for 6 months' basic military instruction. After that the trainees would be granted several options, including National Guard service, to complete the remainder of a required year's training. We are far from satisfied that this plan would produce the needed results. But it is better than having no training system at all.

In war, training, discipline, and equipment are decisive.

The penalty for being second best is surrender or death.

Our boys in Korea have been outnumbered. They've also been up against an enemy better trained and better equipped.

When a soldier turns tail and runs he isn't necessarily a coward. It's usually a case of confusion, because he hasn't been taught what to do instinctively in a crisis. That is a result of lack of training and poor discipline.

The well-trained soldier knows that the best defense is a strong offensive, in which every man plays his part. He knows that a break in the line invites disaster both for himself and his comrades. Moreover, he is confident the other members of his unit will not look back. That is the difference between an army and a mob.

Every American must share responsibility for the disasters in Korea, because the men we've sent there haven't had the training, the equipment, or the numbers to do their job.

We should adopt a universal military training system promptly, so that this can never happen again.

Shoot a Few

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN H. GUILL
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. GUILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Borger (Tex.) News-Herald:

SHOOT A FEW

Although the situation in Korea is grave, our greatest danger is right here at home.

Too long we have listened to those who have told us that capitalism could live side by side with communism; that Chinese communism was of a different and better brand than Russian communism; that we, instead of Russia, are the warmongers; and that we should soft-pedal our criticism of communism because Russia was our ally in World War II.

Russia was not our ally in World War II. Russians did nothing for us in World War II that could possibly offset the harm they did our national-defense effort up until the very minute that they became engaged in a war with Germany. We all remember how they sided with Hitler and his Nazi regime in trying to keep our Nation weak up until those two evil persons, Stalin and Hitler, ceased to be friends when Hitler betrayed Stalin by attacking Russia.

June 22, 1941, when Germany invaded Russia, Stalin's communistic party in the United States made an abrupt change from pro-Nazi and anti-American to anti-Nazi and everything to save dear old Russia.

Six months later, when we entered the war, Russia was fighting for its very existence, and was practically a defeated nation. We became their ally and proceeded to defend Russia against Germany. All Russia did was to fight for her existence and accept billions of dollars of war material from us, giving us in return only insults and obvious contempt. Yes; we were their ally, but they were not in any sense of the world at any time our ally.

It is no longer a question of business as usual in our own Nation, faced again with wartime controls. That of its very nature places us under what we can only hope must be a temporary form of dictatorship. It can be good, temporarily, for the purpose of winning the war, if we immediately and vigorously set our house in order so that we may win this world war III.

LEADERSHIP NEEDED

It is a time that calls for courageous leadership. We need national leadership that will do what should be done to win this war regardless of political considerations. This means that we need men who have the courage to make all Communists and fellow travelers within our own country incapable of doing us further harm.

Now is no time to have one eye on Korea and the other eye on the November elections. If our present leadership displays the sort of courage and intelligent action that loyal Americans have a right to expect at this critical hour, these gentlemen need not fear the popular voice of the people when reduced to ballot form at our regular elections.

There is no need trying to hide facts and avoid honest self-criticism at this time when we must put our house in order.

Only the strong will survive this war and we as a nation of people must be the stronger.

The facts are that our Nation today is under a continuation of the leadership that won victory in World War II only to display exceedingly poor judgment in the matter of preserving world peace which should have been the fruits of that victory. In other words we lost the fruits of the victory because our leadership proved unequal to the situation, whether we like to admit this fact or not.

Notwithstanding all that has been said during the last war and since the last war by prominent Americans, over the radio, in our national magazines, and in our newspapers, giving adequate and fair warning as to what would happen to us if we permitted Russia to continue, as we have permitted Russia to continue, to force democracy into one constant retreat, our leaders have permitted communism to become a definite threat to our very existence.

Too many people in our country have espoused the cause of communism and have directly and indirectly shielded communism and its fellow travelers. Otherwise, why would it be so difficult for us to convict those whom we have placed on trial because of things they have done or said that strongly condemn them in the eyes of decent and loyal American citizens?

Americans are an intelligent people. They also love peace. Charity, faith, and hope are their constant companions. This, unfortunately, has left them open to the most brutal conspiracy ever designed by the mind of man, and that is the conspiracy of communism with its goal to enslave all people.

Perhaps this will explain why Martin Dies and others, who as members of the Un-American Activities Committee have worked hard to expose communism in our Government and in our Nation, have met with such strong and bitter rebuffs from people who should have known better but who no doubt were being guided more by the nobler instincts of their hearts than by cold reasoning based on the reflections of current events.

It will do us very little good to sacrifice our men overseas, as we are now doing in Korea, if we continue to permit Communists and fellow travelers right here at home to do their evil work.

If we would isolate all known Communists either on some island or in some camp remote from civilization, we would probably save the lives of thousands of our men and boys who otherwise would die in combat with Russians and Russian slaves.

No one would suggest that these people be mistreated, although it would be quite proper to shoot a few of them when found guilty of treason. The main thing is to put them where they cannot do us any further harm.

It will be bad enough for them to consume the food and other essentials so vitally needed by loyal Americans making every possible sacrifice to defend our way of life.

This might leave the fellow travelers out in the open but with the known Communists locked up, it would not be quite so hard for the FBI to keep an eye on the fellow travelers. Then, whenever a fellow traveler should expose himself as an enemy working against our war effort, we could provide him with comfortable living quarters with the rest of his Communist friends in their isolated retreat from the responsibilities of the world.

If ever there was a time when we needed men in political office who would put duty to their country first, second, and last, it is now. Politicians and lesser politicians can go their way but when the chips are down the people will vote for the man and men who have the intestinal fortitude to win this war and make the rest of the world respect us forever.

UNTIL WE KNOW

Isn't it bad enough that our weakness is obvious to all the world in the defeats we are now suffering in Korea, thanks to the neglect of our military and diplomatic departments that failed to properly prepare for such a grave emergency?

Must we continue to leave ourselves open to further defeats through neglect on the home front where the agents of communism constitute an element of danger even greater than the possible loss of every man now in Korea which now confronts us?

Decent and loyal Americans look to their leadership for total preparedness.

We must, as quickly as possible, place our Nation on a total-war footing and we must stay on a basis of total preparedness for war until such time as we know that the enemy is totally disarmed and made harmless to cause further suffering throughout the world.

We cannot again demobilize until we know that Russia will keep the peace.

Services of Hon. J. Hardin Peterson, of Florida

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a member of the House of Representatives is voluntarily retiring this year who will be missed by everyone. I refer to the genial, lovable, distinguished gentleman from Florida, the Honorable J. HARDIN PETERSON. In my 14 years here, I can think of no Member who has more friends or who has worked harder or more effectively.

It was my privilege to become fairly well acquainted with Mr. PETERSON during my first term, when in the summer of 1938 we both served on the Joint Select Committee for the Investigation of Phosphate Resources. I found him then to be industrious, sincere, pleasant, fair, and honest. Those are attributes which are prized in any group and nowhere more than in the House of Representatives. Years of association have only increased the degree in which I would ascribe them to the gentleman from Florida.

I also saw him in action at close range some years later, when he brought a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands to South Dakota to consider some questions of peculiar interest to our State. He gave every witness who appeared the most courteous of treatment and many people were impressed by the interpretation which his conduct gave to the dignity and character of a committee of the Congress.

During the Eighty-first Congress, we have all again had occasion to witness his great industry and generous giving of time to the flood of bills on the wide range of subjects handled by the Committee on Public Lands. I have the opinion that this committee under his leadership has considered and acted upon a greater number of bills than any similar committee in the history of the House. "Pete" has done a great job; he has earned his retirement. We all hope he lives many, many years to enjoy it and to return once in a while to visit old scenes and old friends on Capitol Hill.

Hon. John E. Rankin, of Mississippi, and the House Un-American Activities Committee—Great Credit Due Him

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks an article by George Rothwell Brown which recalls the gallant fight by our colleague, Hon. JOHN RANKIN, for the establishment of the old Dies committee to be a permanent House committee, under the name of the House Un-American Activities Committee. The value of the committee to this country cannot be judged now. It is safe to say, however, that it is the one committee which has brought to judgment one Alger Hiss. Others of his type are still at large but are well known.

Mr. Speaker, it was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] whose persistent effort forced a change in the rules on the opening day of the Seventy-ninth Congress. I shall never forget his fight. His victory will always be a monument to him while a Member of this House.

POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

SAN FRANCISCO, August 15.—On January 3, 1945, the House of Representatives made a decision upon which the fate of this country depended, although perhaps few realized then the extent to which this was true.

On that fateful day, over the protests of Roosevelt's stooges in the Democratic leadership, the Un-American Activities Committee was established as one of the standing committees of the House with full powers to make investigations into the Communist conspiracy and to formulate and report proposed legislation to deal with it.

This function it is now exercising, and the Red peril is being dealt with.

The old Dies committee was expiring. When the usual routine motion was made on the opening day of the Seventy-ninth Congress to adopt the rules of the previous Congress, Representative RANKIN (Democrat), of Mississippi, offered an amendment to create the present Un-American Activities Committee.

Caught off guard the Democratic leaders strove vainly to prevent its adoption.

RANKIN charged that if it were defeated a vast amount of evidence gathered by the Dies committee over a 7-year period, would be destroyed.

We now understand what a national calamity that would have been.

A coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats forced the adoption of the Rankin motion, 208 to 186.

As we look back we realize that no more important vote than this has been taken in Congress for many years.

If the committee investigating the Communist conspiracy had died that day, and no successor had been created, Alger Hiss would not have been exposed, indicted, tried and convicted.

We would be at war with Soviet Russia—as actually we are—with a fifth column of traitors in our midst, whose treason has neither been suspected nor laid bare.

The top Communist leaders who have been put on trial in New York, and for whom the jails are opening their doors, would still be at liberty, free to carry out their plots against the security of this Republic.

"There is a world-wide conspiracy," Representative Cox of Georgia, told the House—"There is a campaign against constitutional government going on all over the world.

"The people who are engineering and participating in the furtherance of this campaign are the people who are most often denouncing the work of the Dies committee."

Among the 186 House Members who voted to end the investigation of the Communist menace in this country, on that eventful day, were some who were just too plain dumb and fuzzy-minded to realize the gravity of what they were doing.

But VITO MARCANTONIO knew what he was doing all right, and you may lay to that.

Some there were who realized that if the Dies Committee passed out of existence the Department of Justice would raise no hand to expose the spies of the Kremlin, and their traitorous American pawns.

They were right. It was not the Attorney General, but members of the Un-American Activities Committee, who relentlessly pursued and finally brought Alger Hiss to justice.

There is a significant connection between that fateful vote in the House and the senatorial contest in California.

One of the members of the committee who kept relentlessly after Hiss until they got the goods on him, pumpkin papers and all, is the Republican candidate, Representative RICHARD M. NIXON.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Seventy-ninth Congress, January 3, 1945, shows that on that date the former movie star who is running against him for the Senate, Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, voted to kill the Un-American Activities Committee.

That this was by no mere accident is further shown by the fact that subsequently she has consistently voted to deny funds to this committee which enable it to carry on its exposure of the Kremlin's conspiracy against the safety and security of the American people and their form of government.

In all the 10 States whose political situations have been surveyed by this reporter for the past month, the people are making the Communist menace—and especially subversion, actual or suspected, within the Government in Washington—a paramount issue.

They see it closely connected with the war in Korea.

In California where the line is so sharply drawn, it may be the determining factor in the senatorial campaign.

Questions the President Should Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEO E. ALLEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an unusual, sincere letter from a young wife from my home town.

She has asked me many questions which only the Democratic Party can answer because the Democratic Party is in control of all three branches of our Government.

As a Member of Congress I have patiently waited for President Truman to tell the people his plans, his policy. This he has not done; the people remain in the dark. I deeply regret that it will be necessary to write this young lady that I cannot answer her questions until the Chief Executive informs Congress of his plans.

GALENA, ILL., August 14, 1950.

Hon. LEO ALLEN,

House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My husband, home for a brief four and a half years after 3 years service in the Marine Corps, is again being forced into active service. The Marine Corps issues a blunt command, my husband and thousands of other men are forced to leave their families, jobs, everything they hold dear, without being told even one simple fact as to their future.

Therefore, you, as a representative of the people, one of the men who passes the laws which govern and rule our country, are being asked to give me these facts.

First, I wish to know how long the Government can force my husband to remain in service? If there is no world war III after the Korean conflict is settled, can my husband be forced to remain in service for years waiting for a war?

Secondly, my husband is a veteran, he is 28 years of age, has a family and is trying to buy a home, whereas there are millions of men in this country single and married who enjoy all liberties of this country, but have never served a day in the armed services. Will there be some form of replacement, so that as time passes these men being called on now can expect to be released?

Third, will my husband and other American men be sent to fight in every foreign country that a shot is fired? Most Americans do not object to fighting and dying to protect their own country, but the American people are greatly concerned and outraged that American men be forced to fight and die for other countries—anyone of whom would stab us in the back were the opportunity presented.

Therefore, will you please, if possible, relieve some of the heartache and tension going on in the minds and hearts of millions of Americans by telling people a few facts. The majority of people are kept in ignorance—that is why there is so much fear today. We are supposed to be a free people—these days that is quite difficult to keep believing.

Last, explain to me the laws and functions of the Reserve Corps of the various services. My husband joined against my wishes—he'll never join any military organization again—neither will a large majority of the men who have been caught in this trap.

I do not mean to be rude or in any way criticize my Government or its lawmakers—I have much to be grateful for due to my Government and these lawmakers. I only wish to understand these things that I have asked you. If you could and would explain some facts to me my heart and mind would be greatly relieved when my husband has to leave me.

Sincerely,

LAVONNE (SCHLEICHTER) DAVENPORT.

The Postal Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the passage of H. R. 8195 because I felt that the arbitrary action of the Postmaster General in issuing the curtailment order was unnecessary and certainly not in the best interests of the people.

It seemed to me that more valid means of economy were available to the administration. Indeed, had the recommendations of the Hoover Commission with respect to the reorganization of the Post Office Department been carried out, there would have been no need for such drastic action and a sum far in excess of the savings accomplished by this move would have been realized. Had these recommendations been carried out, it is estimated that a saving of $256,000,000 would have resulted. The curtailment of so vital a public service is certainly not the answer to the need for economy. It would be more feasible, it seems to me, to increase the cost of the luxury services of the Department, such as air mail and parcel post.

Moreover, it is important that our industries should have the benefit of adequate mail service, particularly at this time of national danger. Let us not be penny-wise and pound-foolish. Furthermore, rapid mail service is a tremendous factor in the morale of our fighting men.

Originally the need for the curtailment of postal service was explained as resulting from action by the House Appropriations Committee in cutting the Post Office budget for the fiscal year 1951. The fact of the matter is that a substantial cut in the appropriations for the Post Office Department for 1951 was made by the executive department—by the Bureau of the Budget. In addition, on October 16, 1949, H. R. 91 was signed into public law. This measure provides a long-range development program for improvement in the functioning of the Department. It is high time to implement this legislation.

I hope that the present administration, realizing the popular demand for economy, particularly at this time of defense spending, will proceed to effect the changes and adjustments necessary to make this Government Department an efficient modern functioning agency.

Malik's Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Memphis Commercial Appeal:

MALIK'S SERVICE

Jacob Malik, head of the Soviet Union's delegation to the United Nations, serves as President of the Security Council during this month. He has so far succeeded in stalling all progress toward a discussion of an American resolution that would condemn North Korean aggression and urge all member nations to use their influence to stop the fighting and to avoid any further incidents of the sort.

Mr. Malik has, however, served one good purpose. The tone and content of his harangues has proved to the entire free world that the Russian Government is cynically dedicated to the Hitlerian technique of the big lie. Mr. Malik lies, and knows he is doing so, but, of course, he has a secret police agent right at his back, and with him it is a case of whether to lie or die.

Mr. Malik's performance indicates that no one would ever want a Red government, unless it were people who are essentially thieves, despots, and liars themselves. Incidentally, the people we have lately been arresting for betraying their country look the part.

To Win, Our Men in Korea Need a Cause To Fight for—Our Foreign Policy Needs Defining

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, what are we fighting for? Why are we in Korea? There are but a few of the questions that reports from the war front inform us are being asked by the average GI.

The answer to these questions must be supplied before our Armed Forces can be welded into an effective team force capable of fighting with an aggressive determination that will produce maximum gains on the battlefield.

The GI understands that he has been sent to fight for his life in a war which he has been informed is a part of a United Nations action. But where are the soldiers from other nations who were to support him in the Korean war? Why is he facing the reality of guns, bullets, bayonets, and all the ingenious monster of destruction devised by man while soldiers from other member nations of the UN remain at home?

FROM UN MEMBER NATIONS

To date, military help actually in the field in the Korean conflict consists of one fighter squadron, one destroyer, and one frigate from Australia. Great Britain has sent two aircraft carriers, three cruisers, six destroyers, six frigates, one hospital ship, and one tanker. Canada has produced three destroyers and one air-transport squadron. The Netherlands sent one destroyer.

Where are the infantrymen, the combat flyers from other nations? They are not in Korea and our American GI's want to know why all the suffering and the dying for a UN cause has been assigned to them.

WHERE IS UN HELP?

Military help, which may be too little and too late, has been offered from other sources to be delivered in the future, including 2,000 troops from Australia, 2,000 to 3,000 troops from New Zealand, 5,000 infantrymen from the Philippine Republic, 4,500 troops from Turkey, a 4,000-man combat team from Thailand, a self-contained ground force of 6,000 from Great Britain, a volunteer brigade of 4,000 to 5,000 troops from Canada, 500 volunteers from Costa Rica, and 30 officers from Bolivia.

Offers of men for combat total approximately 28,000, but the GI in Korea still asks "Where are the others?" They are not in Korea fighting and dying side by side with an estimated 75,000 Americans.

Nationalist China offered 33,000 troops and 20 transport planes for use in Korea, but this offer was not accepted.

In addition to the military assistance already listed, Panama has offered volunteers, but not stated the number. In materials Norway offers some sea transportation. India offers one ambulance unit and one surgical unit. Belgium offers air transportation. France offers one sloop, Greece six transport planes. The Union of South Africa offers one fighter squadron, Denmark 10 ambulances with personnel, and Sweden a 200-bed field hospital with personnel.

Thus far, however, the aid given or promised by other UN members is small compared with United States forces now engaged in combat in Korea and the vast number of men now being drafted into the Armed Forces in America.

It is time for American leadership to emerge with some definite constructive explanation of our policy abroad, both as a nation and as a member of the United Nations organization, and including our objectives in the Korean conflict. The time has come for the United States to assume the initiative in world affairs.

WILL KOREA VICTORY STOP COMMUNISM?

American GI's have a right to know whether victory in Korea can be expected to stem Communist aggression in Asia, whether when victory is won the administration will follow military success with appropriate action to bring Asia into the fold of democracy. If Korea is permitted, at the end of this bloody war to return to the Communist fold and continue as a satellite of Russia, then the question of the American GI can well be echoed by Americans everywhere.

Two world wars have been fought in this century to "make the world safe for democracy." Twice have the young men, our best and finest, been sacrificed on bloody battlefields in the far corners of the globe to win decisive victories which they were told would save their sons and grandsons from the horrors of future war.

And the American soldier marched away to battle, fought and won to protect and preserve his country and to secure the blessings of liberty and peace for posterity.

And at the end of each war the administration in power, a Democratic administration, failed completely to consolidate the victory won by force and forge an effective and lasting peace.

Today our leaders vacillate from one position to another. President Truman hailed American intervention in Korea as a step which would bring lasting world peace nearer than it had been prior to that momentous occasion. But within a few weeks' time the inevitability of a third world war was being discussed in many quarters. Americans are being called upon to sacrifice, but are told that whether their sacrifices will bring peace or war only a handful of men in Moscow know and will decide.

FIRM FOREIGN POLICY NEEDED

This Nation, founded by men such as Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, and John Adams, cannot remain in such a state of submission to the whims of another unfriendly power. This United States, which in its infancy accepted the challenge of the British Empire in the War of 1812, surely cannot assume passive acceptance of the present situation.

We must have a definite policy both as a nation and as a member of the United Nations. If we are to act in coordination with other nations of the world to prevent the spread of direct threats to the freedom of the western world, then the time has arrived for our allies to shoulder that burden to the full extent to which they are able and with equal sacrifice to that of the American people.

Unless we know at least where our leaders hope to take us, what we can hope to accomplish through the program of world-wide commitments of American resources and manpower, the GI in Korea or any other part of the world where he may be engaged will continue to ask that simple question, "Why am I here?"

The following article from the New York Times by Richard J. H. Johnston indicates the total lack of an adequate, strong, and positive foreign policy:

GI'S IN KOREA HANDICAPPED BY UNAWARENESS OF MISSION

(By Richard J. H. Johnston)

TOKYO, August 11.—A lack of psychological preparation for violence and the dangers of armed combat has proved one of the greatest weaknesses among average American soldiers in their efforts in Korea to stem the relentless and fanatical tide of Communist invaders.

On one's return to this headquarters after more than 2 weeks with the troops along the fringe of the defense line, an evaluation of the GI's predicament in Korea begins to take form.

The average GI seems not to know why he is fighting in Korea. He does not seem to understand why as a United Nations soldier he has only South Koreans beside him in the battle line. He appears puzzled that he was thrust with all haste from the soft comforts of garrison duty in Japan, Okinawa, and Hawaii or the peaceful atmosphere of the United States into the filth and violence of the battlefield.

He faces a foe who is zealous, resourceful, and hard. All of this adds up in the GI's mind to a conclusion that someone has put him into a mess he does not understand.

This correspondent has talked with soldiers beside thundering artillery pieces, on chow lines, in convoys moving to the front, in fox holes, aid stations, ambulances, and hospitals, aboard trains and planes to and from the battle area, aboard troop ships tied up at Korean piers, in the heat of sun-baked river beds, and at lonely mountain-top outposts.

Only a few of the older noncommissioned officers and officers expressed knowledge and understanding of the significance of their mission.

But to the GI who must bear the brunt of the fighting, the realization that service in the regular peacetime Army involved the risk of death on a strange battleground came only when he moved into the combat area.

GI IS DISILLUSIONED

"The recruiting posters didn't say anything about this," one young infantryman said as he moved toward the front. "I'll fight for my country, but damned if I see why I'm fighting to save this hell hole.

"I heard some stuff on the way over about this being a United Nations deal. Where's the rest of the United Nations?"

Asked what they were doing when this war began, the soldiers gave such replies as these:

"I guarded dependent houses on Okinawa."

"I swam every afternon at Waikiki."

"I just finished basic training back in the States."

Talks with troops who had been blooded in battle revealed bitterness and a conviction that they were being sacrificed to American unpreparedness.

The flame of determination here glimmered fitfully in a few individuals. The majority revealed no inspired determination.

VETERAN FIGHTS FOR LIFE

"I'll tell you what I'm fighting for," a veteran of the Bulge said, "I'm fighting for my life."

The tragic commitment under the press of events of handfuls of troops daily in the war left the GI's with a feeling of hopelessness and nakedness.

The saw themselves as a small scattered band dropped into the Korean Peninsula with paralyzing suddenness. They had at the time only a thin tenuous supply line. Behind them lay the homeland, momentarily neither at peace nor at war.

There have been acts of heroism, but in the words of one colonel:

"Acts of heroism inspire others to do the impossible, but in war the final impossible can be achieved only by teamwork. We have an Army but no team. We are only a handful here and the enemy seems limitless. We can hold for a while here and there, but until there are many more of us, there is little we can do except die."

A commander of infantry said: "I can tell my men what to do. I can show them how to do it. But until they understand why they are doing it, they can't do it well.

"These men are doing the best they can, but as you can see it's not enough."

His observations were paraphrased by a 19-year-old corporal, recounting his experiences after his position had been overrun:

"I keep asking myself what I am doing here. The funny thing is I can't answer my own question."

OUR FOREIGN POLICY NEEDS DEFINING

Our foreign policy is so doubtful that our military leaders have been unable to inform our fighting men in Korea of what they are fighting for. How can the most modern military equipment in the hands of well-trained men, who have no understanding of the issues for which they are fighting—which has reduced the effect of their arms to the serious point of almost defeat—be successful against the fanatical determination, courage, and drive of the North Koreans with less-modern arms and no supporting air power or naval force?

There is a crying need for adequate leadership in the executive branch of the Government, for fewer politicians and "stripe pants 4-o'clock tea diplomats," and for more men of purpose and unquestioned loyalty to the people of the United States.

Undoubtedly the reason we do not have such men at the present time in these important offices is because the Democratic Party has beer in power too long, has become indifferent to the needs of the people, and evidently believes that its entrenched power cannot be challenged.

The Faith of Our Fathers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 17 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a noteworthy address recently delivered by the Honorable William Jennings Bryan, Jr., the son of the son of the great Commoner.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FAITH OF OUR FATHERS

(By William Jennings Bryan, Jr.)

So, let's take another look at American democracy, and try to understand the spiritual basis of the ideals under which it was created.

These ideals are expressed in the first paragraph of the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Such were the ideals for which our forefathers fought the War of Independence. It is no mere figure of speech to say that America was the cradle of liberty, for in that struggle for independence, there was born the kind of democracy of which men had long dreamed, but had never before achieved.

But our Constitution was not achieved without a bitter struggle, for there were in the Constitutional Convention many strong men who did not trust the people, and who fought for a strong centralized government. Moreover, the States were jealous of their individual powers and did not want to surrender them to a government set up by all of the people of all of the States.

It was a herculean task to overcome the doubts and fears and prejudices of the delegates to the Continental Congress and to the Constitutional Convention. The ideals of democracy expressed in the Declaration of Independence trembled in the balance until the last desperate struggle for ratification in the State conventions was ended. In some of these States, a margin of one vote spelled the difference between victory and defeat. So grave were the doubts of ratification that the convention made the acceptance by 9 of the 13 Colonies sufficient to establish the Government.

The thing that made our Government different from all other forms of constitutional government was not the division of its functions into legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and the system of checks and balances to limit the powers of each of its branches, rather it was the fact that it recognized the individual as supreme, and that each citizen held in his puny hands all the powers of government.

The Constitution itself is replete with reservations of powers to the States, and to the people. In construing it, our courts have held time and time again, that every power is reserved to the people, that is not, either in express terms or by necessary implication, given up by them, and vested exclusively in the Federal Government. The most vital words in the entire document are to be found in the preamble itself, "We, the people, in order to form a more perfect union * * * and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution."

And yet, the ink was scarcely dry upon the Constitution, when at its very first session, the Congress passed the first 10 amendments, known as the Bill of Rights, and presented them to the States for ratification. These expressed further limitations and reservations upon the powers of government, and defined in specific terms, certain rights of the people, certain liberties, upon which even the Government could not infringe.

The first amendment forbade the Congress to make any law abridging religious freedom, freedom of speech, of the press, or the right of the people to peaceable assemble, and petition the Government for redress of their grievances.

The fourth, expressed the right of the people to be secure in their persons and homes, against searches and seizures.

The fifth, that no person could be held to answer for an infamous crime, except upon indictment, or be compelled to be a witness against himself, or be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; the sixth, gave the right to trial by jury.

Then through the years, followed still other amendments, the abolition of slavery, direct election of Senators by the people, women's suffrage—all adopted to secure still further the rights and liberties of the individual.

But that was not all; the people took steps to make the State governments ever more responsive to their will. They adopted the direct primaries, so that individuals might run for elective office, regardless of political organizations or party action. They adopted the initiative and referendum, so that they might make or repeal the laws, regardless of the action of their legislators. They adopted the recall, so that public officials might be removed from office, if they betrayed the trust imposed in them.

In fact, the whole history of our democracy, from 1776 to this day, has been a continuous chronicle of measures and reforms, adopted to make Government, both State and Federal, more and more responsive to the will of the people.

We owe a debt of eternal gratitude to Thomas Jefferson, who did more than any other man to write into our organic law the freedoms of the common man. He was unalterably opposed to statism in any form. Even in his declining days, 30 years after our Nation was born, he still wrote of his faith. He must have had the statists in mind when he wrote: "It is sometimes said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he then be trusted with the government of others?" And witness the gentle irony of his conclusion: "Or have we found angels in the form of kings, to govern him? Let history answer this question."

And history has always answered. It has answered with the Hitlers, Mussolinis, and Stalins, and Quislings, and horrors of Pearl Harbor, and Lidice, and Auschwitz, and Buchenwald.

It has been an unending struggle, but there the laws stand, the principles of American democracy are now the law of the land. But that does not mean that our liberties are secure.

I want here, to challenge the statement that is so often made, that the Constitution guarantees our liberties, for it does nothing of the kind. We know from our own experience, there is sometimes a vast difference between the letter of the law and the spirit in which it is carried out. If we could just change men's hearts by passing a law, how simple our problems would be.

No; they cannot be changed in that way. The laws can state the rules and regulations to govern human conduct, but they cannot force men to carry them out, for no law can change human nature. No law can create patriotism or the desire for equality, or justice, or a passion for freedom, for these are spiritual attributes, that are born of the ideals and hopes and aspirations, that exist only in the hearts of men. There is no guaranty of your freedoms except the power, which comes from a spiritual determination, to achieve the equality and justice and good will, that our Constitution seeks to create.

The only reason we have our Constitution today, is that the blessings of liberty, were more precious than life to the men of that generation, and they were willing to fight and to die, in order to gain them. The same dauntless "spirit of '76" that inspired the men of that day is the only thing that can preserve them now. I sometimes wonder how many of us have lost that spirit today.

Have you ever stopped to think why this individual freedom was more precious than life to the revolutionary patriots and why it has been the goal of mankind since the beginning of time? Why, in every epoch in history, and regardless of race or color or creed men have fought to achieve it?

I think it was because out of the brutal slavery and serfdom of countless generations throughout the ages came the belated recognition of this spiritual freedom, as the source of all culture and progress, and as the divine spark that fires the creative spirit of man and generates the only force that can lift him above the brute.

I think it was because man learned from bitter experience that when thought is regimented it ceases to be creative; that when science is regimented it ceases to be science; that when literature is regimented it ceases to be literature and becomes propaganda; and that spiritual freedom is essential to the creative processes.

This spiritual freedom is a personal matter; it is an attribute only of the individual. Men can cooperate and work together to carry out a common plan. Ideas, once they are created, can be developed and explored and amplified, but there is no such thing as a collective mind

Thoughts have to begin somewhere, and there is no fact in all the realm of science or of literature or of music or the arts that is not the product of individual thought.

There is literally nothing under the sun that has been gained in any other way. The paper on which this is written, the books you read, the painting you admire, the music you enjoy, the clothing that you wear, the medicines that cure your ills, the homes in which you dwell, the infinite machines that do your labor or flash your voice to the ends of the earth, the ships that plow the seas, the planes that track the boundless skies, all that you have that makes your life worth while was first a nebulous thought in the mind of some fellow man.

Each one of us profits from the labors of all who have gone before. All that you have you have received from your fellow man. In this respect you are the heirs of all the ages, and in this simple fact is the divine basis for the real brotherhood of man.

It seems to me there is something wrong with our histories which clutter their pages so largely with the rise and fall of empires, and the stratagems of wars, when the victories that have meant most to humanity, have been won without noise or fanfare in the humble shelters where man makes his home.

One by one we do count in all human affairs. By the mere fact of birth our individual unit is added to the sum of life's problems, and the part we can play in solving them depends upon whether we are free to create and upon what use we make of our freedom.

This spiritual freedom is the vital essence of American democracy. I think it is even more than that. I believe it is a part of the Creator's plan for the upward progress of the human race.

This philosophy of spiritual freedom is the thing that communism denies and inevitably destroys, and that is all we need to know to understand the specious sham of all its doctrines. It makes no difference whether they follow the pattern of a Marx or Engels, a Trotzky, a Lenin, or a Hitler, or a Stalin, or whether they talk of communism or socialism or fascism; their objectives are all the same.

They seek to construct a Frankenstein state, to control and coerce, to take over business and industry and the means of production, to take over the distribution of the products of labor, and make every man dependent for his very existence upon the dictates of the masters, of the omnipotent state. This is no step forward in human relations.

This was the dream of tyrants, before the days of Ghengis Khan. It is a brutal doctrine, that can only live through force and violence. It is a philosophy, which leads back to the darkness, from which man through the ages, has painfully groped his way, and not towards the welcoming dawn of a better day.

Our principles of democracy, express a philosophy of Government that inspires an abiding faith, in the ultimate triumph of right. It justifies hope, and confidence, in the betterment of human relations; for all things are possible, where man's spirit is free to create.

There are no insolvable problems, in a society where every man is equal in political power, and even the lowliest citizen, is still free to think, and act, and give of his individual efforts to make democracy live; for all things are changeable, save the inherent and unalienable rights of man.

Can there be any doubt, but that the minds that can split the atom, and unleash the physical forces, that can destroy the human race, can develop the spiritual forces that will enable men to cooperate and to live together in peace?

I suffer no delusions, as to the problems that will have to be met. We still have a long way to go, before we can gear our democratic processes, to keep pace with the changing demands of an ever-changing world. It can be done, for the power to change is in our hands, but it will take time, and patience, and effort. As Jefferson once said, "The ground to liberty, must be gained by inches, and we must be content to secure what we can gain, from time to time, and eternally press forward, for what is yet to come. It takes time, to persuade men to do, even what is for their own good."

The main thing, that is wrong with our country today, is that we of this generation, have taken our freedoms too much for granted, and have failed to assume the responsibility that is ours, to see that our democracy works.

We have failed in many respects to achieve the equality of opportunity our principles have sought to create, or to soften the social impacts a free competition entails. We believe in democracy, but we view with dismay many of the things that go on in our country today. Things that go on because we have been too much concerned with material progress to give much thought to our spiritual needs. We seem to have forgotten there is as much need for social stability and tranquillity as there is for progress of reform.

We certainly have not achieved the optimum distribution of the enormous production of our industrial machine; we suffer from overproduction and underconsumption of many of the necessities of life; too many of our people are hungry and unemployed; the security of the aged is far too uncertain; small business finds it harder and harder to meet the competition of vast aggregations of wealth; there are too many individuals who feel the Government owes them a living, regardless of their contributions to society. There are too many organized groups who, by political pressure, are demanding special consideration at the hands of government, at the expense of the public, who must pay all the bills.

These are all problems we will have to do something about. But let us make no mistake as to where the remedy lies.

The problems that plague us are not due to the failure of government. They are due to the failure of the American people to use the powers that are in their hands to keep the changing circumstances of an industrial age within the bounds our democracy requires.

The responsibility for much of this failure must be laid at the door of those who have created our vast industrial machine. They have been too busy with the problems of business to give much thought to the problems of life; too busy erecting an industrial empire to examine the social foundation upon which their world rests. For this reason they have not understood the spiritual basis of American democracy and the moral obligation our philosophy entails to see that the liberties under the law that we claim for ourselves are likewise preserved for every other citizen.

Oh I know there is no end to the problems that will have to be solved, but I know too that they can only be solved in the American way, by the creative genius of free men, working together for the common good.

Twenty-eighth Called Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 17 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Twenty-eighth Called Up," published in the Washington (Pa.) Reporter, of August 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTY-EIGHTH CALLED UP

The expected has come to pass.

Ever since the North Korean horde was turned loose and sent smashing across the border into South Korea the American people have been warned that National Guard units would be alerted for active duty, and so the orders late yesterday afternoon calling up the famed Twenty-eighth Division, Pennsylvania's own, were received in stride.

It had been anticipated that when fighting men were needed, with training and background considered, that the famous Iron Division, which has an illustrious history, would be among the first to be called and thus the orders to return home for summons to service about the first of September were no surprise.

However, there is no dancing in the streets of Washington and the other communities which are sending their men into active service. The road ahead is certain to be filled with hardship and suffering, but we realize that a job of more than ordinary magnitude has to be done and we are confident that the men to do that job are found in the ranks of the Twenty-eighth.

The Old Tenth, the forerunner of the Twenty-eighth Infantry Division, established its fighting qualities in the Spanish-American War and as such was sworn into Federal service shortly after the entrance of the United States in World War I.

Prior to that the men of the outfit saw service on the Mexican border.

Several years of jittery peace followed and then the flame of war again seared much of the world with the Twenty-eighth being activated for service in World War II.

And now again scores of young men, who have gone beyond the ordinary demands of citizenship by offering themselves to the Nation, will march away from Washington, ready to face up to whatever comes.

And that they will do so in the tradition which surrounds the Twenty-eighth goes without saying.

Washington has always been proud of the National Guard men who represented her on the field of battle because, when the chips were down and the enemy was pouring it on, the men of the Division could be depended on to do what had to be done.

Like it or not, and none of us like it, we must face up to realities and when we do that we come face to face with the fact that a savage lust for power is abroad in the world and that, if free men and women are to continue to enjoy the blessings of freedom they must fight for it.

War is a strength sapping, nerve wracking business at the best and, at the same time brings out the best and worst in humankind.

It has the faculty of making us walk shoulder to shoulder with our fellowmen in the face of a common danger, and at the same time it degrades the mind and harms the body.

It is not a series of clean-cut actions with flags flying and battle cries issuing from the throats of charging men as they rush to meet the enemy. It is far from that. It is fought in the mud and dust of whatever terrain presents itself. It is a clock around challenge to jaded nerves and numbed bodies and minds and to that army which, possibly through superior training or having the advantage of better equipment, comes the victory.

Not total victory. That we have learned to our sorrow. The men under arms and in hourly contact with the enemy have always done a fine job and are continuing in that tradition today. They have always brought the enemy to its knees and when they have laid down their arms a beaten foe has acknowledged defeat.

But around the counsel table we have been weak and, because of vacillation; because of a lack of an aggressive and well thought out program, we have had to bow to others, with the result that nothing has been settled, nothing has been decided.

That is one of the chief reasons why our young men have received orders to again prepare themselves for a shooting war. They must do what they can to make up for our weaknesses in the diplomatic field and they do it the hard way.

Because the defense of this Nation and its way of life demands the best we have in fighting men it was no surprise when the Twenty-eighth was called to turn its attention from peacetime training to that of active fighting.

We are sorry that once again these men will be taken from their firesides to live the life of a soldier, but since it has to be we will watch with pride their progress and achievement and give just that little something extra which spells the difference between winning and losing.

They have dedicated themselves—these men of the Twenty-eighth—to carry high the banner of freedom.

Can we fail them in this crisis?

Not only has the Twenty-eighth been called to action. The entire State, this proud commonwealth, has received a challenge which must be answered and it can be answered in only one way.

Let's get down to work and clean up this nerve-sapping mess as soon as possible and, when that is finished, let's be as strong in after-war maneuvering as they were on the field of battle.

Our hearts go with the Twenty-eighth today as they train at Indiantown Gap preparing themselves for any eventuality and with our hearts also goes a fierce pride in them.

It's Time for a Declaration of Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States should be prepared now to give a decisive answer to the top question of the day, the question which lies uneasily in every American mind.

With the first phase of the Korean conflict approaching a crisis this paramount question is—where do we go from here?

We may be sure that the shrewd men of the Kremlin have been thinking long hard thoughts on that same question. Are we to let the Kremlin answer it for us first? Are we to wait until a great Soviet toe draws a line in the dirt along the thirty-eighth degree parallel and dares us to cross that line?

Are we to continue the perilous policy—if indeed it is a policy—of allowing the Soviet imperialists to pick the time and the place for us to commit our meager forces while they commit only the forces of their satellites? Are we to be ignobly jostled from one improvised blood-letting to another?

Actually Moscow, not Washington, has up to now determined our military action in Korea. Starting with the gross miscalculations at Yalta and Potsdam in the year 1945 when we threw away the peace, the administration has in the brief intervening years allowed this country to be maneuvered into a dilemma where our own efforts are little more than a reflex to Russian decisions. Even today while our troops, in large part untrained and ill-equipped, are fighting with their backs to the sea we have no announced policy, no statement of aims.

This is not a matter for partisan recrimination. But it is a matter for close scrutiny by members of both parties. Surely nonpartisanship in foreign affairs does not require that a Republican voice approval of the grave errors in our foreign policy for which the party in power is responsible. Surely also, as I have repeatedly stated, it is more important to be right than to be bipartisan. Certainly for some this is not hindsight. For my part I wish most earnestly that I had been wrong in my gloomy forecast.

Now that we have by our action in Korea been given hopeful evidence that we intend to face the grim facts of the world we live in it is urgent that the Truman administration should display some leadership. It is useless to prate about unity unless there is a grand design behind which the people can become united. When will the Truman administration proclaim to the world in plain language our military intentions in Korea? When, furthermore, will it declare our ultimate political objectives? Both the honor and the safety of the United States are at stake. The very survival of the United Nations is in jeopardy. Without a clear pronouncement of American objectives our most brilliant military successes will be nothing more than a mere thrashing about of American power.

We have heard much about the need to strengthen the Voice of America abroad. For years I have pleaded for a complete reorientation of this vital implement of foreign policy. It should be vastly expanded. More important still, it should be transformed into a psychological warfare program in order to buttress our fighting forces. But is it not time also that we found the words and ideas which will make clear to the people in this country what our young men are fighting and dying for on a peninsula 7,000 miles away? Is it not time that our leaders underscored in eloquent and contagious terms that our very survival is in jeopardy and that on our survival depends a free world at peace?

A nation's foreign policy should be a steady long-range policy, not a thing of day-to-day expediency which fluctuates from one Presidential election to the next. Where there is no vision the people perish. In the last several years the present administration has chosen to reverse tragically the policies laid down by a succession of clear-thinking American statesmen, men who understood the nature of the world they lived in and who were resolved that American power should be in line with American commitments. Under our present leadership that current has been split and channeled into a thousand stagnant trickles meandering through a meaningless marsh of confusion and expediency. Let us hope that the administration's tardy action in Korea signals the end of the policy of appeasement and vacillation.

It is now nearly 8 weeks since events in Korea awakened our administration to the relentless realities of the Communist threat. Surely in that time our leaders have had opportunity to formulate a statement of principles which will proclaim to the people of America and to our friends throughout the world that we know where we are going and that we have a master plan. Surely our leaders have had time to announce to those who are determined to destroy the free world that we too are determined; determined to safeguard our national security, determined to create a peace with freedom.

For the preservation of that principle the United Nations was founded. The United Nations should be not a propaganda vehicle for Soviet aggression, not just a pious hope for peace, but a vibrant and effective organism working to bring about a world in which aggresison plays no part.

Let us at long last make our intentions unmistakably clear. Let us meet the challenge. Let us take the lead. Let us discharge our responsibilities. Let us grasp our opportunities. On the vigor and promptness of a resounding declaration hinge consequences of grave import to the people of America and to the free peoples of the world.

Washington and the War

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 17 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Washington and the War," written by the able editor of the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, Virginius Dabney, and printed in that newspaper on August 17. The editorial was written as a result of a visit to Washington by Mr. Dabney.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON AND THE WAR

WASHINGTON.—The people in charge of our National Government in this crisis are as uncertain concerning the future as the average citizen. Most of them feel that we are in for a long, hard pull, lasting many years, but they are admittedly guessing.

Nobody has any idea what Russia will do next. Governmental chiefs and Congressmen appear willing to play politics with the country's future, rather than take drastic steps now to get us in fighting trim as quickly as possible on the home and foreign fronts. They are gambling on our having time to prepare after the November elections.

Pessimism as to the future is widespread in Washington. The present situation is regarded as one with few bright spots anywhere. The consensus, as I get it from talking with high officials, Members of Congress, and well-informed newspapermen is that we are either in for a series of "pint-sized wars" with Russian satellites, like the one in Korea, or a war for survival with the Soviet Union—maybe both.

Only one man expressed any optimism to me. He is a highly intelligent Member of the House of Representatives who is a strong advocate of world federalism.

"We are on the threshold of one of the truly great moments in history," he said. "If we play our cards right, and I believe we can, this will be a turning point in the history of the world."

I have seen no one else in this frame of mind. The others are all resigned to big or little wars, lasting anywhere from 10 to 30 years.

Official circles reveal deep disappointment over the failure of United Nations members to respond more promptly and generously with aid in Korea. The small consignments of g ound troops that have been promised are considered inadequate, and none of these has yet arrived.

There is general confidence that we are going to hold the beachhead in Korea, and ultimately reconquer that country. Most persons feel that complete reconquest will come some time in 1951. But nobody has any reassuring answer to the question: "After the reconquest of Korea, what? Are we going to pay out more billions rebuilding that devastated country? Are we going to garrison it indefinitely, and if we don't, won't Russia come right back in again?"

The prevailing view is that we shall have to rebuild Korea, and then hold it indefinitely with American troops.

What about Formosa? Are we going to get into a shooting war with the Chinese Reds just as we're becoming more and more deeply committed in Korea? One view is that, although we have ordered our seventh fleet to shoot at the Reds, if and when they attempt to invade and conquer the island with their thousands of Chinese junks, we will not get into a war with the Chinese Reds on the mainland of Asia. It will be exclusively an air and naval action, as far as we are concerned, according to this opinion, which appears to have something more than mere surmises behind it.

Are the Communists going to break out somewhere else, just as we become involved in Korea and Formosa? This is not only possible but probable, most observers here feel. Indochina is regarded as the most likely place for this.

A good many view with alarm the possibility of our getting into the fight on the side of the highly incompetent Bao Dai and the imperialistic French, whose record in Indochina is far from good. Both Bao Dai and the French are hated by most of the people of Indochina. If there is an invasion of that country in the next few weeks by the forces now being trained over the border by the Chinese Reds, is the United States going to furnish new ammunition for Comrade Malik's propaganda mill by getting into this fracas on the side of a regime that is detested throughout Asia, and which symbolizes to the Asiatics exactly those western traits and attitudes which they dislike most?

Our intentions are unclear. The drab alternative to our intervention on behalf of Bao Dai and the French would be to let them fight alone to hold Indochina's vast natural resources, with the probability that the country will fall to the Communists.

What of the situation in western Europe? Can the signatories of the Atlantic Pact be counted on to resist to the end against the Reds, if we aid them substantially with arms, and build them up over the next few years?

One question is whether Russia will permit this build-up, or whether she will suddenly overrun western Europe with her enormous array of tanks and ground troops before any effective joint defense can be organized. In that event, it is argued that many of the weapons supplied by us would be seized by the Red Army, along with the huge steelmaking capacity of the Ruhr, the Saar, Alsace-Lorraine, and so on. In that event, our pulverization of Russian centers of heavy industry might not be too effective, unless we also pulverized those of western Europe—which most Americans would consider abhorrent.

The Europeans are widely depicted as battle weary, and sick unto death of bombs. Some Americans fear that these Europeans would almost rather be taken over by Russia than see their remaining sons killed or wounded, and what is left of their proud cities reduced to rubble. The poor showing of the United States in Korea to date seemingly has increased the feeling among Frenchmen and Germans and Italians that they would like to remain neutral, in the event of war between the United States and Russia.

Many here in Washington believe, however, that western Europe can be effectively organized against the U. S. S. R. if that power refrains long enough, because of fear of our atomic bombs, from overrunning the Continent. Such is the official policy, and they are proceeding to put it into effect with appropriations of billions for the arming of western Europe.

Will the Soviet Union drop dozens of such bombs on us in the United States, once it gets a sufficient stockpile. Nobody knows, of course. Some contend that fear of retaliation will prevent this, while others disagree. One topflight Federal official expresses the view that Russia will certainly attack the United States with atomic bombs as soon as she thinks she has enough of them.

Is Washington panicky at the thought of being a primary target, if the Kremlin decides to assault this country with nuclear explosives? Not at all. Washingtonians are taking this in their stride. However, some Americans are viewing the prospect with alarm, for a private girls' school has just closed here. The thing that gave it the coup de grâce, it is understood, is the fear of parents to enroll their daughters in a school situated in this target city.

A depressing feature of the whole picture in the Nation's Capital is the widely held belief that preparation for what is ahead can never be adequate, so long as the Truman administration is in office.

One man who was once a strong backer of President Roosevelt, and who had an important post in the Federal service under Roosevelt, is positively bitter concerning what he terms the "utter failure" of this administration.

"Truman, Dean Acheson, and Louis Johnson have got to go," he said with vehemence. "Theirs are the policies that have failed. Until we get new leadership at the top, we cannot hope to approach this crisis in the way that it must be approached."

He admitted that there is no way to oust this triumvirate, short of the 1952 presidential election, unless President Truman chooses to appoint new Secretaries of State and of Defense.

Some of those who are anxious to replace Truman, but who recognize that nothing can be done for 2 years, are not clear as to how they could improve matters by putting Acheson out. They recognize that the Secretary of State has made some bad mistakes, but they also regard him as able, and they don't know where to find anybody who would discharge the duties of the job more effectively than he is doing.

As for Defense Secretary Johnson, the amount of opposition to him is tremendous. He has lost the confidence of many persons, not only inside the services but outside. Newspapermen are especially strong in feeling that his usefulness has been heavily impaired, if not destroyed.

Meanwhile President Truman and a large number of those in Congress have their eyes on the November elections, instead of on the Nation's welfare. There is a real possibility that the reverses in Korea, and the other evidences that we are not prepared will cause the Democrats to lose control of Congress in those elections, and that this will foreshadow the election of a Republican President 2 years hence.

Still Far Short of Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Memphis Commercial Appeal:

STILL FAR SHORT OF NEEDS

In all probability legislation setting up a universal military-training program will be introduced into the Congress this week. It should be passed without unseemly and unnecessary delay.

There is no need for extended hearings. Everything which can be said for or against UMT has been said and is a matter of congressional record. If the Congress would elect to cut out the time-wasting oratory and political haymaking, which is a normal part of the legislative process, it could get final action on UMT within a few days.

It is the sensible way of recognizing the inevitable. Regardless of when a general war comes, military manpower needs are going to remain tremendous over a long period of years. The slap-happy draft system will not begin to meet them.

There may be merit in the Defense Department's argument that it cannot spare the experienced men or facilities to undertake a training program now. In light of the existing shortage of both, that's probably true. UMT can be written into the law, though, so that it can be undertaken as soon as the Defense Department can go into it.

Appointment of Maj. Gen. Norman D. Cota as Director of Civil Defense in Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 17 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the Mayor of Philadelphia has appointed Maj. Gen. Norman D. Cota as the director of Civilian Defense in that great city. He commanded the Twenty-eighth Division during World War II and is a wonderful soldier and a grand American. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in this morning's Philadelphia Inquirer relative to the appointment.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY'S NEW DEFENSE HEAD

Mayor Samuel's decision to name a military man to the full-time post of director of civil defense in Philadelphia has been followed promptly by his appointment of Maj. Gen. Norman D. Cota.

He has made an excellent selection. General Cota, commander of Pennsylvania's Twenty-eighth Division during the Battle of the Bulge in the Second World War, has a distinguished military record. His training and experience fit him admirably for his new position of command. As the mayor points out, his services as a military man will be of far greater value than those of a civilian in coordinating our security plans with the heads of the United States Armed Forces in this area during a time of emergency.

Philadelphia's civilian defense program had been in a precarious state because of its dependence upon civilian and part-time directorates. It has been shown that proper administration of such programs requires a full-time, paid staff.

General Cota will have the same status as other members of the mayor's cabinet and will have ample authority to plan and direct defense measures. And he will have the services of a paid staff devoting full time to their jobs. The new program gives promise of greater security for Philadelphia.

California Wants No Columbia River Water

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, newspaper and radio reports of the past 3 days have described in vague detail a gigantic project to bring Columbia River water into southern California. The project is proposed by the Department of Interior, and assertedly has the interest of President Truman.

I wish to make clear the following facts:

First. Neither the idea nor the plan was initiated by any one connected with the State of California. No engineer or other responsible official in California, either employed by the State or the various California water agencies, has made such a proposal or has endorsed it. Neither the California State government, nor any of its branches, has proposed such a project.

Second. Prosperous as California is, it could never afford to finance a project of such magnitude as the Columbia River diversion proposed by the Interior Department.

Third. California would never call upon the taxpayers of the Nation to pay for such a project, as Arizona has done in the case of the proposed central Arizona project, which Secretary Chapman says would cost the Nation's taxpayers more than $2,000,000,000 in interest alone.

Fourth. California does not need and does not want water from the Columbia River or any other river of the Northwest. Our State engineer has said that California's water supplies are sufficient, and that the State does not have to go beyond its boundaries for more water. The Colorado River water awarded to southern California in Federal Government contracts, and other available supplies, are sufficient to meet the foreseeable needs of that area.

Fifth. The Columbia River diversion plan is brought forward at this time by the Interior Department in a desperate attempt to aid the fantastic central Arizona project, which would take an enormous share of California's Colorado River water. It is a nefarious scheme to rob California of Colorado River water by diverting attention to the Columbia River diversion proposal. The scheme also is intended to give Representatives and Senators from northwestern States the false impression that California has a plan to acquire Columbia River water. I wish to assure the entire Congress that California has no such plan, and does not support such a plan.

Sixth. Southern California has always paid its own way. The people of southern California have obligated themselves for more than half a billion dollars for water projects, and they are paying these debts with unvarying regularity.

Seventh. The Columbia River scheme is even more infeasible, grotesque, and absurd than the central Arizona project. It would cost an estimated five to ten billion dollars. As a member of the Public Lands Committee, and as a leader in California's fight to protect its vital water supplies, I disavow the Columbia River proposal and proclaim California's opposition to it.

Lily-White Bar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 17 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the following editorial from the August 6, 1950, edition of the Washington (D. C.) Post. It seems appropriate that a representative of the people of Indiana, where no such segregation is practiced by the bar association, should request this insertion.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LILY-WHITE BAR

The District of Columbia Bar Association recently rejected a proposal advanced by 100 of its leading members to change its by-laws to admit local lawyers regardless of their color. This was the first time that the restrictive provision has been challenged in a formal referendum. Scarcely more than half the members of the District Association voted. We hope the challenge will be made again—and under circumstances that will let the whole membership realize the ugliness of the discrimination practiced in its name.

The local group will be host in September to the national convention of its parent body, the American Bar Association, which has no such barrier against Negroes. It is out of step with most of the State Bar Associations including those in Florida, Alabama, Virginia, Texas, and other Southern States. Its position is in shabby contrast to that of the Federal Bar Association. Acting in the Capital of the United States, it follows a policy that runs directly counter to the great premises of the Constitution which its members are peculiarly obligated to serve.

No group is lodged with more responsibility for community leadership than the bar association. No group is looked to by the community with more respect. Yet here in the Capital, the District Bar Association, chartered by Congress and acting as the official body of the community's lawyers, adheres to a racial attitude as outmoded as it is irrational. This body, devoted to the ideal of Equal Justice Under Law, ought to set an example of equal opportunity as well. Its example, for good or ill, has much to do with shaping the patterns of community life. We hope it will make itself an exemplar of equality.

Educational and Vocational Training Benefits for World War II Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that all Members of the Congress are interested to learn of the status of the combat soldiers in Korea as to their eligibility for the benefits of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, commonly known as the GI bill of rights. As a Member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I want to see that our World War II veterans are properly advised as to their rights and benefits as veterans and especially to see that the thousands of younger veterans who will again see service on the Korean front or somewhere else with the Armed Forces are fully informed.

On July 10, 1950, I wrote the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, Gen. Carl Gray, and asked several questions which I believe will be of interest to our veterans now in educational institutions or who contemplate using some of their educational benefits. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the reply received from the Assistant Administrator for Vocational Rehabilitation and Education, in a letter dated July 20, 1950:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1950.

Hon. OLIN E. TEAGUE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TEAGUE: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter addressed to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under date of July 10, 1950, in which you ask several questions relative to the initiation of training under Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, which has been referred to this office for a reply in view of the inquiries made.

It is noted that you have read the Veterans' Administration regulation concerning the pursuit, on or after July 25, 1951, of courses of education or training under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended. In this connection, it is pointed out that in view of the purpose and intent of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, that is, the provisions for means of readjustment of veterans into civilian life through Federal aid, it has been necessary to consider that if the purpose of the act is to be realized, it must be required that where a veteran has satisfied the conditions for initiation of the course he will be expected to pursue the course continuously until completion except for conditions which normally would cause interruption by any student, veteran or nonveteran.

With regard to interruption for summer vacations, you are advised that the Veterans' Administration regulation referred to specifically provides for normal interruptions for summer vacations. Ordinarily, therefore, a veteran who pursues training under Public Law 346, during the spring semester of the school year, 1950–51, and whose conduct and progress are satisfactory, may interrupt his training during the 1951 summer vacation period and reenter training at the opening of the regular school year of 1951–52 for the purpose of continuing his course under the act.

The position of the veteran-teacher in respect of the requirement for continuous pursuit of a course of education or training under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, after the statutory delimiting date, that is to say, July 25, 1951, may be said to be unique among other classes of veteran beneficiaries. Accordingly—and only because of the historical aspects of the matter, that is, the long recognized practice of the members of the teaching profession—it has been determined that an eligible veteran who pursues a graduate course under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, pointing directly to a degree, in a college or university during the summer sesion 1950, who is regularly employed as a teacher during the school year 1950–51, pursues graduate study under the act during the summer session of 1951 (or is regularly enrolled in a summer term on or before July 25, 1951) and is regularly employed as a school teacher during the school year 1951–52, may be permitted to continue graduate study during successive summer sessions following employment as a teacher during successive school years and that this shall be deemed to be continuous pursuit of his course of education or training within the meaning of the governing law and regulations.

While current Veterans' Administration instructions relate specifically to veteran-teachers who pursue study on a graduate level pointing directly to a graduate degree, it has been determined that a person actively engaged in the teaching profession may—under conditions identical to those indicated in the preceding paragraph—pursue an undergradute curriculum for the purpose of obtaining a degree during consecutive summer session subsequent to July 25, 1951.

In response to your inquiry concerning progression from an elementary course to a vocational course after July 25, 1951, you are advised that a veteran who completes an elementary course of study which has been prescribed as a preparatory course or a prerequisite to an elected vocation course, and who wishes to progress to such vocational course after July 25, 1951, will be able to do so provided he files a request with the Veterans' Administration prior to the completion of his elementary course and provided he pursues his training continuously except for normal interruptions and subject, of course, to the extent of his remaining entitlement.

With regard to initiation of training under Public Law 346, for persons who reenlist, the first and second provisos of paragraph 1, part VIII, Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, are quoted herewith for your constituent's convenient reference:

"* * * Provided, That such course shall be initiated not later than 4 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the present war, whichever is the later: Provided further, That no such education or training shall be afforded beyond 9 years after the termination of the present war."

As you know, World War II was officially terminated as of July 25, 1947, insofar as the provisions of Public Law 346 are concerned, except that section 11 (a) of Public Law 190, Seventy-ninth Congress, the Armed Forces Voluntary Recruitment Act of 1945, amends the above legislation and provides further that the war shall not end for a person who enlisted thereunder between the dates of October 6, 1945, and October 5, 1946, "before the termination of such individual's first period of enlistment or reenlistment * * *."

Therefore, in view of the specific wording of the above-cited legislation an eligible veteran who was discharged on or before July 25, 1947, must initiate his course of education or training under Public Law 346 before July 26, 1951; and persons, including enlistees under the Armed Forces Voluntary Recruitment Act of 1945 who were in the service after July 25, 1947, or are still in the service, must initiate their course of education or training within 4 years from the date of their first discharge after July 25, 1947.

However, it may be noted that in view of the specific wording of the second proviso of the above-cited legislation educational or training benefits under Public 346 may not be afforded beyond July 25, 1956, except for persons who enlisted during the period between October 6, 1945, and October 5, 1946, under the provisions of the Armed Forces Voluntary Recruitment Act of 1945.

As indicated above, the law makes no exception with regard to the initiation of a course, therefore, it would be necessary for a hospitalized veteran to initiate training under the act prior to the statutory delimiting dates. Of course, if a veteran is hospitalized for a reason which has been determined to be service-connected for disability compensation purposes, vocational rehabilitation training under Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, may be available to him. The statutory provisions setting a deadline date for the initiation of a course applies exclusively to education or training under Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended. Public Law 16, supra, contain. no such provisions there being only the requirement that vocational rehabilitation training be commenced in sufficient time to permit restoration of employability through the selected course on or prior to the date "9 years after the termination of the present war."

Your interest in veterans' affairs is appreciated and it is hoped that the foregoing will provide the information which you desire.

Very truly yours,

H. V. STERLING,
Assistant Administrator for Vocational Rehabilitation and Education.

Also under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include my letter of July 26, 1950, to the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, requesting that hearings be scheduled by the committee to publicize the fact of the July 25, 1951, cut-off date as far as the GI bill is concerned. Such a hearing would also give members of the committee, as well as other Members of Congress, an opportunity to make suggestions as to what other groups might continue their studies after July 25, 1951, even though their training is interrupted or may not have been initiated by that date. My letter to the Veterans' Affairs Committee chairman and his reply are as follows:

JULY 26, 1950.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman, Veterans' Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Sometime ago I wrote you suggesting that our Committee on Veterans' Affairs might be unjustly criticized by both veterans and other Members of Congress if we did not do everything possible to publicize the effect of the July 25, 1951, cut-off date as far as the GI bill is concerned.

I have in mind a few cases which I believe deserve serious consideration, and I know that other meritorious cases will be brought out by other committee members if hearing are held. I have already been contacted by several veterans who have been hospitalized for tuberculosis, but whose illness became known after the presumptive period. They will probably be hospitalized for a period of 2 years and will not be entitled to Public Law 16 benefits. Even though eligible for education and training benefits under Public Law 346, it was not feasible for them to enter school. I think they should be considered as exceptions to this cut-off date. Another group would be our elementary school teachers who want to do undergraduate work during the summers after working the 9-month period in every year. I think that they should be allowed the same benefits that teachers doing graduate work will be receiving.

Those men volunteering for active duty in the war in Korea together with those veteran servicemen who have had their enlistments extended by an act of Congress will also no doubt be affected by this so-called cut-off date of July 25, 1951. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee advised the Congress recently that there are approximately 300,000 servicemen whose enlistments will expire within the next 12 months and for that reason it was requested that additional legislation be passed to extend their enlistment during this conflict. I believe it is safe to assume that a large number of this group have eligibility under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act and would have used some of these additional benefits had they been allowed to terminate their service within the next year.

It is respectfully requested that committee hearings be held in order that a study can be made of suggested exceptions to the so-called cut-off date other than already granted to the medical students and teachers doing postgraduate work.

Please be assured of my desire not to have the cut-off date changed for all groups but only to make exceptions in deserving cases. I sincerely feel that by having committee hearings on this subject we will in this way be rendering an additional service to our veterans.

Sincerely,

OLIN E. TEAGUE,
Congressman, Sixth Texas District.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1950.

Hon. OLIN E. TEAGUE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have your letter of July 26 concerning the July 25, 1951, cut-off date for initiating training under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

You are probably familiar with the hearings conducted by a subcommittee composed of Messrs. ELLIOTT, NOLAND, and PHILLIPS on H. R. 7235, to extend the period for initiating courses under this act for certain medical and dental students. At page 1757 of these hearings there is a letter from General Gray addressed to the Honorable JOHN SANBORN stating in effect that teachers who desire to pursue graduate courses each summer after July 25, 1951, and who remain in the teaching profession will be permitted to do so as their entitlement continues.

As a result of these hearings, the Administrator also issued a statement providing in effect that any qualified student who is accepted in a recognized medical or dental school after July 25, 1951, may continue his medical or dental training so long as his entitlement exists.

On yesterday the Administrator addressed a letter to me announcing that the July 25, 1951, date will not apply to any veteran who has initiated his course of education or training and who is prevented from completing his training by reason of reentrance into the active military or naval service. This, of course, does not in any way change the July 25, 1956, date.

Public Law 573, Eighty-first Congress, extended the presumptive period for tuberculosis from 1 to 3 years, and thus the fact that the veteran had tuberculosis would probably not have prevented him from having had an opportunity to initiate a course. If the veteran had initiated a course of training and was prevented from continuing or completing that course by reason of the disease the present VA regulation would apparently permit him to continue when he had recovered. If the veteran contracts tuberculosis within the 3-year period, he would be eligible to receive training under Public Law 16, which has, as you know, no initiation cut-off date.

There has been wide publicity concerning this cut-off date and undoubtedly the service organizations will continue to publicize it between now and next July.

The Veterans' Administration has shown a complete willingness to place a reasonable interpretation upon this regulation.

Sincerely yours,

J. E. RANKIN, Chairman.

High Time We Cracked Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Department Store Economist for August 1950:

HIGH TIME WE CRACKED DOWN
(By D. Allyn Garber)

In the throes of war again—call it full scale or not - for the third time in our generation.

Who is at fault? That can wait. The question now is how to expose the paid traitors, get them out of the woodwork of our bureaucracies, businesses, schools and universities, our social life.

They are far too powerful an influence to remain concealed.

Retailers will have a heavy responsibility—that of supplying our civilian population with the necessities of life. They will be harassed by restrictions and endless bureaucratic regulations, administered by whom? Even while lining up to a man behind the President—we have no choice—we have the right and obligation to ask for answers to some long-unanswered questions. Who engineered the division of Korea and gave Russia the industrial half? Who put the jokers in the United Nations Charter that have given the Kremlin such an advantage? Who painted the conquest of Manchuria, then China, as merely a spontaneous agrarian revolt against landowners? Who delayed, sabotaged, and effectively prevented the delivery of aid to the Chinese? Who insisted we permit the conquest of Formosa and Indochina? Who was and is behind the determined drive to smear MacArthur?

The slimy trail leads back step by step. Who sold the administration on the political nurturing of Reds within the Democratic Party—permitted their infiltration into every echelon and bureau of Government? Who has so effectively prevented their exposure again and again?

What legal brains directed the maneuvers and prepared loopholes by which Harry Bridges' expulsion was twice thwarted? What now prevents throwing him into Alcatraz, instead of leaving him free on bail to follow his orders at this critical time?

What men of great influence planned and provoked the series of court rulings by which it is now actionable to call a person a Communist (though with impunity he can be called a Democrat or a Republican or even a Socialist) while the party line is that Communists are a political party?

And lately, what treacherous brains worked out the successive stages by which our Federal courts were obstructed, ridiculed and openly taunted until a truly loyal American, Judge Harold Medina, stopped them? What men are behind the smear campaign long directed at J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI?

Go back another step. Who engineered betrayal of our bomb secrets—we mean, what Americans? Who gave American planes to fly our patent files and industrial secrets to Moscow? Who put in the fix in Washington by which armor, planes, munitions, ships, and strategic materials continued to go to Russia for years after the war ended?

What influences persuaded Truman to let Russia in at the last minute in the surrender of Japan? Or persuaded Roosevelt earlier to prevent our armies from coming into Germany via the Baltic approach, which would have saved the Balkan nations from Kremlin conquest later? Why did he hold our armies at the gates of Berlin for almost 10 days to let Russian armies in first? Who? Why? And what distorted thinking led to the present partitioning of Germany, or left Berlin deep within the Russian section of divided Germany? No errors of judgment these, but a deep-laid plan which our leaders fell for.

We are in a war of disastrous possibilities. We do not question the intent of Harry Truman, but we distrust his brand of political friends and cronies. We can only conclude that the one way to get the Communists out of Government and influence, while we still have a Government, is to retire the current misleaders and rely more on the many able men in Congress, of both political parties, who should take over now.

This is no time for softness or protection of anyone. Let us put known paid Communists in Federal penitentiaries—no freedom on bail, no appeal until the war is over—as we handled known Bund members in 1941 with such success.

Retailers are closest to the public and have more influence than the politicians. Retailers can force action if they feel they should. We have faith that they, with divine guidance, can and will set about cleaning up the slimy mess and get ready for what may come.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD P. CASE
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times yesterday carried a fine editorial pointing out the absurdity of Congress having to regulate goats and barbers and other purely local District of Columbia matters, and urging that Congress rid itself of this unnecessary burden by reporting out the District home rule bill for a vote.

I urge my colleagues who have not yet done so to sign the home rule discharge petition in the immediate future so that the District suffrage bill can be approved during the Eighty-first Congress.

Extension of one of democracy's most potent weapons—the right of the ballot—to nearly a million disenfranchised Washington citizens will strengthen our hand in the propaganda front of our fight against totalitarianism. It will also permit Congress to devote more time to the urgent national and international affairs which have arisen during these critical times.

The full text of the editorial is set out below:

GOATS IN WASHINGTON

The grant of power to the city commissioners to regulate goats in the District of Columbia may be of immediate concern to a good many inhabitants of the District of Columbia; but it isn't of much interest to the remaining 150,000,000 people of the United States. And the same may be said about the posting of prices in Washington's barber shops. Yet these supremely unimportant subjects—and a great many more like them—must be brought forward for the consideration of the Congress of the United States; each has to be handled in committee; each has to be discussed—or at least voted on—on the floor; each has to be sent to the President.

A great many points, and most of them very good ones, can be made against the absurdity of Congress acting as a board of aldermen for the city of Washington. But when all else fails, one would think that a glance at the type of legislation that Congress must handle in this capacity would clinch the argument. Yet the folly persists. True, the Senate has passed a home-rule bill for the District; but this measure remains bottled up in a House committee. A petition to force the bill to the floor needs only 14 more signatures. A real victory for democracy at home would be won if that bill could be pried loose so that it at least could be considered by the House. And a victory for efficiency and common sense in the workings of the Federal Government would be won with its passage. It would be a relief to the citizens of Washington and of the rest of the United States if Congress no longer had to turn its attention to such vital subjects as the regulation of goats in the District of Columbia.

Four Hundred and Forty Thousand Dollar Plan To Bring to United States 85 Titoists Wisely Blocked by Rooney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Brooklyn Eagle of August 15, 1950:

FOUR HUNDRED AND FORTY THOUSAND DOLLAR PLAN TO BRING TO UNITED STATES 85 TITOISTS WISELY BLOCKED BY ROONEY

Dr. Harvey Branscomb, chancelor of Vanderbilt University, went to Washington recently on a simple mission. All he wanted was $440,272 of the American taxpayers' money to bring in 85 visitors from Tito's Yugoslavian Communist jungle and to show them the sights around America.

Brooklyn's Representative JOHN ROONEY spotted the item on an $82,000,000 budget requested by the State Department for anti-Communist propaganda. When Mr. ROONEY and a few of his colleagues on the House Appropriations Subcommittee finished questioning Dr. Branscomb the subcommittee showed every sign of disapproving the request. It would be stupidity of the sheerest kind to pay the least attention to proposals of this kind.

We wonder when these so-called intellectuals will ever learn. The enemy of mankind, of civilization today is communism. Not merely Stalinist communism but any kind of communism. Tito is opposed to Stalin simply because he refuses to allow Uncle Joe to muscle in on his Yugoslavian racket. There is no difference between the Tito-Stalin feud than there would be between an Al Capone-Dutch Schultz dispute in the days of prohibition.

There is no such thing as a good Communist. There are simply differences in degrees and in the approach of conflicting Commie outfits. The remnants of the Trotskyite factions still want a world revolution in every country in the world. Stalin angles to cut up the world into piecemeal segments and take them over on a well-planned time schedule. Korea is just one of the first whistle stops.

Tito's communism is as thoroughly Marxist-Leninist as Stalin's but he is trying to maintain autonomy for it in Yugoslavia. If and when the Soviet pressure becomes too strong for him to resist any longer he will either be forced to succumb to the Russian war machine or some agent within or without his organization will put a slug in his body and the loyal opposition willing to do business with Stalin will take over.

Any one who maintains that there is any hope of winning over a Communist regime to the democratic ideal is either woefully ignorant of communism or just a starry-eyed idealist.

We are officially supplying Tito with war potential materials. Dean Acheson calls it a calculated risk. It is the same kind of a calculated risk that we took when we sent Alger Hiss to Yalta. When, oh, when, will the seers in Washington stop gazing into a crystal ball looking for a reform in Communist tactics and read the reports coming in from Korea and those going out from the Cominform?

Hats off to Representative ROONEY for the prompt tagging of Dr. Branscomb's childish effort to put across one more pro-Communist move on the American people. There is only one foolproof attitude to take on communism. You can't do business with its advocates no matter what form or front the movement may take.

Keep Congressmen on Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY J. DAVENPORT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, July 19, 1950, I made a speech on the floor of the House calling upon Congress to remain in session to its last minute, if necessary, to insure complete and rapid victory in Korea. Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD an editorial from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. The message contained in this editorial is a most important one. The editorial follows:

KEEP CONGRESS ON JOB

As a result of war in Korea, Congress should deny itself the pleasure of political campaigning this year. Those Congressmen who stick closest to the job of getting on with the war will have the greatest vote appeal in November.

Under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, Congress is required to adjourn by July 31, unless war or other national emergency exists, or unless Congress shall fix another adjournment date.

When adjournment time rolled around this week, there was a war on and Congress was responding well. The House marked the occasion by taking final action on legislation lifting ceilings on the size of the armed services and authorizing $350,000,000 for modernization of the fleet.

Still there is talk in Washington that Congress, with an election only 3 months away, will agree on a "conditional adjournment" so that its Members will have an opportunity to campaign back home. A conditional adjournment provides that Congress can be recalled by the Vice President and the Speaker according to their own judgment or on request of the majority or minority leaders of the Senate and the House. That device was used during the war years of 1943 and 1944 and again in 1947 and 1948. In each of the 4 years, however, the President called Congress back.

There is a big job ahead of Congress. Among other preparedness measures, it must provide for adequate mobilization and enact new tax legislation. There also remains much unfinished business on the old peacetime agenda. If the call to politics should presently prove stronger than the call to duty, President Truman should promptly fetch Congress back to Washington. It should stay on the job until the war in Korea is won and the threat of war on other fronts subsides. This is no time for politics as usual.

Clark W. Griffith—A Great American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, from past experience in the newspaper game I am fully aware that it is not news when a dog bites a man, and when we set out to eulogize an individual, a public figure shall we say, it is not news either. News is made only when the man bites the dog or the public figure is vilified or smeared. However, I am going to give myself the pleasure of so eulogizing someone, whether or not my words have headline value. This someone of whom I shall speak is a great American, long identified with our national game of baseball—Clark W. Griffith.

You may ask: For what reason do I rise to speak of Mr. Griffith at this time? Is it his birthday? No. Mr. Griffith is not preparing to celebrate his birthday until sometime later in the fall. Is there any reason why I should not postpone my little talk until he does celebrate that eighty-first birthday? Well, I will tell you. I am not getting any younger, and although Mr. Griffith may, and I hope he does, go on forever in his good work, I cannot hope to live that long myself, so with your indulgence I will present my remarks at this time.

Now you all know of Mr. Griffith; even the youngest in point of experience in this body must know him, because he has been around long enough to be a landmark in this city and in the world of sports. You all may know of a few of his many charities. Perhaps you recall that he turns over the stadium which bears his name for the use of the congressional baseball teams when they hold their annual charity game. You may know, too, that for this game he furnishes our august Members with necessary equipment and uniforms in addition to the use of the park. Well this is a minute fraction of the extent of his civic interest.

What most of you may not know is that Mr. Griffith donates that stadium—not just to Members of Congress, which we might expect him to do—but to any and every charitable cause, the instigators of which approach him, when he is convinced of the worthiness of the project. This includes such civic activities as the Community Chest, the Red Cross, the Police Boys' Club, as well as scores of others whose names do not immediately spring to mind. Among these others, we recall, is the Masonic order's annual Night of Thrills, receipts from which, over the years, have built and maintained the beautiful Eastern Star Home out New Hampshire Avenue.

But Mr. Griffith is not only interested in civic affairs and social betterment—he is also deeply and sincerely patriotic. It was his effort during World War I which brought about the establishment of the famous and valuable Clark C. Griffith Ball and Bat Fund. It seems that during the early months of that conflict there was no plan, no organizational set-up to provide recreation for the homesick lads "over there," nor for those in the camps scattered over the country. And there was a great need for some type of morale building activity for these boys. Then it was that Clark Griffith conceived the idea of supplying the members of the Armed Forces with the equipment necessary to play baseball, a sport which of all others provides wholesome recreation, promotes mental stimulation because of its demand for quick thinking and immediate decisions, and at the same time furnishes ideal muscular exercise.

From his initial idea to the end of that war, Mr. Griffith and his associates continued to supply all comers with outfits, and completed their task on the proud note that "no authorized request from any unit of the Army or Navy was turned down." Of course, Mr. Griffith did not accomplish this tremendous task alone, but his was the inspiration and guiding force that brought it to a successful conclusion.

With reference to Clark Griffith's attitude toward the armed services during World War II it is well known that the Washington Senators Ball Club was composed, during those years, of older men and those rejected by the services. He did not then, and I will readily gamble that he will not in the future, do anything to keep a ballplayer, no matter how valuable, out of his country's service.

Those of us who have been in Washing during and since World War II recall that it has been the practice at Griffith Stadium to admit all those in uniform free of charge. In addition ambulatory patients from Walter Reed, St. Elizabeths and Mount Alto are also admitted without charge. One section of the park is set aside for these servicemen and women and in addition, 40 box seats are reserved for amputees who cannot mount the stands. Stretcher cases too, are accommodated at the park, admission free. And this rule has no exceptions, no matter how important the game to be played is, or how attractive the opportunity to sell every seat to the general public.

Again, Clark Griffith is aware that ministers of the gospel are among the lowest paid professional men in the world, and for this reason he provides every minister in the city with a season pass to the park.

All of this I have just recounted for you is, or could be a matter of public information—if anyone is interested enough to inquire. But there is another side to the charitable impulses of this grand old man. And that is the side which the world, and in fact, few even of his close associates see. It is that real charity which he exercises among the poor and needy and those whose lives may be temporarily blighted—the unfortunate in fact with whom we are all surrounded did we but open our eyes. This Christian work he carries on as our Lord instructed us to do when he said:

> Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them.
> But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth; that thine alms may be in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret Himself shall reward thee openly.

Clark Griffith has carried out this precept of the Savior's teaching throughout his more than 80 years. But we have to go to objects of his kindness and generosity themselves to learn what he has done. It is to the widow and the deserted wife, the orphan boy or girl whom he has helped and for whom he has found homes and security that we must appeal to get any indication of the extent of the private charity which he has exerted throughout the years.

And it is from such as these that I have learned a little of the man's character—not from Mr. Griffith himself. In fact, he is in total ignorance that I am speaking of him at this moment, and will be the most surprised person in the country when he does learn of it. It will be my little joke on him. I hope he will receive it with his customary good sportsmanship.

Thank you for permitting me to indulge myself by giving this oratorical salute to one whom I consider to be a real man and a great American.

Is American Democracy Doomed Because of Excessive Spending?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, one of the great tasks confronting a people who would maintain representative government is to decrease the number of "stay at homes" on election day. Why so many persons who would loudly protest loss of the right to vote fail to do so is one of the mysteries of America.

In 1948, in the State of Illinois, nearly a million eligible voters failed to go to the polls. Such public indifference must not continue. It is heartening to note that some effort is being made to correct the situation this year. A challenging message on this point is contained in a guest editorial contributed to the Danville (Ill.) Commercial News by Mr. G. C. Mahle, prominent business executive of Danville. Under permission granted by the House, I am including his editorial in the RECORD, for what he has to say should be of interest to all. It follows:

IS AMERICAN DEMOCRACY DOOMED BECAUSE OF EXCESSIVE SPENDING?

(By G. C. Mahle)

Many people think so. They realize that the Korean situation, and its possible consequences, result from the stupidity and the blindness of American diplomacy at Potsdam, Yalta and elsewhere. They know that the division of Korea was an open invitation to a civil war, and that locating American and British troops in Berlin without any ground ingress at all was suicidal.

They are appalled in spite of the billions we have spent for arms in recent years, to see us caught unprepared in Korea, and using armament which is not a match for that of our opponents. In September 1949, $10,000,000 in military aid was voted Korea. Nine months later, when the Communistic forces attacked that country only $200 in signal equipment had reached its destination. On June 13, 1950, two weeks before the invasion of South Korea, William C. Foster, deputy administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, testified before the Senate Appropriations Committee, and said:

"I am happy to tell the Appropriations Committee, that in my judgment, the trend of events in South Korea is more favorable than it has been at any time since the liberation of that country in 1945. A rigorous training program has built up a well-disciplined army of 100,000 troops that are prepared to meet any challenge by North Korean forces."

Yet, the Russian menace, much greater than it ought to be, is not the greatest danger that faces this country. Communism we can eventually overthrow. Surely our diplomats at the close of the next war will be smarter than those who functioned for us before, but unless some economy is brought into Government, then American democracy is indeed doomed. In the Truman administration more money has already been spent than was spent by all of the Presidents from Washington through Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Taxes, which, according to that late President, are paid in the sweat of every man's brow, were never higher. Figures show that if all incomes over $8,000 were completely confiscated, it would lower the tax load of the rest of the country only 10 percent.

You and I must insist that in spite of the Korean situation, economy can, and because of the Korean situation, must be an actuality in Washington. There is no such feeling in Washington today. After tossing billions of dollars away on the price-support program, Mr. Brannan came to Congress recently and wanted another $50,000,000 to give away products so bought. In addition, he urged the House Agricultural Committee to approve H. R. 8356, which authorizes the expenditure of $8,000,000,000 for a Missouri Valley Basin farm development program.

Since the Korean invasion a hundred thousand more civilian employees have been added to the Government payroll. Senator DOUGLAS fights in vain to cut $90,000,000 off the pork-barrel appropriation. Senator BYRD, of Virginia, claims that Government expenses can be cut $6,000,000,000 and that is 60 percent of the ten billion that is asked for defense in Korea. He gets no support.

It was Benjamin Franklin who said that in times of war the utmost economy must be practiced in all other governmental functions. If we are asked to lower our standard of living, and give up many things formerly dear to us, should not the Federal Government do likewise and retrench?

What can you do about it? Some 900,000 people in Illinois did not vote at the last election. Two out of every 10 of you who read this editorial did not vote. You have a chance next November. Don't forget that Lenin once said: "We can never conquer the American Republic—we can only hope that it will spend itself to destruction."

If you stay at home and do not vote, you are helping Joe Stalin and the Russian Communists carry out Lenin's plan. You are admitting that American democracy is doomed.

Liquidation of Jewish Life in Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the extermination of spiritual, cultural, religious, and community of Russian Jewry has been known for some time. The Soviet leaders are ruthlessly exterminating every trace of Jewish religious and cultural activity and obliterating every facet of organized Jewish life in Russia. In this respect the Communist leaders are no better and no different than Hitler and his henchmen.

If there were some Jews who until recently believed that Soviet Russia was the champion of the oppressed and suffering minorities and small nations through the world, they are rapidly becoming disillusioned. Today, Russia is the most imperialistic state in the world. Her imperialism is leading her to the suppression of all cultures and civilizations which become subservient to the Russian police state. Russian imperialism is also the driving force behind Communist aggression against peace-loving nations.

An excellent account of the plight of the Jews in Russia and the obliteration of Jewish life in that country has just appeared in the August issue of Jewish Frontier. I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article the Future of Soviet Jewry by Bezalel Sherman. It will be a revelation to many of us for its forthright evaluation of a very tragic situation. The article follows:

THE FUTURE OF SOVIET JEWRY

(By Bezalel Sherman)

No reliable information is available concerning the number of Jews living today outside the borders of the State of Israel. We may nevertheless assume that the figures generally cited are not altogether imaginary and are based on some sort of statistical data. This does not hold, however, for the Jews in the Soviet Union. Here we deal only with individual estimates which are frequently but an expression of pious hopes. Lacking an alternative we must nevertheless reckon with these estimates and assume that about 2,000,000 Jews now live in the U. S. S. R. If we add to these another 600,000 living in the satellite countries of eastern Europe, it will become evident that 24 percent of all the Jews in the world—26 percent if Israel is excluded—live within the zone of Soviet rule or influence. These percentages are based on the common assumption of a Jewish population in the world of 11,000,000.

Under present circumstances it is a matter of indifference whether there are one, two, or three million Jews in the Soviet Union. What is important is that these Jews are so many individuals and do not constitute a community. Within the Soviet Union there is not a trace of Jewish organization, institutions, internal collective activity or the slightest participation in world-wide Jewish activities. There are no locally organized Jewish communities nor is there any contact with Jews in other lands. The Jewish press has been liquidated. Jewish literature is no more. Jewish intellectuals have been eradicated. Jewish cultural activity has been suppressed. No institutions of Jewish education are in existence. All Jewish people's movements are forbidden. Jewish national aspirations are taboo. Whatever still remains of Jewish religion has for the most part been introduced from the territories recently annexed by the Soviet Union and even this is confronted with biological extinction. Hebrew is forbidden. Yiddish is vanishing. In what sense are Soviet Jews today a part of the Jewish people as a whole? Try as one might it is impossible to escape the conclusion that Soviet Jews no longer exist as a community. The same fate awaits the Jews in the Soviet satellite countries.

Apologists for the Soviet Union have been laboring to explain the lack of all contact between Jews of the Soviet Union and of the United States on the basis of the cold war between East and West. They justify this complete severance of relations by saying that anti-Communist elements among American Jews prevent such contact. But these apologists forget, intentionally, that there is no more contact between the Jews of the Soviet Union and those of such Communist countries as Poland, Rumania, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia any more than there is with the United States, Canada, Argentina, or Israel. They likewise overlook the fact that Soviet Jews are not only prevented from reading the anti-Communist Jewish Daily Forward, but also the Communist Morning Freiheit, that works of pro-Communist Ikuf authors are just as taboo in the U. S. S. R. as the works of non-Communist authors affiliated with the Jewish Cultural Congress. Furthermore, Jews in Moscow have no more contact with Jews in Kiev or Minsk than with those of New York, Warsaw, or Tel Aviv. The matter of contact between Soviet Jews and those abroad is thus not dependent on ideologies. It is an outgrowth of communism itself. The Soviet Government will not permit Jews to do what it does not permit its other citizens. Formally the Soviet Government practices equality between Jew and non-Jew. Actually its practices are not so equalitarian, and apologists for the Soviet Union choose to overlook the difference. Thus it is clear that Russia will remain a Russian country even if it severs its contacts with the outside world. Poles in Poland will not be nationally obliterated even though they are forbidden to maintain contact with Poles abroad and they lack freedom at home. Jews of the Soviet countries, on the other hand, must inevitably cease to be Jews, if they are cut off from other Jews throughout the world and are at the same time deprived in the land of their residence of all opportunity for group existence.

The Soviet sector of the dispersion is unique in Jewish annals. Here Jews are not forced into a ghetto nor is one compelled to remain a Jew against his will. The characteristic trait of the Soviet scheme of affairs is that it introduces the Jews into the general pattern of regimentation and transforms their Jewishness into an object of state utility. For the first time in history we are confronted with the phenomenon that a person is a Jew when the ruling political party orders him to be such, and he ceases to be a Jew when the same party thus decrees. It is clear that a great many Jews undergo these humiliating metamorphoses only externally and in their hearts remain devoted Jews. But under pressure of Communist rule the number of those for whom these changes are not mere tragicomedy is increasing. This is evident from the behavior of the large number of Jewish fellow travellers in the democratic countries where they have no occasion to fear police persecution or repressions should they fail to conform. The new element in Jewish experience that has been introduced by the Soviet system consists in eradicating within Jews all intellectual or emotional, national or social, spiritual or ethical attitude toward their Judaism. The Judaism of these does not stem from awareness or feelings; instead it pours like water from a tap which is turned on or off by the Communist Party as its exigencies require. Jews in other countries have always made the highest sacrifices and fought with all their strength in order to remain Jews. Such a struggle would be hopeless in the Soviet Union, even were they to feel inclined to embark upon it. Sovietism undermines the resistance potential of the Jews and reduces their Judaism to a thing lacking meaning, value, and dignity. It might not even be worthwhile to fight for this kind of Jewishness. Soviet Jews—and soon also those inhabiting the Soviet satellite countries—are thus rapidly transformed into spiritual nudists. This nudity is still regretted and disparaged insofar as there still exist large numbers of Jews who have been brought up in Jewish homes, have obtained a Jewish education and still possess a measure of sensitivity to Jewish needs and interests. Coming generations will not even know that they are naked. They will have no idea that they had been stripped of something.

All this is a consequence of the political conditions prevailing in the Soviet Union, where everything must be transmitted through the mechanism of state control. In the Soviet Union there is no room for any kind of voluntary community. It should be added, however, that prevailing conditions in the U. S. S. R. were not the only factor contributing to the ruin of Soviet Jewry. The attitude of communism toward the Jewish question played a no less significant role.

Recently many Jews have been confusing the political support of the Soviet Government for the establishment of a Jewish state in a part of Palestine with ideological acceptance of Zionism by the Communist movement. In the midst of the enthusiasm aroused by Gromyko's historic speech at Lake Success which played a decisive role in the UN decision of November 29, 1947, it was not noticed that he spoke of Jewish suffering in western Europe. Anyone even faintly familiar with Soviet pronunciamentos who realizes that not a single word is ever inserted accidentally, could have read the future course of events in Gromyko's speech: the prohibition of Jewish emigration from eastern Europe. (So far as the Soviet Union is concerned this prohibition had been in effect for some time previously.) The Soviet Government took the attitude that those Jews who needed it—the Jews of the capitalist western countries—had the right to constitute themselves as a Jewish nation in Israel. But this was not to be construed that the Jews of the world were one people. The Jews in the Soviet zone in particular were not part of this people. This was ever the Communist view. The surprise caused by Ilya Ehrenburg's famous article which denied that the Jews were a people was therefore unmerited. In this article Ehrenburg merely parroted what outstanding Communist spokesmen had said before him.

As far back as 1903 Lenin said: "The scientifically absolutely unfounded idea concerning a distinct Jewish nation has a reactionary political significance. The idea of a Jewish 'nationality' runs counter to the interests of the Jewish proletariat because directly and indirectly it arouses within it a mood that is hostile to assimilation, a 'ghetto' mood." [1]

In 1913 Stalin wrote: "What sort of a nation is a Jewish nation that consists of Georgian, Daghestanian, Russian, American, and other Jews, the members of which do not understand each other (since they speak different languages), inhabit different parts of the globe, will never see each other, will never act together, whether in time of peace or in time of war." [2]

Stalin wrote the above in connection with the formulation of the program of the Bolsheviks—at that time they still called themselves Social Democratic Party—for the various people who had been enslaved by Czarism. To make it clear that this program did not apply to Jews, Stalin added: "No, it is not for such paper 'nations' that the Social Democratic Party draws up its national program."

Lenin, Stalin, and other Communist leaders visualized the disappearance of the Jews and assimilation as the sole solution to the Jewish question. It was therefore inevitable that they should look upon every Jewish national movement as a reactionary manifestation that hinders the process of assimilation. Even the Bund was thus not acceptable to them, because by its very organization of Jewish workers it retarded the process of assimilation. Only the working class of a nation is entitled to a separate socialist party, Lenin taught his disciples. Since no Jewish nation exists there can be no independent Jewish proletarian party. It is, hence, not surprising that Communists have from the very beginning declared zionism to be "a counter-revolutionary movement of the Jewish bouregeoisie," to quote the formula of a resolution of the Comintern.

In hundreds of statements and in countless acts during half a century Communists have demonstrated their belief that Jews are not a people and that it is the revolutionary duty of Jewish Socialists to hasten Jewish assimilation. Throughout Communist literature it is impossible to find a single instance of deviation or of modification of this standpoint. Only twice did it seem as if a change was being introduced in the attitude of the Soviet Government toward the Jews within its borders. The first time it was in connection with Biro Bidjan, which, as Kalinin at first formulated it, aimed to consolidate Soviet Jews into a nationality. Nothing came of Biro Bidjan, and still less of Kalinin's declaration. The second time occurred during World War II, when tanks were named after historical Jewish personalities and it was permitted to admire the heroism of the Jewish people. The historical personalities, though dead for hundreds of years, have now been banished from the Soviet Union, and, as far as Jewish heroism is concerned, there is no one left to admire it. When Ehrenburg now states that Soviet Jews have nothing in common with Israel and that they reject any idea of ideological or organizational ties with zionism, he reflects recent developments within the Soviet Union in regard to the Jewish population. Lenin's program for the hasty submergence of Jews in the environment is now being put into practice. Since Biro Bidjan was a failure and the war is over, what is there to hinder the Soviet Government from solving the Jewish question in accordance with Communist principles, by creating conditions favorable for the disappearance of the Jews? Stalin has taught that a Communist state must control elemental forces—this is perhaps his most important contribution to Socialist theory. If the assimilation of the Jews is desirable, then it should be accomplished in planned fashion, and the entire power of the state should be put at the service of this program. This explains why all possible sources of Jewish cultural development have been cut off and why Soviet Jewry is being spiritually pulverized.

One should not rule out the possibility of a change for the better sometime in the future. But time is a decisive factor in this respect. Russians, Poles, Czechs, Rumanians, Hungarians, can wait. Jews cannot. If more favorable conditions for Jewish survival in the Soviet Union should come into being within the next 5, 10 or 15 years, it would still be possible to salvage much for Jewish survival. Should more than one generation pass under present conditions, it will be too late. There will remain no raw material from which to forge anew Jewish group existence.

The obliteration of the Jewish nation in the Soviet Union is being accomplished from both ends. At one end the political structure of the Soviet regime objectively precludes all forms of Jewish organization within the country and all communication with Jews outside. At the other end there is the consuming fire of Jewish national nihilism: assimilation, intermarriage, indifference to Jewish affairs, complete lack of a feeling of responsibility as Jews, uprooting of the Jewish milieu, estrangement from the Jewish cultural heritage, and the Jewish religion, opposition to the very idea that the Jews constitute a people. All of these deprive the individual Jew of any subjective desire to preserve Jewish life. One quarter of the entire Jewish people is being consumed by these two fires.

Know Your Waterways

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 30, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the Marine News:

KNOW YOUR WATERWAYS—LITTLE KNOWN FACTS

Most of the public has no conception of the value of the Nation's harbors and channels. Every important city in the Nation, many vital industries, every Navy, shipbuilding and ship repair yard are located on an improved harbor or channel. A great part of America's commerce and all of its defense is vitally linked to waterways. Through transshipment, waterways are indispensable to other methods of transportation necessary for commerce and defense. Improved harbors and channels properly maintained are vital to the Nation—but few Americans realize it.

Life Indemnities for Survivors of Members of the Armed Services Who Die While on Active Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, because of the widespread interest in national service life insurance, I want to quote the findings and recommendations of my subcommittee as contained in House Report No. 2761:

FINDINGS

I

The National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940 was passed by the Congress during the closing days of the third session, Seventy-seventh Congress. The initial legislation, which later became the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, was prepared by the Veterans' Administration.

No professional consultation or advice was sought regarding this initial legislation.

The report by the conferees of the House and Senate regarding that portion of the bill dealing with national service life insurance made the significant recommendation that "this legislation be carefully reviewed and more thoroughly studied." Until the inquiry of this subcommittee, no comprehensive study such as that recommended by the conferees has ever been conducted.

No hearings whatsoever were held by the House or Senate on the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940. This act was passed as a rider to a revenue bill and was introduced in the Senate, the House having passed the initial legislation.

The basic National Service Life Insurance Act has been frequently amended; all such amendments have had the effect of liberalizing benefits of the basic legislation.

II

The national service life insurance has not met the objectives of Government life insurance. It has failed to provide uniform protection in the form of income for the dependents of persons dying while serving in the Armed Forces, and it has failed to lessen demands for pensions.

The gratuity provisions included in the national service life insurance program are superimposed upon the present Government pension system.

III

Federal Government contribution for administrative expenses and benefit payments coincident with national service life-insurance operations have cost the Federal Government, from appropriated funds, more than $5,500,000,000 in the last 10-year period.

There is no evidence that the Congress of the United States has ever been fully or adequately appraised of the total cost to the Federal Government of the national service life-insurance program.

All costs of the national service life-insurance program borne by the Federal Government are continuing costs from both an administration and benefit-payments standpoint.

IV

The National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940 was proposed and passed primarily to protect the equity value of the United States Government life-insurance policyholders in the USGLI fund. In the event of a future national emergency, a fourth Government insurance program may be proposed for reasons similar to those advanced when national service life insurance was established.

There is serious doubt that the manpower to administer national service life insurance or any other Government insurance plan would be available in the event of a future national emergency.

National service life insurance may not be a proper vehicle through which to grant insurance protection to participants in a future emergency in that the present policyholders, especially veterans of World War II, may become vested with an interest in the national service life-insurance fund in which it would be unfair and inequitable to permit future policyholders to participate.

V

Since October 8, 1940, more than 22,500,000 national service life insurance policies have been issued.

Three out of every four, or slightly more than 75 percent, of all former national service life insurance policyholders have permitted their national service life insurance policies to lapse. Of the veterans of World War II, only one out of six are covered by NSLI.

One million four hundred and fifty-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven, or 25.9 percent, of NSLI policies currently in force are held by in-service personnel.

Only 78 percent of those currently serving in the Armed Forces have taken out national service life insurance. These individuals have varying amounts of NSLI in force, ranging from $1,000 to $10,000. Less than 60 percent have the full $10,000 protection.

One out of every nine combat casualties of World War II had no national service life insurance whatsoever.

The average face value of policies issued from Pearl Harbor day to VJ-day was slightly over $7,000. The average face value per policy as of March 31, 1950, was $6,422.

VI

The use of the word "insurance" in characterizing national service life insurance operations is a misnomer.

The paradox of national service life insurance is made clear when it is realized that the Federal Government underwrites the extra hazards of military or naval service only to the extent to which an individual was insured for normal civilian risk under the national service life insurance program. The insured having in force national service life insurance on a personal paying basis, generally speaking, is a condition precedent before the United States Government becomes liable for any death-benefit payments.

This condition presents an inequity and results in discrimination among beneficiaries, reiterating at this point that one out of every nine combat casualties during World War II had no national service life insurance whatsoever.

VII

The use of the American Experience Table of Mortality for calculating annuities was outmoded by 1940, and its use has had the effect of granting annuity payments considerably in excess of what more modern actuarial calculations would justify.

Testimony before this subcommittee revealed that the use of the American Experience Table of Mortality was deliberately adopted in order that the annuity payments to beneficiaries of World War II would be no lesser amount than similar payments being made to beneficiaries of World War I casualities. The legislative history does not indicate that the Congress, or the conferees of the Congress, were fully apprised of this deliberate action.

The continued use of the American Experience Table of Mortality for calculating annuities can only be interpreted as a subsidy to the national service life insurance fund.

Through October 1, 1948, the use of this mortality table has required the Government to appropriate to the national service life insurance fund in excess of $502,000,000 in annuity differential payments. These costs are continuing costs and are being charged against the NSLI appropriation on a case-by-case transfer basis. Whereas the use of the American Experience Table of Mortality, in view of unforeseen risks of World War II, may have been prudent for the calculation of NSLI premiums, there was, and is, no justification under accepted insurance practices to use this table for national service life insurance annuity calculations.

The use of any annuity table without regard for the difference in life expectancy of male and female lives is contrary to modern insurance practice.

Under the National Service Life Insurance Act as presently written and administered, the total cost to the Government of a $10,000 face value policy may be in excess of $12,000.

VIII

Although the Veterans' Administration has conducted many studies from time to time, such as the possibility of installing mechanical equipment for premium billing and posting, or matters regarding centralization of the numerous district offices, action has been negligible.

The administrative officials of the Veterans' Administration in charge of the national service life insurance operations have done little in the effectuation of efficiencies in administrative operations. This is due in part to their being uninformed as to operational cost breakdown and in part to a tendency to study problems for long periods of time without reaching conclusions.

IX

Through the conclusion of the fiscal year 1948 (ending June 30, 1949), the total Federal contribution to the national service life insurance fund was greater than the total amount collected from the insured in premium payments.

X

On an over-all average, an amount exceeding 75 percent of the total premiums paid on national service life insurance was returned to the insured in the form of dividends during the first 6 months of 1950.

XI

The present rate of interest (3 percent) paid on invested national service life insurance funds is considerably in excess of the interest rate being paid by the United States Treasury in securing adequate sums required to fund and refund the debt obligation and current expenses of the Federal Government.

Payment of this liberal rate of interest is an undisclosed subsidy to the national service life insurance fund.

Continuation of payment by the Treasury Department of 3 percent interest on the NSLI trust fund is of questionable justification.

XII

The testimony before this subcommittee did not clearly establish a moral or legal necessity for the Government to pay accrued interest claimed to be due the national service life insurance fund because of delays in transferring moneys from the national service life appropriation to the national service life insurance fund.

XIII

The insuring of aviation cadets under present applicable statutes is excessively costly.

It would be tens of millions of dollars less costly for the Government to assure each aviation cadet in training that his dependents in the event of his death during such training would receive a gratuitous life indemnity from the Government of $10,000.

XIV

The decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs regarding the possible recovery of dividends by the Federal Government on insurance premiums paid by the Government for aviation cadets personnel is of doubtful propriety.

The policy determinations of the Veterans' Administration are inconsistent. This is illustrated by the fact that no charges were made against USGLI appropriations by the fact that no charges were made against USGLI appropriations for annuity differential payments or accrued interest, while under NSLI these charges were made against NSLI appropriations. The law in each case was the same.

Under the GI educational program the Veterans' Administration has upon occasion advised the Congress of certain discrepancies and abuses occurring from time to time resulting in the extravagant expenditure of public funds. As a policy matter the Veterans' Administration has not felt disposed to make similar suggestions regarding national service life insurance operations.

XV

Upon analyzing testimony of the Veterans' Administration, substantiated by supplementary testimony of the Bureau of the Budget, there is no evidence that the Congress has ever been fully or adequately advised as to the over-all cost of the national service life insurance program.

The requested NSLI appropriations for administrative expenses cover only a portion of the total administrative cost of national service life insurance operations.

National service life insurance administrative costs are at least twice the amount reflected for such costs in the annual budget request. The present budget procedures do not adequately inform the Congress or the taxpayers as to the true administrative costs of NSLI, all such costs being borne by the Federal Government.

National service life insurance administrative costs appear to be exorbitantly high. Although certain causes or justifications were offered as partial explanations, there appears to be a strong reluctance on the part of the Veterans' Administration to effect any significant changes in present methods or procedures which, if adopted, would result in greater efficiency and greater economy of operations.

XVI

The administrative and clerical duties performed by the various personnel of the Armed Forces relative to the maintenance of in-service national service life insurance policies has had and continues to have the effect of dissipating military appropriations and manpower.

In addition to this fiscal cost factor, during the war years, hundreds of officers and thousands of enlisted personnel devoted full time to in-service national service life insurance administrative duties.

Cost to the armed services of administering in-service national service life insurance policies from October 8, 1940, through March 31, 1950, is conservatively estimated at $96,409,212.

XVII

The delegation of power granted by the Congress to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, through section 608 of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, has had the effect of circumventing the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921.

To a considerable degree this delegation of authority virtually eliminates the system of checks and balances inherent in our democratic form of government. The constitutionality of this delegation of authority is questioned, but aside from any constitutional considerations, this subcommittee questions the wisdom of such a broad grant of authority.

XVIII

National service life insurance policies are contracts which consist of the applicable statutes, the lawful regulations of the Veterans' Administration, and the policy.

These contracts may not be unilaterally terminated by the Government. However, there exists no legal or equitable reason why the Government cannot specify a cut-off date for eligibility for national service life insurance, thus terminating the present inequitable, relatively inefficient, and costly program.

All outstanding national service life insurance policies are definite irrevocable contracts between the Federal Government and the insured.

RECOMMENDATIONS

I

In view of the many administrative difficulties encountered in the administration of national service life insurance and the resultant effect upon the policyholders as well as the significant, if not exorbitant, costs to the United States in financing its obligations under this program, it is recommended that—

The appropriate committees of the Congress consider the feasibility, desirability, and appropriateness of establishing a gratuitous life indemnity for all men serving in the Armed Forces of the United States, such indemnity in lieu of, and not superimposed upon, the present insurance program available to military personnel.

II

If the present plan of Government insurance is to continue, then it is recommended that—

There be a complete legislative reappraisal of the present National Service Life Insurance Act giving special attention to the following features thereof:

1. Changing the manner in which the Government liabilities to the fund are currently being calculated and charged.
2. The rate of interest paid on invested NSLI funds.
3. The continued use of the American Experience Mortality Table for calculating both premiums and annuities.
4. The ineffectiveness of the present insurance program in providing 100-percent insurance coverage for Armed Forces personnel, and the varying amounts of payments being paid NSLI beneficiaries.
5. The relative efficiency, and at what cost, can the present program be operated in the future.
6. The demands upon the time of military personnel in the administration of in-service policies, and the dissipation of military appropriation for in-service administrative expenses coincident with NSLI operations.

III

The recommendations of the subcommittee regarding certain policy determinations of Government agencies are as follows:

Veterans' Administration

The present policy of the Veterans' Administration regarding this agency's fiduciary relationship with the Congress of the United States should be carefully reappraised by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs should review his policy determination with respect to future-dividend payments on policies held by aviation cadets, with a view to redetermining the legality and propriety of having excess premium payments revert to the Federal Government.

Treasury Department

It is recommended that the Secretary of the Treasury reexamine the propriety, or necessity, of continuing to pay the present rate of interest of 3 percent on invested NSLI funds. Any excess payment in this regard which could be regarded as a "subsidy" to the NSLI fund should be deleted.

IV

Section 608 of the National Service Life Insurance Act stands out, among similar grants of authority by the Congress, as being the most absolute and the most definite in its finality.

This subcommittee recommends that the Congress review the extent to which it has relinquished its control of public expenditures under the absolute authority granted the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs through section 608 of the National Service Life Insurance Act.

V

If the Congress of the United States should not grant a gratuitous life idemnity to all members of the Armed Forces at this time, this subcommittee recommends unanimously that such a program be immediately adopted for insuring aviation cadets. By so doing the continued wasteful and extravagant means of "insuring" aviation cadets could be discontinued without impairment of any benefits extended under present law.

VI

Because of the present world situation and the resulting demand upon this Nation to greatly expand its military force—all persons serving in these forces having the immediate need for life indemnification or insurance protection—it is recommended:

That the appropriate committees of the Congress give full consideration to the immediate effectuation of some interim legislation, covering the insurance needs of the thousands now entering the Armed Forces. Such legislation should be so framed as to provide 100-percent coverage to all Armed Forces personnel; be more easily administered; if possible, less costly to the Federal Government; and have the effect of replacing the availability of national service life insurance to new entrants into the Armed Forces of the United States.

The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act Should Be Amended as to Section 304, Subsections (a), (b), (c), (d)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, this day I have filed a bill, I do not yet have the number, in the following language:

A bill to amend section 304, subsections (a) and (b) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, as amended.

Be it enacted, etc.—

That subsection (a) of section 304 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, as amended (21 U. S. C. 331) is amended by striking the balance of the sentence following the words "dangerous to health" and changing the comma after "health" to a period,

And it is further amended by striking all that portion of the last sentence of such subsection following the words "between the parties" and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or, if no such stipulation be filed within a reasonable time, the court, on motion for the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, may transfer the case for trial to any other district or division thereof."

That subsection (b) of section 304 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, as amended (21 U. S. C. 331) is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following sentence: "Cases brought hereunder shall be entitled to preference on the trial calendar."

And it is further amended by striking from the third to the last sentence all words following "such court," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "On motion, for the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, may transfer the consolidated proceedings for trial to any other district or division thereof."

My interest in this important matter dates back to about a year ago when it appeared to me from the evidence then presented to me upon inquiry that, in my judgment, an important, valued and long-established business located in the Eighteenth District of California, which I represent, was being irreparably interfered with and damaged even to the point of possible destruction thereof by methods then being taken by the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency under alleged authority claimed by the representatives of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, Twenty-first United States Code, pages 301–334a, section 304, which provided:

That more than one libel for condemnation proceedings may be brought upon the same alleged misbranding "when the Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found, without hearing, by him or any officer or employee of the Agency that * * * the labeling of the misbranded article * * * would be in a material respect misleading to the injury or damage of the purchaser or consumer."

The firm is engaged in the making, manufacture and interstate distribution of a combination of substance commonly trade-marked "Nutrilite."

Upon the representations then made to me upon my inquiry, I did, on January 27, 1949, write the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, as follows:

I trust that all of the persons passing upon the problem before it comes to your desk for your own personal finding and signature will make very sure that the finding they ask you to sign is true in fact, and that the finding they ask you to make is consistent with existing law and facts in the premises.

Furthermore, I respectfully request that, inasmuch as my constituents emphatically maintain to me that, under the Food and Drug Act, their product, "Nutrilite," is not misbranded by their printed matter. And inasmuch as the reported determination of the department to consecutively libel the interstate shipments of this product could and would normally bust or break the corporation producing the same before the matter could get to a final court decision—it would appear reasonable, would it not, Mr. Ewing, that there be no finding by you which would result in forcing the producing company to insolvency until there had been a reasonable hearing opportunity given the producing corporation to the end that there be opportunity to make a showing before yourself as to their contention that this Nutrilite product is not misbranded.

Subsequent thereto, in civil action No. 5208–48, my constituents as plaintiff against the Administrator, in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, on this same subject matter, obtained a unanimous decree of the three-judge court in which as to findings of fact and conclusions of law of said court, convened pursuant to the provisions of section 2284, title 28, United States Code, entered the following conclusions of law, amongst others:

5. Nutrilite contains no substance or material or combination of substances or materials harmful or deleterious in any manner to human users thereof when taken in suggested dosage. No claim has been made by any Federal, State, or other governmental agency that nutrilite is adulterated or harmful in any manner to the health of human users thereof, insofar as the record before the court shows.

6. The label of the package in which nutrilite was and is sold complies with all requirements of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938.

7. The objection of the defendants to the sale of nutrilite, which is the basis of this action, is the use by plaintiff of an advertising pamphlet entitled "How To Get Well and Stay Well." Nutrilite is sold directly to users thereof and this pamphlet is used in making about 40 percent of the initial sales of nutrilite.

8. The product now sold as nutrilite was first marketed about 1933; defendants' records show they received information about it in 1939 and had correspondence about it in 1940; plaintiff has been its exclusive national distributor since 1945; defendants received their first copies of the then current edition of the pamphlet How To Get Well and Stay Well on December 5, 1946, together with names and addresses of certain of plaintiff's distributors outside of California.

* * * * *

32. (a) On December 30, 1948, the instant injunction action was filed. At this time it was the intention and plan of the defendants to file many more libel seizure actions and seize Nutrilite throughout the Nation. The Food and Drug inspectors knew of this general policy.

* * * * *

(c) Defendants made no effort to secure an early trial in the libel cases and in order to effect seizures more quickly, mimeographed copies of the booklets, How To Get Well and Stay Well, were prepared for transmission to United States attorneys.

* * * * *

34. On January 24, 1949, Judge David A. Pine of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia found that the actions of the defendants in rendering said decisions were unfair, drastic, shocking, and harsh, and held that the decisions of defendants Crawford, Larrick, and Dunbar, described supra, were unlawful because the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency did not have the authority to delegate this power to make such decisions to said defendants.

* * * * *

39. The seizure actions caused plaintiff a sales loss of some $100,000 per month from the time of the first seizure until the instant action was filed, and the defendants were restrained from making further seizures. The seizures had the effect of frightening plaintiff's agents and distributors, so that they worked less, and some resigned, with the net result of loss of morale among agents and distributors, loss in sales volume and loss of personnel. Unfavorable opinions and injurious information with respect to the labeling of plaintiff's product reached many private individuals and organizations. Publicity about the seizure cases initiated by defendants appeared in newspapers and magazines in a way which did injuriously damage plaintiff and this led to loss of customers. Plaintiff was compelled to hire counsel in the 10 libel cases and put up bonds and costs in each case. The value of the Nutrilite seized by defendants in the 10 libel actions is $6,822.17, and the product so seized will be unsaleable if returned to plaintiff. The nature of plaintiff's business makes good will of the public one of its most valuable assets and the acts of the defendants in the embargoes and seizure actions in widely separated parts of the United States has caused the plaintiff's injury and damage. Dedendants admit injury to plaintiff and that there has been a serious impact on plaintiff's rights by their actions, and that there is no provision of law requiring or permitting defendants to reimburse plaintiff for the damages herein found or for the injury or for destruction of its business and good will by the actions of the defendants, in the event of a determination of said libel actions in favor of plaintiff. The injury and damage to plaintiff which has occurred and which is threatened by defendants is therefore substantial and irreparable.

40. The defendants have never advised plaintiff of the particulars of plaintiff's literature considered to be objectionable by defendants. The defendants have not provided an opportunity to plaintiff whereby such literature could be corrected, revised and amended in a manner which would conform to the views of and be acceptable to the defendants.

41. That plaintiff would have been subjected to many additional seizures of its product throughout the United States in addition to the existing 11 seizures of its product, if not enjoined from so doing, is admitted by defendants. It was a general policy and plan of the defendants to make with all possible speed many seizures of plaintiff's product. Such additional seizures, and the product could be seized by defendants in the hands of more than 5,000 of plaintiff's distributors, would have the effect of destroying plaintiff's business prior to any possible adjudication of the disputed issues on plantiff's labeling in any of the libel actons already filed or threatened.

42. There was and is no emergency involving injury or damage of any kind to the public or to any purchaser, consumer or user of Nutrilite or in connection with Nutrilite and plaintiff's use of the three pamphlets which constitute defendants' sole objection to Nutrilite's sale. Defendants have not, at any time, indicated or contended that there is an emergency or situation of compelling public necessity with respect to the labeling of plaintiff's product and no such emergency or situation did, in fact, exist at or prior to any of the actions of defendants described herein.

43. The evidence herein on the actions conduct and course of action of defendants before and after the decisions of Crawford, Larrick, Dunbar and Kingsley described above reveal, as do their decisions and actions in making said decisions, that the defendants in making said decisions acted capriciously, arbitrarily, unreasonably, oppressively, and unlawfully.

Thus, you will see that, by the unanimous statement of Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the Court held that the action of the Administrator and his representatives in the enforcement of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetics Act were held to have been capricious, arbitrary, unreasonable oppressive, and unlawful. It would, therefore, appear that my communication to the Administrator on January 27, 1949, almost a year prior to the unanimous decision of these three judges was not illy founded.

As the instant case involving my constituents then and now involved the subject commonly termed "multiple seizure," and as I am informed that H. R. 9158 includes this same subject matter and deals with title 21 of the United States Code, entitled 'Food and Drugs," is to come before this House of Representatives shortly, I am pleased to present for the information of my colleagues the following treatment of the amendments which I am informed and believe are essential in the interests of justice and for the purpose of removing a presently claimed unrestrained power to destroy a legitimate business selling a worth-while, harmless product simply because the Government officials do wrongly charge that advertising or labelling is slightly misleading:

MEMORANDUM ON THE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 304 OF THE FEDERAL FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT (21 U. S. C. 334)

1. THE MULTIPLE SEIZURE PROVISIONS

The adoption of the amendments I propose is essential because the Food and Drug Administration and the courts have interpreted the multiple seizure provisions of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 as giving unlimited power to make multiple seizures of harmless products. This means that arbitrary Government officials have unrestrained, and the courts have said unrestrainable, power to destroy a business selling a worth-while and harmless product simply because the officials wrongly charge that advertising or labeling is slightly misleading. I do not believe that the Congress ever intended to give such tremendous unchecked power to any Federal official and have drafted these proposed amendments to protect the people who are regulated by the Food and Drug Administration now and who, under the courts' interpretation of congressional intent, have no protection whatsoever to prevent destruction of their business prior to any possible hearing today.

Section 304 (a) permits multiple libels or seizures of any product which is adulterated. The proposed amendments do not seek to alter such provision but relate solely to those instances of multiple seizures where there is a charge of misbranding.

Section 304 (a) presently authorizes more than one libel for condemnation to be instituted for the same alleged misbranding in four specified instances: (1) When the alleged misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States; (2) where the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency has probable cause to believe from facts found, without hearing, that the allegedly misbranded article is dangerous to health; (3) where the Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found without hearing that the labeling of the allegedly misbranded article is fraudulent, and (4) where the Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found without hearing that the labeling of the allegedly misbranded article would be in a material respect misleading to the injury or damage of the purchaser or consumer. These provisions are the so-called multiple seizure provisions of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

Experience has shown that in many instances so-called multiple seizures under questionable circumstances have proved to be a harsh and drastic remedy. This is particularly so where multiple seizure campaigns by the Food and Drug Administration have been instituted under Nos. 3 and 4 above, to wit, where it is claimed that the labeling is fraudulent or misleading.

It is obvious that more than one seizure action should be permitted where a product or its labeling has already been judicially found to be misbranded. A shipper who continues to use labeling which has already been judicially condemned should have no right to protection against further legal action based against the product or its labeling.

The present provisions of section 304 (a) authorizing multiple seizures when the Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found without hearing that a product is dangerous to health would appear to have complete justification. Historically speaking, such a summary procedure has never been anathema to due process of law, for confiscation is often the only way to promptly protect the public health.

The proposed amendment seeks to limit the instances where multiple seizures or multiple libel proceedings may be instituted to the circumstances outlined above. Experience has shown that multiple seizures under the third and fourth instances outlined above find little justification for the exercise of such a drastic remedy. Multiple seizures of a product throughout the Nation based upon an ex parte determination by the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency has a particularly devastating effect on shippers and companies engaged in the food, drug, and cosmetic field. In many instances, a thorough multiple seizure program by the Federal Government has been tantamount to destruction of the business prior to any possible judicial decision on the merits of the Federal Security Agency's claim. Where it is claimed that a product is dangerous to health the protection of the public would seem to outweigh any deprivation that a private shipper may suffer. On the other hand, where there is no question of danger to the public health, but it is merely alleged and claimed that the labeling of an article is fraudulent or misleading in a material respect justice and common sense would seem to demand that the shipper or claimant should not be subjected to the possibility of being put out of business by a multiple seizure campaign long before the merits of the controversy are settled. It is with this end in view that the proposed amendment to section 304 (a) of the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act seeks to strike those provisions which authorize multiple seizures when the Federal Security Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found without hearing that the labeling of an allegedly misbranded article is fraudulent or in a material respect misleading. Overzealous, erroneous or even misguided administrative action in authorizing widespread multiple seizures on the claim of fraudulent or misleading labeling has and could result in irreparable damage and injury to shippers and producers. The attendant adverse publicity has often shattered the morale of a highly developed distribution system and destroyed customer good will developed through years of honest business practices. The fact that a shipper or producer ultimately prevails in a trial on the merits will not serve to resurrect what has become in effect a lifeless enterprise. The difficulty and expense of filing claims of ownership, answers and bonds in widely separated jurisdictions and in arranging for consolidation and removal may be enormous. Even after consolidation and removal further seizures may be filed for there is nothing in the law to prevent it. No Federal statute or theory of jurisprudence authorizes suit to recover damages caused by baseless multiple seizures. A moral victory is poor compensation at best. Furthermore, the Supreme Court of the United States has recently held that a shipper or producer does not have the right to seek injunctive relief against widespread multiple seizures even though there has been a gross abuse of discretion by officers of the Government in instituting multiple seizures based upon a claim of misleading labeling.[1]

It is with these possible abuses in view and the absence of any remedy available to a shipper or producer to protect against such abuses, that the amendment to the multiple seizure provisions of section 304 (a) of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is proposed. Acceptance of the amendment would still leave to the Administration the right to institute multiple seizures (1) where a quesion of adulteration is involved; (2) when the misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States; and (3) where it is believed that the misbranded article is dangerous to health.

In the event that the administration believes that fraudulent or misleading labeling should be taken off the market, a full and complete remedy exists under section 302 of the act which authorizes an injunction proceeding to enjoin violations of the act. By this device any fraudulent or misleading labeling may be cut off at its source. This speedy and effective remedy of injunction fully protects the public and at the same time is to the advantage of the shipper or producer. Multiple seizures of allegedly fraudulent or misleading labeling and its product not only may visit unjustified punishment on a shipper but also fail to protect the public since a seizure only affects isolated quantities of the product and its labeling and leaves future shipments undisturbed.

2. REMOVAL AND CONSOLIDATION

Section 304 (a) presently provides that where a libel proceeding has been instituted the proceeding may be removed for trial to any district agreed upon by stipulation between the parties or, in the case of failure to stipulate, the claimant of the articles seized may apply to the court to have the trial removed to a district of reasonable proximity to the claimant's principal place of business. These removal provisions relate to cases where there has been only one seizure action. Substantially similar provisions are contained in subsection (b) of section 304 which provides that the multiple libels may be consolidated for trial in (1) any district selected by the claimant where one of the multiple libel proceedings is pending; (2) a district agreed upon by stipulation between the parties; or (3) a district of reasonable proximity to the claimant's principal place of business.

The relief ostensibly accorded the claimant by removal and consolidation of multiple libel proceedings is in many instances only partial relief and in others completely illusory. In each jurisdiction in which a libel action has been brought the claimant must file his claims, answers, and bonds unless he is willing to permit the various actions to go by default. Even if consolidation is effected, substantial burdens are placed on the claimant in attempting to try the consolidated proceeding in a jurisdiction far removed from his home district where his witnesses, records, and other materials are located. Of course, if the seizure has been effected in a claimant's home district other seizures predicated upon the same claim could be removed and consolidated in a claimant's home district for trial. Experience has shown, however, that seizures ordinarily are not effected in the claimant's home district, but rather in jurisdictions far removed. In practice, the statutory right to have multiple libel proceedings consolidated in one of the jurisdictions where a libel has been instituted is meaningless for often the closest jurisdiction in which a libel proceeding has been instituted is hundreds or thousands of miles removed from the claimant's principal place of business.

While it would appear that under the statutory provisions of section 304 that the parties to a libel proceeding could stipulate to removal to and consolidation for trial in the claimant's home district, the Food and Drug Administration has a declared policy never to agree to stipulate to removal to or consolidation in such a district. This policy apparently is applied under all circumstances, regardless of individual cases of hardship.

As has been noted previously, both subsections (a) and (b) do authorize a court to transfer a single proceeding or consolidate multiple proceedings for trial in a district of reasonable proximity to the claimant's principal place of business. There are no appellate court decisions interpreting this provision, but the few district courts which have had occasion to pass upon it have held that a district of reasonable proximity to the claimant's principal place of business excludes the claimant's home district. (See U. S. v. 600 Units of Nue-ovo (60 Fed. Supp. 144); U. S. v. 6 Dozen Bottles of Dr. Pepper's Kuriko (54 Fed. Supp. 458); and U. S. v. 26 Dozen Bottles Cerigards (60 Fed. Supp. 626).) Such a ruling does not work an apparent hardship where the claimant's home district is in the East where district courts are reasonably close together. Far different circumstances prevail in the West where district courts are frequently hundreds of miles apart. If a claimant's principal place of business were in Los Angeles, for example, and a number of seizures were made in the East what district would be one of reasonable proximity to the Southern District of California which holds court in Los Angeles? The closest adjoining districts are the Northern District of California located in San Francisco and the District of Arizona in Phoenix. Each of these two cities is nearly 450 miles from Los Angeles. It is easy to conceive of circumstances where it would be difficult and expensive to properly try a lawsuit 450 miles removed from one's place of business. To take another example, suppose the claimant's principal place of business is in the district of Hawaii and seizures are made in various parts of the continental United States. Under the ruling in the cases cited supra it would appear that the claimant's only hope would be to have the multiple libels filed in the United States proper consolidated for trial in either the Northern or the Southern Districts of California, which are some 2,000 miles away from Hawaii.

The proposed amendments to section 304 (a) and (b), therefore, seek to make adequate provision whereby a court in which a libel action has been filed may upon proper application consolidate multiple libel proceedings for trial to any district or division thereof. A similar provision is proposed to apply to a single libel proceeding brought under section 304 (a) of the act. It should be noted that under the proposed amendments, transfer of a single libel proceeding or consolidation of multiple libel proceedings to any other district or division is not mandatory, but is discretionary with the court for the convenience of parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice. It is respectfully submitted that the proposed amendment to subsections (a) and (b) of section 304 (a) in regard to transfer for trial and consolidation would make it possible for the courts to transfer the cases to the claimant's home district where there exists a definite hardship. If the proposed amendment is adopted consolidation or removal could still be effected by stipulation to any district agreed upon between the parties or to any district where a libel proceeding involving the same claim has been filed. The only practical effect of the proposed amendment in regard to removal and consolidation is to authorize removal when justice so requires to any district or division thereof and to delete the provisions authorizing removal to a district of reasonable proximity to the claimant's principal place of business.

3. PREFERENCE ON TRIAL CALENDAR

The proposed amendment to section 304 (b) also seeks to provide that cases brought under section 304 shall be entitled to preference on the trial calendar. The reasons for such a provision are obvious, particularly where multiple libel proceedings are involved for until there is a decision on the merits the Federal Government would be free to make as many seizures as possible. While unlimited seizures may be justified where there is a claim that the public health is directly threatened, justice and fair play would seem to demand that in such an exigency a trial be had as soon as possible for a prompt decision on the merits would not only serve to further protect the public health for judicial condemnation would in effect authorize Nation-wide confiscation if the product were in fact dangerous. Furthermore, provisions for prompt trial would also relieve a shipper whose product is, in fact, not dangerous to health from the devastating and irreparable damage and injury caused by Nation-wide multiple seizures.

Mr. Speaker, when a three-man United States District Court, having heard all the evidence on both sides of an important controversy and after due consideration on this very point involved, unanimously hold and declare in their findings of fact and conclusions of law, as this three-man court did on December 14, 1949, to wit: "that the defendants"—note is mine: the defendant was the Federal Security Agency, charged with the administration and enforcement of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act—"in making said decisions acted capriciously, arbitrarily, unreasonably, oppressively and unlawfully," it is time for Congress to pause and look to see whether or not expressed statutory authority should be given for such multiple seizures.

One Hundredth Anniversary of the Naming of the Village of Leeds, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOSTER FURCOLO

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, I know the Members will all want to join with me in commemorating the one-hundredth anniversary of the naming of the village of Leeds, in the Second Congressional District in Massachusetts.

Leeds was previously known as Shephard's Hollow. A 2-day celebration is to be held on August 19 and 20, with many activities to celebrate the occasion. There will also be a reunion of present and former residents of the village.

Leeds has had a long and interesting history. I wish time permitted me to discuss it in detail with the Members, as I know you would all enjoy hearing about it.

Between 1800 and 1812, three mills were erected in Leeds. The first was a saw mill, the second a cotton mill, and the third a woolen mill. James Shephard, one of the early settlers, was one of the first in America to manufacture broadcloth and woolens.

In 1849 the inhabitants petitioned the Government for a post office and for a change of the name to Leeds. Both requests were granted and the post office was established on May 27, 1850. In 1874 the village was nearly destroyed by a flood which demolished many homes and caused the loss of 51 lives. The citizens had great energy and courage and Leeds survived and prospered in spite of the disaster.

I know all the residents of the Second Congressional District wish to extend congratulations and best wishes to Leeds and to the residents of Leeds. I also know that all Members of Congress of both parties wish to pay their respects to Leeds on the one-hundredth anniversary of the naming of the village.

Our Sins Find Us Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted by the House, I am including an editorial from the Wichita Eagle, Wichita, Kans. It is entitled "Our Sins Find Us Out." The author of this editorial sets forth the facts quite pointedly. The editorial follows:

OUR SINS FIND US OUT

The situation in which this Nation now finds itself as regards possible war with Russia did not come about overnight. It began with the fall of Berlin, when American troops who had fought their bloody way across the Rhine were forced to wait days until the Russians came up from a distance to march triumphantly through the streets of a city conquered almost entirely by American forces. In the shameful negotiations which followed the United States was permitted to take over a part of Berlin entirely surrounded by Russia, and so decidedly under Red control they can even shut off our electricity.

In Austria we continue to play a bad second fiddle to Russia, and that country continues to be a staging area for Communist activities. In the name of a peace settlement Korea was divided into two areas, separated by a mythical line known as the thirty-eighth parallel. As usual our state and military representatives permitted Russia to take over the relatively prosperous industrial northern sector, while we now are forced to defend the muddy tip of the peninsula.

Russia has ample reasons for feeling superior to America because we have bowed to the Reds in every transaction since the last war. They have been petted and nursed in the United Nations, where they have been able to block any move in behalf of peace. Now they hold all the important bases in Asia, making possible an invasion of Japan, which may be their next move. Then we'll have only the Hawaiian Islands and our own West coast between us and actual invasion.

Hawaii Molds a Constitution and a Lever for Obtaining Statehood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Hawaii Molds a Constitution and a Lever for Obtaining Statehood," written by Harold S. Roberts and published in the Christian Science Monitor of August 7, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAWAII MOLDS A CONSTITUTION AND A LEVER FOR OBTAINING STATEHOOD—DOCUMENT GLITTERS IN RESOURCEFULNESS—EVEN TONE UNDERLINED

(Although the outcome of this year's endeavor by the Territory of Hawaii to achieve statehood is, in the words of an informed Washington correspondent, still "just a toss-up" in Congress, the people of Hawaii are proving their resourcefulness. If one door is closed to statehood, they will knock at another, with a parchment in hand that should turn out to be a key as well. That parchment contains the new Constitution of the State of Hawaii. If the present Enabling Act should be lost in a congressional rush for adjournment, the people of Hawaii will be ready to return to Congress next winter, submit their State constitution, ask its acceptance, and upon granting thereof, thereby attain statehood. Fifteen States already have used this process to gain admission to the Union. The story of Hawaii's constitutional convention, as told by one of the delegates, follows.)

(By Harold S. Roberts, dean of the College of Business Administration, University of Hawaii)

Hawaii has on 16 different occasions petitioned the Congress to grant statehood. Unlike other Territories which have been permitted to come into the Union, beginning with the Northwest Territory in 1787, Hawaii has more than met the qualifications for statehood.

On 37 different occasions since 1920, bills have been introduced in successive sessions of Congress to provide statehood. In the past 15 years there have been nine separate hearings held by congressional committees on the question of statehood for Hawaii.

The Congress has more information and statistical data on Hawaii than on any other Territory previously admitted to the Union. Despite the record, Hawaii is still seeking equality with other States.

The most recent attempt to obtain statehood began by the introduction of an enabling statute by Delegate JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON on January 3, 1950. Hawaii has one Delegate to Congress, but without vote. This bill passed the House on March 7, 1950, by a vote of 262 to 110. On July 12, the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee by a vote of 9 to 1, recommended statehood. Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, cast the only negative vote.

ANOTHER AVENUE TRIED

While this bill was going through the congressional mill, the Territorial legislature passed a bill to try another avenue for achieving statehood, should the enabling act procedure fail.

Some 15 States have been admitted to the Union by the alternative procedure of drafting a State constitution and going to Congress, knocking on the door, and asking to be admitted. At the present time, Hawaii is launching its campaign for statehood in a two-pronged offensive. The people of the Territory desire to come into the Union as a sovereign State on an equal footing with 35 other Territories previously admitted to statehood.

On Saturday, July 22, 61 delegates affixed their signatures to a historic document—the Constitution of the State of Hawaii. The ceremony took place in the throne room at historic Iolani Palace, Honolulu. There was a touch of deep solemnity, offset by the bright Hawaiian flowers and the changing strains of island music. The ceremony ended with the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner.

The new document is a product of Hawaii and its people. It reflects the thinking of an essentially conservative community, but one that is responsive to changing times and needs. The constitution has borrowed and adapted provisions from the Federal Constitution, the Hawaii Organic Act, the model State constitution, and the constitutions of the other States.

DIFFERENT PRODUCT

Although it has studied and tapped all of the available resources, the final product is unlike that of any other State. It has its own flavor and features which find roots in the problems and needs of the community. Typical of these are the provisions dealing with Hawaiian homelands, the limitations of bonded indebtedness, and the use of assessed land valuations to adjust these limits; and the sections dealing with local government, drafted in the light of a centralized tax structure and a coordinated and centralized system of public education.

The basic conservatism of the constitution is reflected in the limited number of elective officials. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor are the only elected officials. The cabinet members and the judges of the courts are appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the senate. The members of the board of education are to be appointed by the Governor, from panels nominated by the counties. There is no provision for the initiative, referendum, and recall—so popular during the first two decades of the century.

VOTING AGE REDUCED

Although fundamentally conservative, the constitution does contain many progressive features which reflect the forward-looking character of the community. The new constitution provides for the reduction in the voting age from 21 to 20. Only one other State in the Union has a voting age of less than 21. A provision recognizing the right to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining, as a constitutional guaranty, has been included. Only three other State constitutions, Missouri, New Jersey, and New York, provide such constitutional guaranties.

Many features of the document reflect the best current thinking in the field of government. For example, the executive departments of government in the new State are to be coordinated in no more than 20 major departments, to permit the Governor to keep a personal check on the functioning of the executive branch. There are provisions to eliminate the pocket veto. The salaries of the Governor, the judges, and members of the legislature have been increased to attract the best qualified men to office. The salaries compare favorably with the highest 10 States of the Union.

Provision is made for post-audits of State expenditures, as well as a requirement that the legislature pass the general appropriations bill before passing other finance bills. This may prevent the last-minute rush so typical of many legislative sessions, which makes it difficult to give careful scrutiny to final drafts of bills and leads to political log rolling and deals.

HEAVY VOTER TURN-OUT

In many other respects recognition is given to practices which are conducive to good government; Hawaii is conscious, however, that good government is more a product of the people of the community than of the written document which forms its base.

The 63 delegates, elected by the people at primary and general elections last February 11 and March 21, began their official task on April 4. Although the campaign was run on a nonpartisan basis (there were no party designations on the ballot), there was a heavy turn-out of voters. In excess of 80 percent of the registered voters cast their ballots. Of those elected, approximately one-third had never run for an elective office before.

For many of the delegates it will be their one and only campaign. These men and women were attracted by the nature of the job to be done. Writing a constitution for a new State comes but once in a lifetime. On the other hand, some of the newcomers may well try their wings in the political arena. No American community can overlook new blood for its political melting pot. Federal, State, and local government must continue to attract the best from all segments of the community.

The delegates, elected from all parts of the Territory, represented a broad cross section of the community. Among the 63 delegates were two pineapple company presidents, two union representatives, a judge of the circuit court, two former attorney generals, a member of the Board of Regents of the University of Hawaii, the superintendent of public instruction, one physician, two dentists, the speaker and vice speaker of the Territorial House of Representatives, four members of the Territorial Senate, a number of school teachers, and others. Of the five women who won seats, two are attorneys, two are housewives, and one is a member of the Territorial Legislature.

Racially, the convention contained 27 Caucasians, 20 Japanese-Americans, 11 Hawaiians, and five Chinese-Americans; generally representative of the population. Politically, there were 29 Republicans, 21 Democrats, and 13 nonpartisans.

PROVISION FOR ELECTION

Should the Congress pass the enabling act in its present form, the constitution could be submitted to the people for ratification at the general elections in November. H. R. 49 provides that an election be held within 60 to 120 days after the passage of the enabling act. If the constitution is ratified by the people, it will be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Congress for approval. If Congress approves the ratified constitution, the people will then proceed to elect the State officers and two United States Senators and Members to the House of Representatives. Should the voters or the Congress fail to ratify the constitution, the delegates to the 1950 convention will have to reconvene to draft another constitution that will meet the objections of the Congress or those of the people.

Should the Congress fail to pass H. R. 49, the Constitution will be submitted to the next session of the Territorial Legislature. The legislature may not change the constitution. It may, however, draft an alternative. The people will then have the choice of voting for the constitution drafted by the delegates elected by them, the one drafted by the legislature, if any, or neither. If the people reject the Constitution, the convention has to reconvene to draft a new document. If the people approve the document, it will be submitted to the Congress with a request for direct admission into the Union.

HAWAII AT DOOR

In the meantime, Hawaii knocks at the door for statehood. It alone of the territories that have shown their ability for democratic self-government, the ability to finance their own operations and to support our free institutions, has been denied equality of rights with the other States. Unlike Puerto Rico, which elects its own governor and pays no Federal taxes to the United States, Hawaii, which was a free republic when it entered into a mutual agreement with the United States in 1900 and has paid in over $1,000,000,000 in taxes to the Federal Government and paid close to $90,000,000 in 1949, is denied the right to elect its own governor, has no voting representation in Congress, and is denied the right to vote for the President of the United States.

If taxation without representation was tyranny in the middle of the eighteenth century, it is no less so in the middle of the twentieth.

Hawaii, the meeting place of the cultures of the east and west, a dynamic outpost of democracy in the Pacific, waits impatiently for recognition of more than a half century of democratic progress. It is ready and willing to assume its responsibility in the new Pacific era. Admission of Hawaii into the Union now would, in the words of the Senate committee, "give notice to all the world, and particularly to the peoples of the Pacific at this critical juncture of international affairs, that it is the policy of the United States to provide self-government among all the peoples without political, economic, racial or other distinction."

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

Both major parties have, in the past 10 years, included statehood for Hawaii in their platforms. Hawaiians say it is high time to transform these promises into political realities.

The constitutional convention was democracy in action. The delegates convened on April 4, adopted rules of procedure, elected officers, set up 20 working committees, and began their deliberations. Members indicated their preference for committee assignments on the basis of interest and special technical qualifications. The committees ranged in size from 5 to 15 members; they studied all of the proposals introduced by the individual delegates; invited experts in the special fields under consideration, and held public hearings.

Unlike many political conventions, and for that matter different from the convention which drafted our own Federal Constitution, all of the committee meetings were open to the public, press, and radio. A weekly report was prepared by the committee on submission and information which was distributed to many community groups, which in turn made copies available to constituent members. Four radio stations provided time during the week for summaries of the work of the convention. The press provided good daily coverage.

REPORT SUBMITTED

As each committee completed its deliberations, it submitted a detailed report setting forth the scope and character of the problem before it and the results of its work. At the conclusion of each report was a proposal which contained the specific language recommended by the committee for incorporation in the proposed constitution. Copies were duplicated for all the delegates, the press, and community groups which desired them. These standing committees' reports were then placed on the calendar for full consideration and debate.

To provide the maximum flexibility and informality of discussion, most of the debate on the reports was held in committee of the whole. Through full and free discussion (completely open to the press and public), by amendments and suggestions from the floor, the committee proposals and recommendations were dissected, paragraph by paragraph, sentence by sentence, and occasionally word by word.

Unlike the deliberations of many legislative bodies, proposals underwent substantial modification on the floor. The debates were frequently intense, sometimes acrimonious. On the whole, however, the discussions were on a high plane, directed toward the basic issues under consideration. One rather unusual feature of the deliberations, and a tribute to the delegates, lies in the fact that at no time was it necessary to place a limitation on debate. The rules made ample provision for such limitation, but they were never put to use.

Ample time was provided to give each of the respective chairmen of the committee of the whole to prepare his report and recommendation, which was then presented to the delegates for adoption. The reports and proposals so approved were then sent to the committee on style for arrangement and form. The style committee was under specific instruction to confine its work to form and style and was prohibited from making any change of a substantive character. It could, and did, however, call attention to discrepancies, omissions, or conflict, and report to the convention for further instructions or action.

SEQUENCE GIVEN

The style committee then resubmitted each of the articles to the convention for approval and adoption on form and style. The articles were again sent to the style committee for final arrangement and review of all of the sections into an integrated and cohesive document. As finally adopted, the provisions of the constitution are arranged in the following sequence:

Preamble.
Adoption of Federal Constitution.
Article 1: Bill of rights.
Article 2: Suffrage and elections.
Article 3: The legislature.
Article 4: The executive.
Article 5: The judiciary.
Article 6: Taxation and finance.
Article 7: Local government.
Article 8: Public health and welfare.
Article 9: Education.
Article 10: Development and conservation of resources.
Article 11: Hawaiian home lands.
Article 12: Organization, collective bargaining.
Article 13: State boundaries, capital, flag.
Article 14: General and miscellaneous provisions.
Article 15: Revisions and amendments.
Article 16—Schedule:
(a) Representative districts.
(b) Transitional laws.
(c) First officers, election procedures.

ONE-HUNDRED-AND-TEN-DAY CONVENTION

The convention lasted 110 calendar days. Actually there were 78 days devoted to plenary sessions. At other times there were committee meetings, hearings, and preparation of committee reports. During the preliminary period of committee work there were, on the average 20 to 30 meetings each week occupying in excess of 40 hours of work.

No verbatim transcript was kept of the deliberations of the standing committees. Each committee did keep a brief summary in the form of minutes, and these were available to the other delegates. These minutes will also be part of the record to be kept in the archives with other official documents.

The convention did keep a complete verbatim transcript by means of electronic tape recordings of all the session after April 9. Over 365 reels of recording tape were used, or about 87 miles of recording tape. It has been estimated that approximately 5,000,000 words were spoken during the floor debates. Only 14,000, however, found a place in the constitution. Of these, approximately 4,000 are in the schedule which describes the political districts to be used in the initial elections and for subsequent reapportionment every 10 years.

Social Security Combats Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak in favor of expanding and liberalizing the provisions and benefits of our present social security law, because I have steadily fought for this objective since becoming a Member of Congress.

The ever-rising living costs in America impose a real obligation upon us to increase social-security payments. To preserve our economy and national welfare it is mandatory that we provide for the inclusion of those millions of our citizens who are at this moment ineligible to receive social-security benefits.

I support this bill in substance because I am among those who earnestly feel it is the responsibility of the Government to aid the men and women who have spent a lifetime in the development of this great Nation. It is practical wisdom, in the encouragement of a high national morale, for the Government to reasonably insure these worthy workers are not left, in the sunset of life, facing desperation and want. Such governmental action involves no change in our democratic processes or objectives. Surely this great and mighty economy of America, which virtually challenges the human imaginatioh in its productive capacity and gigantic income of over $225,000,000,000 annually, is able to set up guarantics against hardship and privation and fear for those who have made such consistent contributions to its effectiveness, strength, vitality, and success.

In my firm judgment, adequate social-security legislation is a sound barrier against the advancing scourge of communistic propaganda and philosophy which is challenging us this very hour and is forcing us to fight for our very survival. How much stronger, how much more resistant to Communist intrigue and entreatment our Nation will be when its citizens are assured that our great business system and our Government, working harmoniously together, have established a dignified, humane way to make them eligible for that which every loyal citizen of this great democracy is entitled to receive, namely, security in time of adversity and need. Because this measure is founded upon humane, progressive principles calculated to strengthen our democratic free-enterprise system, I am supporting it.

Before I have the privilege and pleasure of casting my vote, I earnestly hope the Knowland amendment will be removed. This amendment proposal was placed in the bill on the floor of the other legislative division of Congress. It was hardly accorded 10 minutes of debate upon the floor of that other body, and I do not think there is any Member who has had the time to assess the full meaning and import of the procedural changes in the law that would be made necesary by the Knowland amendment. This amendment would destroy the Federal minimum requirements in a program which has been created by Federal legislation and which is operated by Federal legislation. It would impair State and Federal cooperation with reference to the unemployment-insurance program.

In essence it would open the door for the creation and confusion of 51 unemployment insurance programs by the States which would thereby become the controlling factor with reference to the Federal Government. At a time when it is vitally necessary to have fair and peaceful industrial relations for all-out production for national defense and essential goods and services, the inclusion of this amendment threatens disaster.

Moreover, subcommittees in the House and Senate are scheduled to shortly begin the study of the whole question of unemployment compensation insurance and it would be only practical wisdom to wait until we have authoritative information on the subject, provided by these committees.

It is true the measure we are now considering is a substantial improvement on existing law. Nevertheless, I cannot let this opportunity pass to remind you it is the first comprehensive change proposed in the social-security law, since its enactment in 1935. With the accelerated development in modern economy and accompanying complications, I should like to point out the commonsense observation that even this legislation will have to be revised in the near future.

The figures show us that the number of older citizens among us is steadily growing and there is no doubt that our outlays on social security will become increasingly great in the years ahead.

This social-security legislation we are acting upon today is good, but the debate has clearly shown the whole system should be reviewed and revised. Our social-security system has been operating without any over-all review or change for the past 15 years. I most seriously recommend that standing committees be set up to conduct a searching inquiry of the social-security problems with the objective of effecting basic administrative and financing improvements in the operating procedure we now have.

The Bipartisan Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on Tuesday, August 15, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] delivered a speech on the subject of our so-called bipartisan foreign policy, which I think will be of interest to all Members of the Senate. The speech was delivered before the Rotary Club of Indianapolis. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Indianapolis Rotary Club and guests, the American people are now beginning to realize that the eruption of war in Korea has finally exposed the frightful bankruptcy of our so-called bipartisan foreign policy.

And across this Nation today, our fellow-Americans are demanding to know what has happened to all the slogans, panaceas and promises of peace—what is now at stake in the Korean crisis, and where we are going from here?

Surely, if ever the American people needed to be told the truth and to be taken into the confidence of their Government, now is the time.

Yet, from the very moment the Korean war broke out, the American people and their elected representatives in both Houses of Congress have been groping around in the dark in their efforts to find an answer to these vital questions.

Meanwhile, the dangers we confront and the disasters that are in the making are growing graver by the hour. This is why I want to talk with you frankly, as a fellow Indianan and fellow American, about the significance of the outbreak of the war in Korea.

Frankly, America is now caught in a grim struggle for sheer survival and the crisis confronting us is far too grave for any one of us to seek personal or political gain.

The facts behind this crisis are so shocking they have rendered party affiliations meaningless. For reality is no respecter of partisan politics.

I ask you, how are we going to get at the facts if we permit ourselves to be browbeaten, bribed or blackmailed into silence, in the face of determined efforts to cover them up? At this very moment the same bungling policy makers who got us into this mess are crying "don't play politics with the Korean war," and have now issued a public statement claiming that isolationists must shoulder the responsibility for the Communist attack on South Korea.

On July 20, 1950, the State Department put out an official white paper, whitewashing the past by saying nothing whatever about the documentary evidence of events and decisions leading up to the Korean war.

On July 23, 1950, Mr. James Reston wrote in the New York Times—and I quote, "Nobody outside of the top level of the executive branch of Government has access to the only papers that would really tell how we got committed in Korea and how we decided to pull our troops out of there without deciding what we would do if the North Koreans attacked."

In the July 26, 1950, issue of the United States News we were told the chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Senate is anxious to bottle up a few Senators who might be too inquisitive about the war, and the manner in which it is run.

So instead of telling the American people the truth, those responsible for the debacle have dragged out the old propaganda line again, calling for unity.

This line is reflected in a recent broadcast by my colleague, Senator LUCAS, of Illinois, in which he said, "only one thing could give the Communists in Asia and Europe renewed hope for victory over our brave fighting men—that would be the rise of disunity here in America."

And we further realize how the facts have been withheld when we also read in the same article by James Reston, to which I have referred: "For years official Washington built up the Soviet Union and Nationalist China, concealed and distorted the true facts of life in those countries, and condemned reports to the contrary as detrimental material that gave aid and comfort to the enemy * * *, but reporters who publish the facts in this case are still getting the same old line that such articles are not helpful—that they give aid and comfort to the Russians."

In other words, every statement of fact and honest criticism of this Korean crisis is being smeared as "giving aid and comfort to the Russians," no matter how dangerous or suicidal these policies may be so far as the future of America is concerned.

Even such a stanch defender of our bipartisan foreign policy as Marquis Childs has been forced to admit in the Washington Post of July 18, 1950, that: "Certainly the American people are entitled to a frank and complete statement of where we are and how we got there, and where we go from here. In any survey of the tragic deficiencies of the past year or more, almost none ranks higher than the deficiency of information."

This is nothing but a repetition on a more fantastic scale, of the very same type and technique of propaganda and smear which helped to produce the present desperate world situation.

I am absolutely convinced it would now be a criminal disservice to America for anyone to line up in blind support of a repetition in the future, on a larger scale, of the disastrous blunders and betrayals of the past.

Certainly we now need a united American people, but we must unite in a common cause to save America. And I see no way in which we could do this unless we can unite behind the truth of what has happened, and an intelligent understanding of what is now at stake.

Since we continue to be denied the facts we are forced to piece the Korean puzzle together ourselves, and while some of the details may be lacking—here, in the broad outline, is the picture we will get.

On June 25, 1950, the North Korean Communist army broke across the thirty-eighth parallel and headed south. And as the following facts will show, this successful surprise attack was a more complete and overwhelming defeat than Pearl Harbor. Those responsible for safeguarding our vital interests and security, both in the Orient and Washington, were caught flat-footed—or so they would have us believe, although they were in complete possession of the following information.

These men to whom I have referred, knew they had engineered the sell-out of China and Manchuria at Yalta. They knew they had also carved Korea in two at the thirty-eighth parallel, thus leaving South Korea economically unable to support itself, politically divided and militarily undefendable. And they knew these sell-outs were made at a time when Japan had already offered to surrender.

They knew of Russia's intentions from the outset. For from the very beginning, Russia refused to let the economic barriers down between North and South Korea, refused even to ship coal south from the North Korean coal mines and forced us for the first time in history, to export coal from Japan to South Korea to keep our own American troops from freezing to death.

They knew of the military intentions of Russia, for they had been in possession of a confidential report by Edwin C. Pauley, the President's personal adviser, that was sent to Mr. Truman in 1946, warning that at that time, the Soviet Union was a deliberate aggressor.

As far back as November 24, 1947, 12 former Ambassadors of the United States jointly telegraphed the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, warning of Russia's intentions in the Far East and pointing out how grave a threat to our own security these intentions were becoming.

These men were in possession of the reports of the United Nations Commission on Korea which, for over 2 years, has known of Russia's political intentions, since Stalin would never permit the holding of over-all Korean elections by this Commission.

They were in possession of ECA reports on conditions in Korea; of a long series of reports by Ambassador Muccio; of a whole file of secret reports from General MacArthur, who had been completely divorced from any jurisdiction over the Korean situation.

They had been in possession of reports by Ambassador at Large Phillip Jessup, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Mr. John Foster Dulles.

They were in possession of the secret reports of the Central Intelligence Agency, under command of Admiral Hillenkoetter, who has testified before a Senate committee that these reports have been warning of an unexpected attack by North Korea for over a year.

These American intelligence reports contained the information that the North Korean Communist Army included more than 100,000 men, at least one regiment of tanks and between 50 and 100 planes, and also advised of the build-up of the Army strength starting in January 1950.

These men also had turned down a request from President Rhee, of South Korea, more than 7 months before the invasion, calling for arms against a threatened attack.

But this is not the whole story, for in the face of these facts, and in the face of these warnings, the State Department had been following the pro-Communist Acheson-Jessup-Lattimore-Service-Amerasia line in the Far East which had written off China, Manchuria, and Formosa as late as December 1949.

So far as Korea was concerned, right up to the outbreak of the war, the State Department had been following Owen Lattimore's advice in which he urged us to "let Korea fall but not to make it look as if we pushed it."

Why even Mr. John Foster Dulles recently admitted to a group of Senators that the State Department Far Eastern Division has been run by a group advocating "that a good dose of communism would be good for the Orient."

And now that the Communists have been turned loose in the Orient, none other than Owen Lattimore, himself, just one week ago, urged the United States to seat the Communist China delegation in the United Nations since it is imperative that the spread of communism be checked in Asia.

This situation would be tragic enough, in itself. Yet to make bad matters worse, the Korean crisis is being used to maneuver us into a position where we are now being committed to financial, economic, and military action in every nook and cranny of the world.

Korea has now become the symbol of a fantastic foreign policy which now confronts us with similar commitments in a hundred other Korean debacles which are in the making all around the borders of Russia's iron curtain.

But the most frightening fact of all is that so far as the basic policies are concerned, nothing has really changed, except that American GI's are fighting and dying in Korea.

The same economic absurdity, the same financial insanity, and the same military lunacy which dictated our bipartisan foreign policy up until the Korean conflict are still in operation, and we are being asked to surrender blanket powers to control our economic, industrial, and social system, and turn our pocketbooks inside out to enlarge and extend the suicidal pattern of these follies, both at home and abroad.

The records show that those who were willing to flaunt the lessons of history, in engineering the sell-out of the Orient, are determined to continue pushing us down the road we are traveling, both on the domestic and international scene, even though the signposts of history warn that this road has destroyed every other free people who have tried it.

Indeed, there are many who feel that we have been following this road so long and have gotten ourselves in so deep, there is no alternative—that we just have to continue going the way we were going, and that we will be damned if we do, and we will be damned if we don't.

For myself, it would be fatal to our future as a free people, if this growing feeling of despair should prevail, for we can be absolutely certain just where this road is taking us.

First, the Korean crisis has proved that for the past 18 years, our destiny has been in the hands of men who are either traitors, or such political fanatics, that, with the sincerest of intentions, they have been tearing up by the roots, the basic American principles which have safeguarded the dignity of our free institutions, and thrown them on the ash heap of lost civilizations.

For the record clearly shows that the powers which the President is now requesting to back up his global Korean policy, are the very same powers which these self-appointed saviors have been demanding we surrender into their hands so they could remake our form of government, our economic system, and our social structure, both from within and from without.

We now have only ourselves to blame if we fail to realize that these hand-out fanatics have been insisting through depression and prosperity, through good times and bad, through war and peace, that these are the powers they had to have for the remaking of America.

The record clearly shows, throughout a whole generation, certain groups have been attempting to saddle on us permanently, even in peacetime, a perpetual wartime economy with its government by crisis, government by control, government by decree, government by regimentation, and government by deficit financing which would destroy America as we have known this beloved land of ours. And this strategy of boring from within, developed to the point where, just before the Korean outbreak, Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson were engaged in a political horse race, trying to give America away.

On the domestic scene Mr. Truman's welfare state program, the Brannan plan, socialized medicine, the Spence bill, and the rest, which he had promised the American people, had grown until it would have cost us $67,000,000,000 annually to buy the votes necessary to keep him in power.

And on the international scene Mr. Acheson had underwritten 27 foreign hand-out programs which cost us thirty-five billions in our attempt to buy our allies. So that our bipartisan foreign policy now turns out to be nothing but the extension on the international scene, of the hand-out philosophy at home. They are part and parcel of each other, and they are leading us further and further down the road to a bankrupt dictatorship at home, dominated and controlled by an international semi-super-state abroad.

And now Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson want the powers to finish the job. They are determined to set Mr. Truman up as a global policeman and a global warlord, who can make and break international agreements and commitments at will, without being accountable to anyone; and as an economic czar and financial dictator who can take what he wants of our manpower and resources to back up these commitments; who can turn our Armed Forces into a permanent foreign legion, to defend everyone else's interest but our own, and who can force the American people to finance this global goose chase and put them on a ration system for what is left.

This is exactly the direction in which we are moving and it means if we surrender these powers—we shall surrender them forever.

There is a second reason why we can be sure of what lies in store for us if we continue down the road we are traveling. That reason is, the staggering defeat that has been inflicted on the American people by the outrageous betrayals of our interests, in the secret conferences of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

These betrayals paralyzed the European and Asiatic economies, reduced the nations on this side of the iron curtain to permanent bankrupt wards of the United States, transplanted power politics between big nations, to a struggle between right and left between every nation under the sun, destroyed Germany and Japan, the only two nations capable of resisting the threat of Communist military might, and left us holding the bag.

This defeat has been so disastrous that every program we have undertaken to undo the damage has also played directly into Stalin's hands. Stalin is determined to force America to spend herself into bankruptcy trying to undo these mistakes that cannot be undone.

Our resources have been strained already to the breaking point in this attempt to correct the tragic blunders that have been made, but we need no imagination to understand how suicidal the consequences will be if we now take the lid off and start pouring what is left of our resources and our wealth into sinkholes of Europe and Asia, in our last-ditch attempt to do the impossible.

America cannot underwrite the economic, financial, social, political, and military needs and defenses of the whole anti-Soviet world without destroying herself.

And, so far as I am concerned, there are some mistakes in history which cannot be corrected. I am more interested in saving America than I am of saving face.

Those in control of our Government during the tragic years have deliberately torn the world in two and handed one-half of it on a silver platter to Russia. Now, I do not intend to help them destroy America, trying to salvage what is left of the half they did not give away.

I still believe that foreign policy, to make any sense, should be only an outward expression of our own internal needs and interests. And that war itself can only be justified, if ever, as an attempt to achieve these objectives by armed might.

That is why I have been trying to arouse the American people to the futility of the course we are following, and to the desperate need for a day of reckoning. America now desperately needs a redefinition of what constitutes the legitimate and vital areas of interest and security; areas the protection of which are necessary to our national survival as a free people, areas which can be defended within the framework of constitutional government and which are within our economic, financial, social, and military means to defend.

Uncle Sam has been forced to stand on his head in too many places at the same time, all around the world, and certainly the world looks different when you are standing on your head.

As a result, as of this very moment, there is a cry for the surrender of powers and a call for God knows how many additional billions, not for the purpose of defending these United States and our own vital and legitimate interests, but, instead, for the purpose of launching an all-out crusade of a global goose chase against communism everywhere else except in Washington.

Incredible as it may seem at this very moment, your Government has no plans which state the minimum requirements for the impregnable national defense of the continental United States. At this very moment Canada still does not know how it can contribute to the defense of the Western Hemisphere, except that it will get 10 percent of our new war contracts. South America is in the same boat, and, of course, you know Alaska has 7,500 men standing between it and Russia, 50 miles away.

We do not even have an American policy for the Pacific, none for the Middle and Near East, and plans for the so-called North Atlantic Pact are not even in the blueprint stage.

And so far as our allies are concerned, sure, England and France both have advised us they will fight to the last American dollar and the last American man.

For us to continue to surrender more powers and endless billions into the hands of men who say they are going to save the world, when they have not yet made up their minds what is necessary to the defense of these United States, is an open invitation to suicide.

We are caught in a grim struggle for sheer survival and the time has come to put Uncle Sam back on his feet, to draw a line which we can defend as a free people: to extend the Monroe Doctrine to cover it; to encourage federation of nations in Europe and Asia, to organize for their own mutual defense; and give priority to our own defense requirements in the allocation of our raw materials, manpower, and war material.

Then let us put an end to the senseless policy of building up Russia behind the iron curtain by secret trade pacts, by subsidizing their production and exportation of gold, by feeding dollars into their state-controlled trade monopolies behind the iron curtain, by continuing to destroy the economic, industrial strength of western Germany, by continuing to leave the initiative in the hands of Stalin, who can light the fuze, raise the ante, and pull the strings in new outbreaks of civil and guerrilla warfare around the world, and force us to squander our substance, piecemeal, around the four corners of the globe, trying to stop the spreading outer rim of the Communist cancer, while the very core of it feeds and grows on its spoils of war, in serene security in Moscow.

It may be too late, but I still believe the American people, when they get the facts and when they understand the alternatives before us, will yet unite in such a common cause as this, to defend America, in their determination to keep America sound, strong, and free.

A Nonpartisan Judiciary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have commented on many previous occasions on the vital issue of restoring the balance of appointments between the two major political parties on the Nation's judiciary. I do not want at the present time to take the valuable time of the Senate floor for a further discussion of this issue. However, I ask unanimous consent there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a supplementary statement which I have prepared on this problem, as well as an editorial which was carried in the Tuesday, August 15, 1950, issue of the Chicago Daily News.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NONPARTISAN JUDICIARY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the editorial to which I have referred begins with the paragraph:

"Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, Wisconsin, has made a suggestion to President Truman so sensible it is almost sure to be rejected."

I appreciate the compliment which this great newspaper has paid to me. It has one of the finest editorial pages of the country, and I say that very sincerely and wholly aside from consideration of this particular editorial. I am afraid, however, that judging from past experiences this suggestion for a balanced judiciary which I do indeed feel to be sensible, will be rejected. Certainly President Truman's flippant reply to my letter to him suggests that the President still is committed to a policy of "to the victor belongs the spoils."

It is indeed a shocking condition that in 17 years, a mere 8 of 192 Federal judicial appointments should have been Republicans while 184 were Democrats. Continuation of this policy is outrageous amidst the present grave war situation. It is an absolute farce that the Democratic administration asks bipartisan unity in the field of foreign policy and yet makes such a mockery of a field almost as important, namely, the Federal courts. Every time one of us Republicans gets up to ask for more equality in appointments to the judiciary, the Democrats start to sneer, "Oh, that is simply a Republican partisan appeal." It does not occur to these Democrats that their own actions are the most partisan of all.

I speak for a balanced judiciary, not because I am a Republican, but because I am an American, because I am a United States Senator, because I am a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, because I am an attorney and a former district attorney. I know that the members of the American bar, regardless of their political appointments, feel that the Truman and Roosevelt administration's unbalanced appointments have dealt a severe blow to the integrity of our entire judicial system.

Not so many years ago, the American people were thrilled when Members of Congress rejected the infamous Court-packing scheme. But the Court-packing attempt of the 1930's was as child's play compared to the continuous court packing which has been carried on for 17 years. Never before has the Nation's judiciary been more important. Never before has it been called upon to act in so many critical cases. Never before has it been more important that the President make at least a gesture toward our Nation's unity.

AN APPEAL FOR GOP APPOINTMENTS AS IN ILLINOIS

I appeal to responsible elements in the Democratic Party to recognize their obligation and to urge the President that in the pending judicial appointments such as for vacancies in Illinois, qualified Republican jurists receive fair consideration.

During the Republican Eightieth Congress, when I was chairman of the Judiciary Committee, we had the potential votes in the Senate to prevent action on any single judicial nomination. If we Republicans had intended to act partisan, we could have halted the entire confirmation procedure. Instead, we chose to continue confirming Democratic jurists who had received recommendation of the American bar. We appealed time and again, we waited patiently for the President to change his policy, but the President refused to do so.

ALL AMERICA IS OUTRAGED AGAINST COURT PACKING

The Democratic National Committee felt then, as it apparently feels now, that they could get away with anything, that they could keep on packing the judiciary without ever having the Congress rise in righteous wrath against this shocking procedure. I warn the Democratic National Committee, however, and I warn the partisan zealots of the Democratic Party that it is not just we Republicans that are outraged by this court packing; it is the American people as a whole.

In November 1948 21,970,000 Americans voted for the Republican ticket. According to the Democratic National Committee, apparently, the judicial rights of those Americans don't seem to count. I believe, however, that they do count, and I believe that most of the 24,000,000 Americans who voted Democratic are fair enough to recognize the need for a more balanced judiciary.

[From the Chicago Daily News of August 15, 1950]

AS WE SEE IT

FOR NONPARTISAN JUDICIARY

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican of Wisconsin, has made a suggestion to President Truman so sensible it is almost sure to be rejected.

The Senator proposes that the President appoint some outstanding Republican judges or lawyers to the vacancies on the Federal bench. This, he contends, would strongly reinforce the nonpartisan character that the judiciary ought to have.

During the recent hearings on the appointment of Sherman Minton to the Supreme Court, it was brought out that of 192 Federal judges appointed from 1933 onward, all but 8 have been Democrats.

There are three judicial appointments to be made in Illinois. At the suggestion of Senator LUCAS some months ago, President Truman did promote a Republican, Judge Walter C. Lindley, from the district court to the court of appeals. This promotion, however, did not add anything net to the minority party's representation on the Federal bench.

In the months ahead, President Truman is going to make many appeals for bipartisan support. He could earn some by a more nonpartisan treatment of the judiciary.

What Price Efficiency—We're Not So Hot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 17, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement by the American Taxpayers Association:

WHAT PRICE EFFICIENCY—WE'RE NOT SO HOT

The stopgap tax bill will be whipped in shape by the Senate Finance Committee within the next few days. It will call for $5,000,000,000 additional taxes. Keep this figure in mind, we will refer to it again.

Remember, also, we have had wartime—not peacetime—taxes for the past 5 years. We have continued on a war-tax basis during the cold war. Excise war taxes have never even been reduced. Personal income and corporation taxes have remained at high levels. Payroll taxes still flow into th Treasury. Now we are told that new war taxes must be added to the war taxes already in effect.

The President has asked Congress for new appropriations totaling nearly $16,000,000,000. Of this sum, $4,000,000,000, in addition to a billion and a quarter already voted, is to help other non-Communist nations arm.

Yes, neither the President nor his advisers have a program and can't even say why they ask for $4,000,000,000 instead of some other sum. This Government has no commitment from any nation as to how the money will be used. It has no commitment that these nations will expand their armed forces or how far they will go in making arms. It has no commitment that we will have bases in any other country. Administration spokesmen say, further, they expect no such commitments. They don't know how much more will be needed, but say that $4,000,000,000—and probably much more—will be needed yearly through 1952, maybe much longer. If foreign countries, after receiving these huge sums, do not perform as expected, administration spokesmen say the United States will have to do them. A pretty picture!

We don't know—and nobody knows—how much the Korean police patrol will cost, or what will come after. We do know—and common sense dictates—that the Government's billions of nonsecurity expenditures should be cut back drastically. Not a single person will begrudge a single penny to give our fighting forces what they must have. That is understood without saying. But the time has come when Congress should know the specific purposes for which it appropriates money and see to it that the money is spent for that purpose.

TIME FOR SANITY

Washington officialdom is utterly confused. Jitters approaching hysteria are observable in every congressional action. Congress is panicky in its feverish haste to grant powers and make additional appropriations far in excess of those actually requested—and the latter by no means are modest.

Here is a sample of the hysteria: A few days ago the House permitted just 30 seconds each for discussion of 16 important amendments to the proposed war-control bill. One—an excess-profits tax—was voted without reading and without a single Member except the proponent knowing what it contained. After some fast parliamentary maneuvering, the Members learned what they had voted for and promptly changed their votes.

Unfortunately, the tax increases which have been proposed so far are quite obviously designed to keep up the pretense that huge expenditures can be met by taxing corporations and the well-to-do. Some people may be fooled by this program, but they'll soon find out to their sorrow.

WHERE DID DEFENSE BILLIONS GO?

Taxpayers during the past 4 years shelled out a record $50,000,000,000 for military defense. Now, Members of Congress, high-ranking Defense officials, and committee chairmen—somewhat belatedly—are trying to find out what this huge sum purchased. The answer will be found in the United States News and World Report printed several days ago in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That report shows that two-thirds of all military spending has gone for services performed, not for weapons or supplies bought. It went for pay, travel, telephone bills, transportation, rents, pensions, and other similar items. They call it "military housekeeping."

Only $1 in $7 has been spent on arms of any kind in the past 4 years. Only $600,000,000 was spent on weapons—less than the amount spent on military travel, half the cost of shipping military freight, and barely twice the amounts spent for rent and utilities at military installations.

No big artillery guns, rifles, machine guns, or new naval guns have been purchased. New guns have been developed, but not bought. The report shows how our war strength in fighting divisions, ground and air forces, and all through the service has been decreased. If only 50 percent of the defense outlays during the past 4 years had been spent for weapons and equipment we could have purchased new postwar equipment for 100 Army divisions—more than we used in World War II—plus 100 air groups—plus 50 big aircraft carriers, twice the number in use at the peak of the last war.

How did we get in this position? Some folks are running their hands over their brows and muttering that maybe we had too many small men rattling around in big places.

The Defense Department employed 2,495 workers and spent $8,465,000 in the fiscal year ended June 30 on publicity activities to acquaint the American taxpayer with what was being done for security. Senator BRIDGES a few days ago charged that the President and Defense Secretary Johnson had misled the people by glowing statements which failed to give an accurate picture of the Nation's unpreparedness. He accused the administration of using Government funds to buy votes instead of bullets. Referring to the huge amounts appropriated for defense, Senator BRIDGES said: "The fact is we were not prepared for a show-down in Korea or anywhere else. The administration spent billions of dollars to buy surplus commodities to keep food prices high and provide other hand-outs."

We have a few thousand boys from almost every State in the Union backed into the hills of a far-away land and committed to a battle which they must win if they are not to die. Our leaders sent them there. Whether the decision and the advice which led to that decision were bad, time alone will tell. We are in this thing up to our necks, and we must see it through.

However, it has come as somewhat of a shock to learn that we are so shamefully weak when the test comes. If any doubt remained as to the need for the strictest possible economy in Government, the grim march of recent events must have removed it. This country is now committed to a policy—which has the approval of the leaders of both political parties—whose costs no one can estimate. In view of this, how can further waste and unnecessary domestic spending be countenanced?

THE PARTY IS OVER

Continued deficit spending perils our financial structure which will be further weakened by demands of war. It isn't pleasant to parade this situation before the public. Little can be accomplished by mourning or pointing with alarm. What is needed is action. Federal Government extravagances which brought about the present condition must be curbed. It must be made clear to the spendthrifts in Washington that the party is over—that the time has come to pay the fiddler and turn out the lights.

With American soldiers dying in Korea, with others being called into military service, wit war taxes about to be piled upon war taxes and civilian restrictions multiplying, the Government ought to be setting an example in economy. We are being urged to prepare for sacrifices, yet a spendthrift Government sets an example of waste and extravagance unparalleled in the face of the urgent need for economy. How absurd to say that everyone must tighten his belt and prepare for new sacrifices, except governmental agencies.

EXPENDITURES MUST BE CUT

The House did some pruning of the omnibus single-package appropriations bill carrying some $34,000,000,000. But the "spenders" in the Senate called the House efforts a dangerous "meat-ax" attack. They said the cutting must be "selective."

So a few Senators made a gallant effort at "selective" cutting. They studied the bill carefully and concluded that more than $1,000,000,000 could be eliminated from the "pork barrel" provisions. One Senator rose 68 times in the Senate and explained how the appropriations could be reduced—68 times his fellow Senators voted him down, usually with derision and without debate.

Even a proposal to cut one item $1 was shouted down. Administration spokesmen led by by Senate Leader LUCAS opposed all attempts at economy, actually restored to the bill the cuts made by the House, and in many instances increased them substantially.

FOOD PROGRAM BASED ON VOTES

The Defense Department requires large stocks of food for our Armed Forces. The Department of Agriculture already has billions of pounds of dried eggs, butter, potatoes, dried milk, and other foods purchased at a cost of many billions of dollars.

Secretary Brannan says these huge stocks of food will spoil shortly unless they can get to the cook stoves. Why not turn them over to the Defense Department? That would be too simple. Besides, it would mean the loss of many votes in the Farm Belt. So now two separate branches of the Federal Government are competing in the open market for identical foodstuffs. All the money comes from the taxpayer, as usual. Agriculture will spend more billions for food to be stored in caves until it spoils, or is destroyed, or rendered unfit for human consumption. At the same time, the Defense Department will spend more billions for the identical foodstuffs. Does it make sense to you? If that isn't "trimming" the taxpayer twice, then our arithmetic is faulty.

WHERE TO SAVE $5,000,000,000

That's the figure we mentioned before. There is nothing magic about it. It is a simple plan to save $5,000,000,000 a year now being thrown away by the Defense Department. Anybody can find the facts by merely reading the report of the Hoover Commission on Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government or by looking at hearings on H. R. 321 held in May 1949, by the Armed Services Committee.

This bill provides for a single supply catalog system for the National Military Establishment. Simple? Logical? Certainly. No sound reason has been advanced against the system and, once listed, the things needed by the fighting forces can be located promptly and moved as required for the safety and security of the United States. Yet Congress refuses to correct this ridiculous condition.

WHERE TO SAVE ANOTHER $5,000,000,000

Let's start with the 1948 budget. In that fiscal year Federal expenditures reached their postwar low and business was good. The budget was balanced. National debt was reduced. And taxes were cut.

In that year Federal expenditures for strictly domestic-civilian activities totaled $6,400,000,000. This year the President wants to spend $11,600,000,000, an increase of $5,200,000,000. If these domestic-civilian programs were merely cut back to the 1948 level the saving would be $5,200,000,000. That reduction would still leave $6,400,000,000 for such activities. A conservative estimate would indicate that probably further reductions under present circumstances would approximate another $1,000,000,000.

Most of the cuts would come from funds sought by nondefense Federal agencies for personnel, travel, transportation, communications, printing and other expenses. The other cuts would come from funds for material, supplies and manpower for rivers, harbors, navigation, flood control, reclamation, and other "pork barrel" undertakings.

We have in the above two proposals a clear saving of more than $10,000,000,000—the amount the President says must be appropriated right now. This is not dream stuff. As Senator BYRD stated recently: "Unbearable debt and taxation can destroy our solvency and if we do not reduce nondefense Federal expenditures wherever we can we shall be hastening indefensibly to the precipice of national disaster."

The Defense Department plans to hire 237,000 additional civilian employees next year. But they need not be an addition to the Federal payroll. Government departments, other than defense, now have 1,350,000 civilian employees. Congress must ruthlessly cut spending and employment by these departments on every program and activity that can be deferred or reduced and the Defense Department can fill its needs for more civilian workers by taking on those from other Federal jobs made nonessential since Korea.

Of course no agency head will voluntarily admit that his work is unimportant and his employees nonessential. But are they necessary? For example, there are more than 10,000 people employed full time gathering Government statistics. Many of them overlap; most are of questionable value. These employees can be shifted to the Defense Department. Instead, every agency is figuring how it can get a role in defense, and thus share in the extra money. Government hiring is stepping up and agencies which are not even remotely connected with any war effort are seeking additional funds.

Maybe you would like to express your views to your Congressman and your Senators. Well, why not do it?

Adequate Hospital Facilities for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written to me by John Walker Jones, chairman of the rehabilitation committee, Department of Oregon, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The letter is dated July 7, but for some reason did not reach me until the first part of this week. The letter relates to the very serious problem of providing our veterans with adequate hospital facilities. It deals with the subject matter of hearings which the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has been holding this year. I happen to be a member of that subcommittee. Mr. Jones has set forth so clearly in the letter the position I have taken as a member of the committee that I should like to have his letter made a part of the RECORD; and I should like to say that I completely endorse the recommendations Mr. Jones sets forth in the letter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Kansas City, Mo., July 7, 1950.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: With American youth fighting and dying on the Korean battle front and war clouds hovering overhead (clouds that any moment might burst forth their rain of destruction upon American cities) we believe that this is no time to argue but time for action.

In the hope that our foresight might benefit by our hindsight, may I respectfully submit the following for your careful consideration and should it meet with your approval, your perusal to the end that it may become a reality.

The Secretary of National Defense recently ordered several Armed Forces hospitals closed and declared surplus. There are no doubt others in the same category. As a precautionary measure, could these hospitals be frozen in their present status and turned over to the Veterans' Administration pending the outcome of the present emergency? Then the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs could be directed to immediately prepare plans for instant reactivation of these units as the need becomes apparent.

Such a move would have many advantages:

1. It would relieve Regular Armed Forces hospital personnel for front- or first-line duty. Permit patriotic experienced hospital personnel, who, by reason of age or partial disability, would be barred from active duty, to render emergent service in time of dire need.

2. It would assure the wounded or sick members of the Armed Forces the best in medical and hospital care immediately upon their return to the United States, without the necessity of a long and expensive hospital-building program, thereby saving untold millions of dollars, and maybe considerable precious time, yet rendering the finest service possible to those who so justly deserve it.

3. It would give the Veterans' Administration a complete record so that when discharged to a veteran status much confusion and controversy would be eliminated. It would also assure an uninterrupted treatment program which would greatly facilitate the veterans' eventual rehabilitation, for those veterans channeled through these specific hospitals.

4. In order to effectuate such a program it probably will be necessary to enact legislation similar to that already in force which authorizes the care of World War I and II service-connected disabled veterans. This program would then include men and women presently in, or who may later be in, the Armed Forces in combat service.

In the development of a hospital program the immediate expansion of the VA outpatient service should be effected in order to care for those patients who might not require hospitalization but would be in need of out-patient treatment.

Many other bona fide reasons could be added to substantiate my claims which are based upon over 30 years of gratuitous service in the field of veterans' rehabilitation.

Something else that could, and should, be done without further delay to help the present overcrowded conditions in some VA hospitals is that at least 500 medical-domiciliary beds should be activated at Camp White in order to relieve and free many of the so-called frozen beds presently occupied in general medical hospitals, i. e., patients who need some medical and/or nursing care, which cannot be furnished under present VA regulations in a strictly domiciliary center. I refer to Camp White as an example because you are quite familiar with its set-up, as well as Schick Memorial Hospital in Clinton, Iowa, which could likewise be used to excellent advantage for similar purposes.

I am directing this letter to you, Senator, because of our close affiliations in the battle for Camp White, but am taking the liberty of sending copies to all Members of our Oregon delegation for their information. Also copies to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, the Secretary of National Defense, and Col. George E. Ijams, director of our national rehabilitation service.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes, I remain

Sincerely yours,

JOHN WALKER JONES,
Chairman, Rehabilitation Committee, Department of Oregon, VFW.

Lattimore, the Expert, and the Mess We're In

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, the Fargo Forum has printed in its issue of August 10, 1950, an editorial entitled "Lattimore, the Expert, and the Mess We're In." I subscribe completely to the views expressed in the editorial, and ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LATTIMORE, THE EXPERT, AND THE MESS WE'RE IN

We are not discussing here the charges of Senator MCCARTHY against Owen Lattimore, but a portion of a review of the Lattimore book Ordeal by Slander that was written by R. L. Duffus for the New York Times Book Review of July 30.

Lattimore, it should be remembered, has posed as an expert on far-eastern matters and on Russia, and he has been used as an expert by the United States State Department.

Says Mr. Duffus: "Lattimore's own case for his own integrity (as set forth in his book) is a good one. And it is his own integrity, not the soundness of his views, that was at stake. To say this is not to say that one agrees with his opinions, founded though they were on half a lifetime of study. He may have been wrong in the belief that some middle ground could be found between the Communists and the Nationalists. It may be that we have to choose the lesser of two evils. It may be that the Nationalists are not as inefficient and corrupt as Lattimore thinks they are. The point is that he has a right to be mistaken, if mistaken he is. Democracy, like horse racing, flourishes on honest differences of opinion."

We have no quarrel with this appraisal from the standpoint of Lattimore as an individual, but we cannot but wonder how a fuzzy-minded person, such as Lattimore has shown himself to be, could be accepted as an authority by the State Department. The State Department has a responsibility to the American people to be right, at least, in some of its conclusions.

And the State Department, partly on the advice of Lattimore, got us into a mess in Asia, and it is going to take some figuring to get us out of that mess. The State Department is an arm of the Government. The presumption is, or should be, that it knows where to go for advice, that it has enough fundamental common sense, because of its supposed background knowledge, to steer the country along right paths.

Back in 1949, when a House resolution was pending calling for the granting of $150,000,000 in aid to South Korea, this man Lattimore said in a magazine article:

"The thing to do is to let South Korea fall, but not let it look as though we pushed it. Hence, the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000."

Note the expression "parting grant." We were going to hand the South Koreans, if Lattimore had his way, some money as the easiest way to let them go to the dogs.

Yet, if we had followed that course, it would have been the opposite course to that which we are taking.

Probably Moscow was banking on this viewpoint of Owen Lattimore's when it moved against South Korea. It may be that it looked upon this reference the same as an "engraved invitation" to take over.

That is, Lattimore was suggesting a course here that would have immeasurably buttressed Russia in the effort to further her objective in Asia.

Again, in 1949, Lattimore sent a memorandum to the State Department. In it he said:

"South Korea is more of a liability than an asset to the interest and policy of the United States."

That seems strange today when Americans are fighting on bloody battlefields in South Korea.

These Americans are fighting there because, so far as the picture of Asia as a whole is concerned, Lattimore was dead wrong.

Then there is another Lattimore gem utterance of 1949:

"The United States should disembarrass itself as quickly as possible of its entanglements in South Korea."

We suppose this meant that we should back away from any contact with South Korea just as we backed out of China. But if we kept on backing out, the western world would soon be out of Asia altogether, and Russia would have an open field to communize at will.

However, it seems that our expert on far eastern affairs has somewhat changed his mind. That is a man's privilege, but it can be serious when a so-called State Department expert gets his country into an awful fix before he changes his mind.

In reciting these changes, the Chicago Tribune points to a speech he made at Mount Holyoke in July. It says Lattimore held that the Truman doctrine of holding the line against Communist aggression in Greece and Turkey offered a precedent for the present military intervention in Korea, but he added that we ought to build up behind the line by instituting a Marshall plan for Asia.

Thus he threw the 1949 parting grant idea out the window.

Then the Tribune summarizes remarks made by Lattimore at a press conference in New York on August 1. It points out that Lattimore again defended American steps in Korea, saying that Russia was morally responsible for the developments there and that the United States had acted properly in furnishing military aid, and that Russia has overreached in Korea.

Lattimore now appears to be trying to lock one barn door after the horse has been stolen and after the Russians are making him eat his 1949 words.

But it is terribly late—so terribly late.

If it had not been for the Lattimore-type of experts, it is reasonable to believe that it wouldn't be so late.

It was also terribly late when Dean Acheson was telling the American people only a few hours before the North Koreans launched their drive across the thirty-eighth parallel that Formosa had no strategic value.

Proposed Loan to Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the Commonweal, a well-known and widely read publication, published in New York City, has just printed a very interesting and incisive editorial on the action by the Senate in voting a mandatory loan to the Franco regime in Spain. This editorial should be read by all those who are interested in the subject. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE LITTLE THINGS

There was a thing called fascism and for a time almost the whole world went to war about it. To us in this country, except for our combat GI's, it never had the full meaning that it still has for Europe. For most of us fascism was an idea we denounced at mass meetings, or signed petitions against, or used as a dirty word. For the people of Europe it was more than an idea. It was something they lived with, hour after hour, day after day, for years.

It was the silence of a forbidden speech, the burning of a book, the suppression of a pastoral letter or the closing of a scientist's lab. Fascism was the rounding up of Jews and political dissenters in the middle of the night, the long silence and then, eventually, the discovery of Buchenwald and Auschwitz. It was the troops marching down the cathedral in the middle of the bishop's sermon, the castor-oil treatment for those who dared to lift a voice in protest, the mocking of the ballot box. For others fascism was the march of invading soldiers through their own streets, the strutting conquerors moving about the town square, the slow hopeless procession of oxcarts down the country roads while enemy planes menaced overhead, the sudden death-orders and the long, hungry, bloody liberation. Fascism was many things, none of them pleasant.

Facism is still something the people of Europe live with. There are the war-crippled, the orphaned and widowed at hand to keep the memory of it alive. Now people thumb through the snapshots of their dead and in the face of new threats are disturbed at night by the memory of a thousand old horrors. What was never more than a vicious idea for most of us is still a living fact for them.

At one time, for all of us, fascism in Europe was three uniformed men. One of them, presumably was finally buried in the debris of battered Berlin; another was hanged upside down on a lamp post in Milan; the third, the one who above all others means fascism, today lives and rules in Madrid.

He was not the worst of the dictators and, to some degree, may be comparatively benevolent. But to millions who remember only too well, he is the living symbol of all that was once called fascism.

Now the threatening thing is called communism, and in many details it is practically the same thing all over again. To fight it, the United States Senate voted to grant the Spanish dictator a $100,000,000 Marshall plan loan. There were only 15 dissenting votes. Senator WAYNE B. MORSE said that his vote amounted to a "wrestle with my conscience." The Senate spokesmen designated their action as a realistic move in the struggle against communism. Everyone of course was aware that Francisco Franco is a symbol of fascism in Europe and knew that by supporting his regime the United States—which has already given aid and comfort to the repudiated Chiang Kai-shek and dictator Tito—has further compromised its own defense of freedom. But these considerations did not seem to be as real to the Senators as the immediate political and military situation in Europe. They chose in the name of realism to ignore the popular sentiments.

Feelings and sentiments, memories and symbolism are intangibles which are sometimes difficult to appreciate. Senator MCCARRAN said: "It is time that we lay aside the little things." But it is the little things that add up to the spirit of resistance. And without that most careful military planning and political maneuvering may come to naught. Even in politics and war man himself is the ultimate measure.

Repudiation of Communist Stockholm Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make available to my colleagues three interesting and significant reports with reference to the growing repudiation of the Communist Stockholm campaign, both in this country and in other free countries. Three of these reports were printed in the Weekly News Service Supplement of the American Federation of Labor of August 4. They are as follows:

ICFTU COUNTERS REDS' PHONY PLEA

[From the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Service Supplement, Washington, D. C., of August 4, 1950]

BRUSSELS, BELGIUM.—The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions has called on affiliates representing 50,000,000 of the world's workers to counter the Communists' "Stockholm peace campaign," the only aim of which is to create confusion about the true imperialistic character of the Soviet Union's policy.

"We cannot let the Communists go on parading as the champions of peace and collecting signatures for the so-called Stockholm campaign from hundreds of thousands of well-meaning but uninformed people, while at the same time conducting a full-fledged, flagrant, undeniable war of aggression in Korea," the ICFTU has advised affiliated trade union centers.

The ICFTU—the anti-Communist world trade organization including both A. F. of L. and CIO—asked that these facts about the Korean war be publicized:

"Whatever the immediate outcome of the fighting the following facts are clear and indisputable:

"1. The fighting was started by forces of North Korea—a Soviet satellite state.

"2. The Security Council has charged North Korea as the aggressor and called on member states to render all possible aid—including military aid—to South Korea.

"3. Moscow's claim that the Security Council decision taken in its absence has no legal validity has been rejected by every competent international legal expert.

"4. The accusation that South Korea started the fighting is a falsehood.

"5. The World Federation of Trade Unions campaign to secure the support of trade-unionists, and particularly transport workers, for the war against South Korea is further evidence of Moscow's desire to use the trade-union movement for the political aims of Soviet imperialism.

"As soon as the facts were clear the ICFTU protested against this latest Communist aggression.

"We do not hold any special brief for the social or economic policy of the South Korean Government. Our delegation at present visiting Asia intended to include Korea in its itinerary, and would undoubtedly have produced practical proposals for the economic and social development of the country in the interest of the people, as it is doing elsewhere.

"Korea had a heavy legacy of Japanese misrule to overcome. Nevertheless, they were making a start with important reforms. Chief of these—for remember South Korea is 90-percent agricultural—was the distribution of all land holdings over 7.35 acres to tenants. This law went into force on June 1 last—perhaps that was one reason why the attack was timed when it was.

"Irrespective of the character of South Korean Government, there is no justification for armed aggression in defiance of the United Nations."

HINES LABELS PEACE PETITION A PHONY

WASHINGTON.—A. F. of L. Special Representative Lewis G. Hines joined with spokesmen for 12 other American organizations in labeling the so-called Stockholm peace petition a "phony peace petition to disarm the United States."

The organizations are represented in the All-American Conference to Combat Communism. Mr. Hines and the 12 other spokesmen said:

"The circulation, under the direction of the Communist Party, of the phony peace petition to disarm the United States is in keeping with its historic procedure of infiltrating and later paralyzing a nation which it wishes to invade.

"This petition was initiated at the recent so-called peace conference at Stockholm. All men kindly disposed toward their fellows favor peace.

"We favor peace, but we are forced to conclude that the nations which have associated themselves with this alleged peace move are aggressors, not peacemakers."

Pointing out that 1,000,000 Americans had already signed the petition, the group expressed the hope that "no other Americans or organizations will be caught in this trap."

FRENCH LABEL RED PEACE PLEA SWINDLE

PARIS, FRANCE.—The French Force Ouvière labeled the Stockholm peace petition of the Communists "a monstrous moral swindle."

The free French trade unions headed by Leon Jouhaux issued a poster in response to the request of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions for action to counter the Reds' phony peace plea for which they are seeking petitions around the world.

The Force Ouvière said in part:

"For weeks you have been asked to sign the Stockholm appeal. It is presented to you as the peaceful will of the Communist Party and Confederation of Labor.

"This is a monstrous moral swindle.

"Peace is the property of every worker. It is one and indivisible.

"There is no good or dirty war, but just war, with its sacrifices, miseries, ruins and dead.

"The Stockholm appeal is a treachery that we must denounce.

"It masks the ways of Soviet expansion.

"We call upon the workers, we call upon public opinion to act against the campaign launched by a well-organized fifth column."

Mr. Speaker, the fourth appears in the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Service of August 15 and is as follows:

COMMIE PEACE DOVE IS A LEAD PIGEON

CHICAGO.—The A. F. of L. executive council condemned the Stockholm peace petition of the Communists as a rank fraud.

"Moscow's dove of peace is only a lead pigeon," the council said. It urged every American to refuse to sign the petition.

Almost all of the North Koreans were forced to sign it before their Russian masters sent them into war against the United Nations, the council said. Following is the text of the council statement:

The American Federation of Labor vigorously condemns the so-called Stockholm peace appeal as a rank fraud.

We urge every working man and working woman to spurn the peddlers of this spurious petition.

We call upon every loyal American, every true lover of peace, to refuse to sign or circulate it.

We cannot urge too strongly every self-respecting American to treat those who are the organizers of this Stockholm movement and the purveyors of its petitions as enemies of the American people operating under false colors.

Not only in far off Korea do enemies of the American people disguise themselves as Americans. In our own country, in our factories, shops, offices, churches, schools and on our streets, enemies of America also disguise themselves and pose as Americans.

Camouflage is a Communist weapon of war which can be just as deadly against our sons and brothers in the United States as in Korea. The so-called Stockholm petition is precisely such a weapon.

The fake peace petition does not oppose all aggression with all weapons. It singles out only one weapon—the one in which our country still holds the lead and which provides our country and the other democracies with a measure of military security against the gigantic Russian war machine.

Unlike America and the other democracies, totalitarian Russia never demobilized but only remobilized its fighting forces at the end of World War II in 1945.

Were these fake peace maneuvers to succeed, were the United States to fall into the Russian bear trap of banning atomic weapons—while Russia rejects America's plan for their effective international inspection, control, and elimination—the possibility for Communist world domination by the Soviets would be enormously enhanced. That is just what the petition-promoters and the sinister signature-seekers want.

As long as the democracies have atomic superiority, the Russian warlords fear and hesitate to use their own massive armies as direct instruments of aggression and conquest. They rely instead on Chinese, North Korean, Indo-Chinese, antidemocratic Germans, and other puppets and satellites for extending totalitarian tyranny and engaging in adventurist aggression.

Since the policy of our country has been not to use atomic weapons against satellite aggressors and since the democracies have—under the Marshall plan and point-four—mobilized for peace and are unprepared for war, Moscow figures that its indirect, yet wanton, aggression can proceed unchecked.

Clearly, the so-called peace petitions seek to ban American's use of atomic weapons in order to enable Russia to catch up with and surpass our country in this field and to aid Moscow's catspaw aggressors by rallying public sentiment against the United States ever using such weapons against them.

Cruel confirmation of this strategy of the Stockholm petitioners is at hand in Korea; that is why the Communist drive for signatures coincides with the Moscow-directed invasion of South Korea. It was carefully planned to hide and help the brutal aggression of the Soviet dictators against the people of Korea, the American people and the United Nations as an effective agency of world peace.

In fact, nearly every man, woman, and even child in North Korea was forced to sign—or rather thumbprint—this peace petition only a few days before the Russian-inspired invasion of South Korea was started.

Moscow's dove of peace is only a lead pigeon out of which are made poisoned bullets against democracy. Those who sign this so-called peace petition are, knowingly or otherwise, serving Russian imperialism, aiding its bloody adventure in Korea, and helping the Soviet dictatorship to plunge mankind into another world war.

Those who sign this petition are striking a dastardly blow at the United Nations. Those who circulate and sign this document are stabbing our own country in the back at this critical hour when thousands of Americans are giving away their lives in order to preserve peace, freedom, and human decency.

The Communists are not waging a peace offensive. The Communists are waging an offensive against peace, liberty, and social progress. The American Federation of Labor is confident that organized labor will lead the Nation in unmasking and upbraiding these enemies within our country with the same determination that our Armed Forces are fighting against the Communist enemy from without.

Mr. Speaker, the Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics here in Washington, through its so-called information bulletin, continues to wage its obviously specious campaign in behalf of this piece of propaganda by printing in its August 11 issue a report of the Soviet Peace Committee. It may well be that the masters of the Kremlin have been able to induce the entire adult population of Soviet Russia to sign this petition, but if that is the case it is clear to anyone with any intelligence that the people imprisoned under the Communist regime would not dare to do anything else than to comply with the demands of their rulers.

Nevertheless, with this sort of report being made, I submit that it is of increasing importance that the Members of the House be given an early opportunity to join with the patriotic groups and organizations in this country, and with the executive department of the Government in making it clear that Congress does recognize the false nature of this activity and wishes to recommend to the American people whom it represents an alternative, constructive, and honest effort which they can make to secure real peace. The Soviet Embassy article is as follows:

ENTIRE ADULT POPULATION, 115,275,940, SIGNS STOCKHOLM APPEAL IN U. S. S. R.

The Soviet Peace Committee has issued the following statement:

"The Soviet Peace Committee has summed up the results of the campaign in the Soviet Union of the collection of signatures to the Stockholm appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress demanding the prohibition of the atomic weapon and branding as a war criminal the government which shall first use this weapon of aggression and mass extermination of human beings. In accordance with the decision of the Soviet Peace Committee all citizens 16 years or more of age were entitled to put their signatures to the Stockholm appeal.

"On the basis of the reports which have come in from all over the country, the Soviet Peace Committee has established that the collection throughout the country of signatures to the appeal for prohibiting the atomic weapon has been completed, with the exception of certain remote areas where this campaign will likewise end very soon.

"Since the campaign was launched—between June 30 and August 1—a total of 115,275,940 Soviet citizens have signed the Appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress.

"The results of the campaign show that the entire adult population of the Soviet Union has unanimously expressed itself against war, for the prohibition of the atomic weapon, for establishment of international control over the observance of this prohibition, and for branding as a war criminal the government which first uses the atomic weapon against any country.

"In unanimously putting their signatures to the Stockholm appeal, the Soviet people have demonstrated to the entire world their profound peaceableness and unbending will to cooperate with all nations, and have made a fresh contribution to the noble cause of struggle against war, for the strengthening of peace, and for the security of the peoples.

"In the Soviet people the world-wide organized peace front has a loyal and reliable bulwark.

"At numerous meetings and rallies the Soviet working people stigmatized foreign aggressors who are waging brigand war on the Korean people and demanded the withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea.

"The campaign for collecting signatures to the Stockholm appeal in the Soviet Union proceeded in an atmosphere of enormous political enthusiasm in town and countryside. The Soviet people demonstrated their full and unanimous approval of the Stalinist foreign policy of peace conducted by the Soviet Government.

"The results of the campaign for collecting signatures to the Appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress prove that, under the leadership of their Government, the peoples of the Soviet Union will continue as hitherto to march in the forefront of the struggle against war, for the consolidation of world peace."

No Common Cause With Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No Common Cause With Fascism," published in the Oregon Daily Journal, of Portland, Oreg., of August 5, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

NO COMMON CAUSE WITH FASCISM

It is difficult to explain the Senate's persistence in the proposed $100,000,000 loan to Spain. Either it is due to the persuasiveness of Senator MCCARRAN of Nevada, who has long been pro-Spain and pro-Franco, or it indexes a major change of loaning policy on the part of the United States Government.

If Senate approval was a compliment to MCCARRAN, who was wined, dined, and entertained by Franco during the former's stay in Spain, then the Senators who voted "aye" could do so sure of ultimate reversal.

But if the idea is to make loans to strengthen any nation that is anti-Communist, then we go with President Truman in unalterable opposition.

Even if the money, ostensibly, is to go for air bases the United States can use, the price is too high. Use of air bases can be had on better terms and without such compromise of principle.

The Franco Government is Fascist. Fascism is as totalitarian as communism. It is as far from democratic freedom. There is as little reconciliation of fascism with democracy as there is of communism with democracy.

The consummation of such a loan would break faith with our own ideals and give weight to Soviet censure that America tends to imperialist fascism.

Statement Issued by Radio News Club of Southern California Re Federal Communications Commission's Hearing on News-Slanting Charges Against Radio Station KMPC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, there has been widespread publicity about the Federal communications hearings on news slanting charges against the Los Angeles radio station KMPC. In the interests of giving one of the principal parties to the action—the Radio News Club of Southern California—an opportunity to clarify the situation, I attach their formal statement of July 10:

Because of the many specious and misleading statements made in connection with the Federal Communications Commission hearing into news slanting charges against Los Angeles radio station KMPC, we of the Radio News Club of Southern California wish to clarify the issues.

In February 1948 it came to the attention of the Radio News Club that three radio newsmen employed by KMPC were ordered fired by owner G. A. Richards, allegedly for their refusal to slant the news on the air in accordance with his wishes. We were apprised by News Director Clete Roberts, one of the three men fired, of numerous instances in which Mr. Richards had ordered the news to be slanted against Jews, labor unions, the Roosevelt family, the Democratic Party, and others. At a special luncheon meeting of our organization the matter was taken up and thoroughly discussed. Mr. Roberts, at the time, was president of the Radio News Club, and the other two men involved also were members of our group. But during the course of the discussion they were asked to absent themselves and did so. A number of other cases involving other former KMPC newsmen also were brought to our attention, and we discovered that news slanting charges involving Mr. Richards was not a new thing. Rather, it apparently had been going on for some time, and a number of other newsmen assertedly had been fired for refusing to prostitute their typewriters or microphones.

Roberts and others turned over to us material which was well documented, and which seemed to us to constitute a flagrant violation of the spirit and letter of the news standards of the National Association of Broadcasters, one of the National Association of Radio News Directors, and of FCC regulations relative to fair presentation of controversial issues and of the news. As a matter of fact, if the charges were true, they would violate our own RNC code of proposed news standards, which earlier had been mailed to managers of every radio station in the area. These news standards, by the way, had elicited a great deal of favorable comment. The reaction was excellent, and there had been no opposition or objection from management, agencies, or anyone else. Significantly, not from KMPC.

At any rate, by a unanimous vote of the Radio News Club, it was decided to send a committee of three members (not including Roberts or any other former or present KMPC employees) to KMPC manager Robert O. Reynolds to determine his answer to the charges. A meeting was held with Mr. Reynolds, with a KMPC attorney present. The Radio News Club representatives were courteously received but told that neither Mr. Reynolds nor anyone at KMPC had any idea of what was meant by the charges of news slanting. Told of information submitted to the club, Mr. Reynolds persisted in denying any understanding of the complaint—offered no rebuttal to the information submitted by the ex-KMPC employees.

On the basis of this refusal to offer any defense, explanation, or rebuttal to the charges made to the RNC, the membership voted unanimously to discover whether the FCC had any interest in the matter. The Commission requested the RNC to submit its findings in the matter, particularly documentary material. This was done. Subsequently, the Commission indicated that it could act on such evidence if a complaint were filed. The Radio News Club, in the absence of any expression of interest and concern by the management of KMPC—as indicated above—did so.

At this point, let us look at some of the innuendoes and fabrications by interested parties which have served to cloud the entire issue. KMPC has asserted that three disgruntled former employees, members of the Radio News Club, started the action. That is a distortion of fact. Rather, the Radio News Club, by unanimous vote, decided to turn the case over to the FCC. Clete Roberts and the other men directly involved were not even present when the matter was discussed.

KMPC's attorney, among others, has charged that the FCC took up the matter at the instigation of James Roosevelt. This is a deliberate untruth. The record is clear that the FCC acted only on the complaint of the Radio News Club, and not on the action of anyone else. Mr. Roosevelt's letter was only one of several hundred on the subject received by the Commission. Neither James Roosevelt, nor any organization which subsequently became interested in the case, was involved with the RNC. We acted in concert with no one but the professional radio newsmen who make up our group. As a matter of fact, we rejected offers of support from many individuals and organizations. Any others who pressed the issue did so without our consent or sanction. On the other hand, we attempted to prohibit no one from carrying out their own business.

Some 2 years passed before the Government hearing finally got under way early in 1950. During this period, and in the course of the hearing which at present is still continuing, there was no attempt on the part of KMPC to refute the specific charges of news slanting. Rather, a smoke screen technique was adopted, and an attempt at character assassination of the chief government witness, Clete Roberts, ensued. May we point out at this juncture that Clete Roberts is one of the most highly esteemed radio newsmen in the world. His background is excellent and his character above reproach, and he enjoys a respected reputation among his professional associates. As to his ideology, he is a registered Republican, with no extremist views.

Since some have attempted to hint that the Radio News Club acted at the instigation of Communists, let's take a look at the record. The Radio News Club was organized at the suggestion of Arthur Stringer, a paid representative of the National Association of Broadcasters. That was in the summer of 1946. The idea for a professional association of radio newsmen in this area took firm hold. In the course of organizing the group, several early meetings were held at station KMPC.

The Radio News Club, as organized, was composed of professional radio newsmen—newscasters, news writers, and news commentators—it is not a labor union, nor is it interested in economic issues, but only in elevating the professional news standards of the broadcasting industry. Since it is comprised of working newsmen, it is not political in any sense. There are probably a representative number of Republicans and Democrats included in the group. In that respect it is a good cross section of professional America. There is no room for extremist ideology in the Radio News Club, and it does not act in concert with, or at the instigation of anyone, politically or otherwise.

Now, who are some of the men who make up the Radio News Club? Here are a few of the key names:

David Anderson, National Broadcasting Co.: Chosen the top news writer of southern California during the past year.

Jack Beck, news director of CBS on the west coast.

Chet Huntley, CBS: Chosen the best news commentator of this area during the past year.

Roger Sprague, news director of the National Broadcasting Co., west coast.

Elmer Peterson, NBC coast-to-coast commentator.

James MacNamara, news director of KLAC.

Al Gordon, news director of KFWB.

Bob Garred, American Broadcasting Co.: Chosen the top newscaster in southern California during the past year.

Ted Myers KTI.

These are some of the names in the organization; the list could go on and on. But it should serve to point up the type of professional radio newsmen who comprise the membership of the Radio News Club.

We of the Radio News Club see in the present action by the FCC an attempt to secure and preserve free speech in one of the most important media of communication, the broadcasting industry. We disagree with those who contend that the FCC action is a threat to freedom of speech. We feel, moreover, that the issue does not concern the personal views of G. A. Richards, whether or not he hated Jews, Negroes, etc., but rather, whether or not he caused his newsmen to slant the news on the air to carry out such prejudices.

Because of the great interest nationally in the KMPC hearing, we of the Radio News Club feel it important that any innuendoes, and misleading or untrue assertions given play of late be corrected. In this statement we have attempted to set the facts straight.

Cost of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Cost of War," published recently in the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

COST OF WAR

American counteroffensives in Korea, though not yet on a large scale, are immensely heartening. The present performance of soldiers and marines with their sea and air support high lights the job done by the earlier arrivals in Korea, and by the South Koreans themselves. The withdrawals for the most part were not retreats in the usual sense, but were planned delaying actions, often executed under the greatest difficulties, until troops reached a line that could be stabilized. The new engagements also proved that the American soldier, properly trained and equipped, has lost none of his fighting spirit.

Many persons wonder why, in an age of bazookas with new ammunition that makes mincemeat of tanks, so many men are needed and the cost of war is so high. The answer is that as the Armed Forces have developed new and refined weapons, they have become highly specialized. Instead of the old masses of infantry, relatively fewer soldiers are required actually to man weapons (though the continuing importance of the foot soldier has been demonstrated in Korea). Vast crews are required behind the lines, however, for supply and to keep equipment in order; for example, highly trained tank and electronic repairmen. Thus, while the percentage of casualties has steadily gone down (in Caesar's time there were so many as 80 percent casualties in any given engagement), the number of men involved—and the cost—has constantly risen with specialization.

The general rise and the price level and improved pay and allowances for members of the Armed Forces have, of course, combined with improved and more elaborate equipment to boost the cost of war. For example, in 1935 the average yearly cost of maintaining an individual soldier outside combat (pay, food, clothing, etc.) was $960; just before the Korean invasion is was $2,640. A few other figures, allowing for changes in specifications of the items listed, also are revealing:

	World War II	Today (before Korea)
Pay of recruit	[1] $21	$75
Garand rifle	31	64
Medium tank	55,000	200,000
Antiaircraft gun	10,000	300,000
Medium bomber	185,000	1,246,000
Pursuit aircraft	50,000	183,000
Infantry division (with original equipment but exclusive of pay, clothing, food, etc.)	14,500,000	74,300,000
Airborne division	15,000,000	75,000,000
Armored division	30,000,000	200,000,000

[1] Later $50.

In light of these figures it is easier to understand why an appropriation of $444,000,000 sustained an army of 188,000 men in 1939, whereas $4,000,000,000 was needed for an Army of 5[illegible],000 before Korea. The very size of the new ten and one-half plus billion Armed Forces request, of course, magnifies the nee[illegible] for economy. Now more than ever there is no excuse for extravagance, and it is essential to keep check to insure that every dollar actually produces added defense.

Proceedings on Occasion of Dedication at West Point of Monument to Gen. George S. Patton, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on August 19 last, on the grounds of the United States Military Academy at West Point, there occurred the dedication of a monument to a great American soldier, Gen. George S. Patton. This event is of such great interest to the Congress and to the country that I ask unanimous consent that an account of these proceedings be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the account was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

GEN. GEORGE S. PATTON, JR., MEMORIAL IS DEDICATED AT WEST POINT

(By Capt. Joseph F. H. Cutrona)

WEST POINT, N. Y., August 19.—A favorite son was honored at West Point today. One of the most colorful figures of World War II, Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., famed commander of the Third Army who displayed brilliant leadership in Africa, Sicily, France, Germany, and Austria, was memorialized by the dedication of a statue donated by the George S. Patton, Jr., Memorial Association. The dedication was attended by more than 1,000 invited guests who heard Dr. Douglas Southall Freeman, distinguished writer, historian, and editor, known particularly for his Pulitzer prize-winning Lee's Lieutenants, extol the many accomplishments of General Patton.

The statue, erected in a place of honor at the United States Military Academy, is an especially fitting tribute to the great soldier in that the donations which made it possible came from General Patton's former comrades of all ranks from private to general as well as from his admirers from all walks of life. Although the George S. Patton, Jr., Memorial Association made no widespread attempt to contact large numbers of people, the word got around that a tribute was planned to the memory of one of the Nation's outstanding soldiers. Soon, unsolicited contributions poured in with dimes just as much, and more, in evidence than dollars.

The ceremony today was a fitting climax to the plan of the memorial association, founded soon after General Patton's death on December 21, 1945. A company of cadets dressed in spotless white uniforms flanked the memorial to provide an honor guard. In front of each platoon of the honor guard was a color guard. One color guard carried the national colors and those of the United States Corps of Cadets, while the other carried General Patton's flag and the Third Army flag. The United States Military Academy Band supplied appropriate music throughout the ceremony.

The official party arrived promptly at 2:30 p. m. In the party were Mrs. George S. Patton, Jr., the late general's wife; Mrs. John K. Waters, his daughter; Mrs. James W. Totten, a second daughter; Lt. George S. Patton III, who returned from Germany to attend the ceremony honoring his father; Miss Anne W. Patton, the general's sister; and many distinguished persons representing the Government, the Armed Forces, and civilian activities

As the official party arrived, the honor guard came to attention and the band played the Second Armored Division March. The Second Armored was the famed Hell-on-Wheels Division of the Third Army. Following this, a portion of the band played God of Battles, the special music written to accompany General Patton's widely known poem, while a glee club composed of the remaining members of the band sang the words.

After the singing and playing of God of Battles, Chaplain Frank E. Pulley, of the United States Military Academy, gave the invocation. Upon the completion of the prayer, the honor guard and colors executed "present arms" and th · gathered crowd came to attention for the playing of the national anthem.

Throughout the program, Maj. Gen. Robert M. Littlejohn, United States Army, retired, acted as the presiding officer. He, as did General Patton, served in the Cavalry upon graduation from the Military Academy. During World War II, he was chief quartermaster for the European theater. It was he who suggested the memorial to Mrs. Patton at the general's funeral. On behalf of the George S. Patton, Jr., Memorial Association, General Littlejohn accepted the bequests of the donors. He then paid tribute to Mr. James E. Fraser, the sculptor, who was unable to be present because of illness.

At this point, the ceremonies reached a climax. General Littlejohn introduced Mrs. Patton, who unveiled the statue. In closing his introduction, he said, "Today it is a great honor to have with us a most charming and gracious person, the one who is really responsible for backing George Patton in the great role played by him in the Third Army after the breakthrough at St. Lo—Beatrice Ayer Patton."

Before unveiling the statue, Mrs. Patton spoke briefly. "Soldiers of the Third Army and friends all," she said, "this statue, unveiled today, could well stand for the motto and spirit of duty, honor, country; it stands for something else besides, the love of men for a man." Mrs. Patton continued by pointing out the statue was an excellent likeness of her husband, making it possible to "* * * perpetuate the inspiration he gave you, handing it on to those who come after, who never knew him."

The General's wife related a story told her by an MP she met last year in Panama when she asked him if he had known General Patton. "Yes, I knew him well," he said. "We were going up to the Bulge and our truck got stuck in the snow on a hill and we couldn't move. All of a sudden we saw a jeep coming up the road and in it was the General. His face was awful red and there was a white patch on his cheek like it was froze. He yelled, 'Get out, you soldiers. Get out of that truck and push,' and we did. When I looked up, there was the General himself, pushing right alongside of me. Yes, sir, the General never asked anyone to do a thing he wouldn't do himself."

In closing her remarks, Mrs. Patton said, "Life is a book in which each chapter is different, but every chapter is built on those that have gone before. Glory with honor never grows old. May this statue ever stand for duty, honor, America. Duty, honor, country is the motto of the United States Military Academy."

As Mrs. Patton finished her remarks, the Honor Guard executed "present arms" and stood at attention while Mrs. Patton pulled the cord which removed the American flags and shroud covering the memorial, to reveal General Patton in battle dress. The sculptor had depicted the General in his familiar battle uniform, wearing his two pearl-handled pistols and holding binoculars at his chest—the way he was known to thousands of American fighting men.

The statue itself is a full 9 feet tall and beautifully displayed on a specially designed base facing the Military Academy Library. On the sides of the base the following quotations are inscribed:

"Never take counsel of your fears."
"Pursue the enemy with the utmost audacity."

These are words which General Patton used often and a code which he followed. The front of the base was inscribed with the General's name, while on the back is mention of the donors and a list of the campaigns in which he participated.

Following the unveiling, Lt. George S. Patton III, the General's son, laid a wreath at the base of the monument. It was presented by the Church of Our Saviour, San Gabriel, Calif., the church where General Patton was baptized and confirmed. On it were inscribed the words, "In memory of Gen. George S. Patton, Jr." After he had placed the wreath, Lieutenant Patton stepped back and saluted the image of his father.

When Mrs. Patton and young George had returned to their seats, General Littlejohn introduced the principal speaker, Dr. Douglas Southall Freeman. Dr. Freeman opened his remarks with an anecdote which illustrated the qualities of leadership which he felt General Patton possessed to a marked degree. "Purely by chance the other evening at the United States Naval Academy," he said, "some of us were discussing instruction and leadership. Most of us were agreed that the books on psychology prepared for the use of students there and at West Point were not as yet in terms practical enough to be applied by the students. All of us agreed that we could teach leadership better from the leader than from the book and that biography offered perhaps the soundest approach to psychology.

"Then one of the admirals present spoke up * * * and made this remark: 'I have often thought that it is very difficult to abstract from the works, even from the works of military authorities, lessons that are concrete and explicit in themselves * * * I believe if I wanted a textbook on leadership, I would rather have a good biography of General Patton than anything else that could be written.'"

Dr. Freeman continued the discussion of General Patton's outstanding leadership by pointing out that in all the essential qualities of that remarkable man there was the embodiment of all the tradition of American leadership. He pointed out that there was never a single thing that he did otherwise than with his whole heart—that there was "* * * never, never, never, anything shoddy about George Patton as a student, as a young officer, an an Army commander, as husband, and as father."

In his remarks, Dr. Freeman paid tribute to the professional soldier. "Accidental triumph is the work of the unprofessional soldier," he said. "George Patton exemplified the wisdom of that system of military education in the United States which begins here (at West Point) and carried a man on to the National War College, where in reality he begins his preparation for Army command."

"* * * From the cavalry sword of personal contact to the tank encompasses the life of George Patton," he continued. "Never, never was there any end to his inquiry, any end to his research, to his study. * * * Wholeheartedly, endlessly preparing himself, and understanding better than almost any man of modern American military history the psychology both of the officer and of the enlisted men. Put the emphasis on the conjunction, because there is the distinction. Others there were who understood the officers and not the men; some knew the men and not the officers; but Patton knew them both.

"He knew them flawlessly * * * knew the roughneck and knew the gentleman. He knew how to be a gentleman because he was one * * * knew how to meet them all because he mastered their thinking."

Dr. Freeman continued by pointing out that as Americans we seek no conquest save that of right and freedom. He described General Patton as one who possessed valor and courage and employed those virtues in the fight to protect the American way of life.

When the guest speaker had completed his remarks, General Littlejohn formally presented the memorial to the United States Military Academy. Major General Bryant E. Moore, Superintendent of the Military Academy, accepted on behalf of West Point. "West Point accepts with pride," he said, "this magnificent statue of her distinguished son and great soldier, George S. Patton, Jr."

The program was concluded with a benediction prayer by Chaplain James Hugh O'Neill, former chaplain of the Third United States Army. It was Chaplain O'Neill who was with General Patton and composed the Third Army prayer for good weather during the Battle of the Bulge.

The Third Army prayer for good weather must have been used by the many former members of that organization who attended the ceremony. Immediately before the dedication was to begin, there was a downpour. However, throughout the dedication and the cadet parade which followed, the rains were held back. Again, immediately following the parade, the rain returned.

Interior Department Will-o'-the-Wisp Plan Would Take Columbia River Water From Northwestern States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, it is reported to me that the Department of Interior is proposing a gigantic project to bring Columbia River water into California for the avowed purpose of solving California's water problem. Assertedly, President Truman has interested himself in this project.

The purpose of this proposed project is not, as stated, to solve California's water problem. The purpose is to solve Arizona's water problem by turning over to Arizona California's water in the Colorado River.

California will not be fooled by this obvious strategy into giving up her established rights and huge investments on the Colorado River for any such will-of-the-wisp. Moreover, the people on the Columbia and Snake Rivers should clearly understand what is going on—their water is to be exported at huge expense in order that an exchange can occur by which Arizona will get the water in the Colorado River.

It is a clever scheme designed in the Interior Department to eliminate California's opposition to the fantastic Arizona project, which has been proposed by the Interior Department, and would use water to which California has long-established legal rights. California is to be promised pie in the sky from the Columbia River and asked to drop her opposition to the central Arizona project, to give up long-established legal rights to the waters of the Colorado, and to abandon diversion works on the Colorado costing hundreds of millions of dollars.

Of course, if Arizona is able to perpetrate a theft of the Colorado River waters from California, it may be necessary for California, at some future time, to look elsewhere. For the present, however, California will stand on her established rights and investments, and will develop the remaining water potential, which is substantial, within her own borders and in the Colorado River.

Some $64 Questions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of August 20, 1950:

SOME $64 QUESTIONS

Is the United States committed to fight Russia as guardian for some 950,000,000 people of Europe and Asia?

If so, how and when and where? Also, why?

If you know the answers to these questions, you know more than most American taxpayers, soldiers, sailors, mothers, fathers, children and interested bystanders.

Does Truman know the answers? You get an idea of the kind of performance this ex-haberdasher is turning in as President of the United States, when you learn that one of the most high-minded and respected Members of Congress ha. introduced a resolution which in effect strips the President of his most critically important present function in office.

Representative FREDERIC COUDERT (Republican, of New York) is author of the resolution, and on Wednesday last, while introducing it, he also introduced some several $64 questions with which Americans who want to survive the present era, may now wrestle for answers. Observed Mr. COUDERT:

"The American people have a right to know what is the foreign policy of their Government, the right to assess that policy before they are called upon to shed their blood and spend their treasure in wars all over the world.

"There must be a truly national policy, openly and freely arrived at in traditional American fashion.

"No secret, personal Presidential substitute will do."

ARE YOU CITIZEN OR SUBJECT?

If we truly are a self-governing Republic of free citizens, surely Mr. COUDERT has laid down a sound rule. Assuming that the American Nation is made up of independent citizens, the said citizens are entitled to know what their hired servants in public office want them to do in the matter of wars and sacrifice. Of course, if such a notion of citizenship is in error, and we are willing to be mere subjects of King Harry I, then we must ask no questions but obey the lord and master who rules by divine right, responsible to none but himself.

So in considering the further things Mr. COUDERT has to say, the first $64 question is one you must answer to yourself. Are you a citizen and does the Government work for you, or are you a subject and do you work for the Government?

Mr. COUDERT gets down to the hardpan as follows: Communist China has 450,000,000 human subjects to draw on. What do we do about them, as we fight our way back to the old Korean dividing line of the thirty-eighth parallel? Next, do we fight them for Formosa? Do we fight the Russians, too?

WHEN DO WE FIGHT?

Same questions, concerning French Indochina, 25,000,000 people; Hong Kong, 1,000,000; British Malaya, 5,000,000; Indonesia, 70,000,000; Thailand, 17,000,000; Burma, 17,000,000; India, 337,000,000; Pakistan, 70,000,000; Tibet, 4,000,000; Iran, 18,000,000; Turkey, 19,000,000; Greece, 8,000,000; Yugoslavia, 16,000,000; Finland, 4,000,000; western Germany, 48,000,000.

Add in the other fringe nations of Europe and you come very close to 1,000,000,000 people. That is one thousand millions.

Truman keeps rolling his mind's eye across this teeming horde and calculating how they can be used to make him secure as King-Emperor now and beyond 1952. But the $64 question is: How does it profit the American people to play around with these satisfactions of the king?

MUST CONGRESS TAKE OVER

Thus to force disclosure, Mr. COUDERT has introduced his resolution that calls on Truman for specific answers to specific questions of United States foreign policy in Korea and in each of the other above-mentioned places. He also asks what we intend to do if Russians or their satellites move on Atlantic Pact nations. And he concludes:

"Be it further resolved that in the event of the failure of the President to supply within reasonable time the information heretofore requested, then the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate shall appoint a select joint committee of the two houses for the purpose of considering and recommending a national foreign policy designed to meet the vital question pressing for decision by the American people."

He proposes that the membership be equally divided between the parties and that not more than half the members be on Senate or House regular committees of foreign relations or affairs.

That resolution is just short of actually moving the impeachment of the President in office. It says he is incompetent to execute his most pressing and important duty of the present era, and that Congress must do the job, itself.

If Truman is so hot for a "bipartisan" foreign policy here is a plan for him to think over, and for citizens who must pay the bill it is an opportunity and a sign of the trend in the minds of serious men concerned for the Nation's survival.

Industry-Government Contract Makes State Future Bright

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the August issue of the Reader's Digest there appeared an article by former Governor Leslie Miller, of Wyoming, which attacked Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, and stated: "He [referring to Dr. Raver] has refused to let private companies have long-term contracts for any part of the power produced by Bonneville dams."

As I stated on the floor of this House on July 24, 1950, that statement is false. In addition to the remarks I made on that occasion, I am today calling to the attention of the House news stories covering the long-term Montana Power Co.-Bonneville Power Administration relationship, which further exposes the falsity of the Reader's Digest article and indicates very clearly that business-Government cooperation can function and that by working together we can build up industry for western Montana and security for our people.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting at this point in my remarks a front-page story from the Montana Standard, of Butte, Mont., and a front-page story from the Butte Daily Post, Butte, Mont. Both of these are dated August 19, 1950. They follow:

[From the Montana Standard of August 19, 1950]

INDUSTRY-GOVERNMENT CONTRACT MAKES STATE FUTURE BRIGHT

Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, concluded a series of conferences here Friday on the operation of a unique business Government cooperation contract which probably will mean more industry and prosperity for Montana.

The contract which provides for the Bonneville Power Administration to deliver power to Montana for distribution over Montana Power Co. lines to customers is the first of its kind ever negotiated. It may well become a pattern for similar contracts in other parts of the country, proving that such cooperation between private industry and Government will work to the benefit of the people and eliminate much harmful strife.

Dr. Raver, who was making his first visit to this area, expressed himself as completely satisfied with the conferences he participated in with officials of the Montana Power Co., Victor Chemical Co., Anaconda Copper Mining Co., and others. "I am most gratified at the spirit of cooperation on the part of the Montana Power Co. to attain our objective," he said, "and I am convinced that our contract will work."

The contract was executed several months ago. The Government will build a transmission line from Hungry Horse Dam to its 230,000-volt substation at Anaconda from where power will be distributed over the Montana Power Co. lines.

"This agreement opens up new industrial possibilities for Montana," Dr. Raver explained. "Under it we cooperatively work out a plan to use power in a constructive manner for Montana, adding to the employment opportunities and wealth of the State. And the contract in all its aspects gives protection to the people."

The principal purpose of Dr. Raver's meetings here was to make certain that all details were agreed upon for supplying power for the operation of the Victor Chemical Co's $5,000,000 phosphate plant which is now under construction near Silver Bow.

As the plant is expected to be in operation about September of next year—or before the line from Hungry Horse to Anaconda is completed—it will be necessary for power to be supplied from another source during the interim period. This the Montana Power Co. will do, enabling the Victor Co. to start operations sooner than would otherwise be possible if it was required to wait for the transmission line to Anaconda.

When the Government line is completed to Anaconda, the Montana Power Co. will deliver Government power from that point to the Victor Chemical Co. plant, a distance of about 18 miles.

"Getting the plant in production as quickly as possible is important not only because of the economic benefits to this area but also from the standpoint of national defense," Dr. Raver said.

Establishment of the Victor Chemical Co. plant here, which brings an important new industry to Silver Bow County, actually is the result of cooperation from three sources. The Montana Power Co., Bonneville Power Administration, and the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. all played important roles in locating the new plan here. The agreement between the Power company and the Bonneville Administration assured the Victor company that it could go immediately forward with its plans, certain that it would have ample power for its operations. Meanwhile, the Anaconda Co. made arrangements to provide the right to phosphate deposits which will be used in the manufacturing process and affords a tunnel site for development of other properties. Thus, a new industry, which will add materially to the local payroll, is being brought into existence.

The idea of close cooperation between the Bonneville Administration and the Montana Power Co. appears to be working out smoothly, Dr. Raver said, and it may now be entering upon a broad and beneficial phase for the people of the State and especially of western Montana.

As a part of the general program the Montana Power Co. at the present time is making power available to Rural Electrification Administration cooperatives, at Government rates, and will continue to do so after the Hungry Horse project is completed and Government power becomes available from there.

It is believed that the contract involving the Hungry Horse-Anaconda transmission line will open the way for continued exploration of industrial possibilities in the portion of Montana west of the Continental Divide which is the boundary for Bonneville's operations. Through the same type of cooperation between the Bonneville Administration and Montana Power Co. which enabled the Victor Chemical Co. to locate here, an aluminum industry in the western Montana area is under definite consideration.

"People of Montana can be assured that the waters of Montana and the power they generate will be used here," Dr. Raver said. "This is illustrated by the fact that Bonneville will be sending a block of power to the Montana Power Co. and that more will be available for continued industrial development in western Montana."

The whole thing is expected to demonstrate what can be attained by private industry and Government power working harmoniously together. The uniqueness of the program lies in the fact that private power and Government power, long regarded as bitter-to-the-end enemies, are here in Montana showing how each, working with the other, can truly render the maximum of service and be of the greatest benefit to the people.

Dr. Raver will go to Spokane today but expects to return in the future for more conferences in western Montana which may well result in further development of the State.

[From the Butte (Mont.) Daily Post of August 19, 1950]

POWER CONTRACT BRIGHTENS FUTURE OF STATE

After concluding a unique business-Government cooperation contract that bodes well for the future prosperity of Montana, Dr. Paul J. Raver, administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, left here Saturday for Spokane. He probably will return later for more conferences concerning similar matters.

The contract which provides for the Bonneville Power Administration to deliver power to Montana for distribution over Montana Power Co. lines to customers is the first of its kind ever negotiated. It may well become a pattern for similar contracts in other parts of the country, proving that such cooperation between private industry and government will work to the benefit of the people and eliminate much harmful strife.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTONIO M. FERNANDEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore obtained, I include in the RECORD an editorial from this morning's Washington Post entitled "Medical Service," and dealing with the House Commerce Committee's apparent decision not to report out the bill providing for medical, dental, and nursing schools and for assistance to medical students. The editorial reads as follows:

MEDICAL SERVICE

The House Commerce Committee has done a distinct disservice to the Nation in voting to shelve President Truman's proposed 5-year program to provide $250,000,000 of Federal funds for the expansion of facilities of medical, dental, and nursing schools and for the assistance of medical students. The committee voted 9 to 8 against reporting the bill, which had already been passed by the Senate. The reason for the opposition, according to news reports, is the fear of creating a precedent—meaning that the measure would be an opening wedge for Federal aid to education and for the health insurance and welfare proposals. The argument is as much beside the point as any objection on the ground of regimentation to economic controls in time of emergency. For the medical measure is a vital element in civil defense. At any time American cities may be under attack, yet doctors, dentists, and nurses are so short, with the military services again demanding adequate recruitment, that the situation has become critical.

Not only is the medical measure badly needed, an adequate plan is necessary for distribution of doctors between the military services and the civilian population. Already the services are justifiably complaining that recruitment of doctors is too slow. Medical societies have promised, the latest being the Maryland Medical Society, to start machinery in motion to determine medical mobilization. In 1942 this newspaper declared that most efficient utilization of doctors, as with other classes of manpower, could not be obtained by reliance upon doctors to allocate themselves. We said then "It is an eloquent commentary upon the haphazard character of our program for utilizing manpower * * * that the recruiting of medical men should have been permitted to proceed without prearranged plans for estimating and providing for the minimum medical needs of our civilian population." This remains true in the present situation. In the event of war the minimum medical needs of the civilian population will be enormously beyond anything at all like World War II, and that fact ought to be faced promptly and adequately.

Where Do We Stand?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial which appeared in the New York Daily Mirror of August 17:

WHERE DO WE STAND?

Foreign policy is a kind of nebulous expression meaning little unless pinned down. We thank Representative FREDERIC R. COUDERT, Republican, of New York, for doing some pinning in an understandable way

He doesn't just berate our failure of policy. He asks what our policy is in these specific instances:

1. If and when the North Koreans are forced back to the thirty-eighth parallel? If the North Koreans succeed in driving our forces out of Korea? What do we do?

2. If Communist China attacks Formosa? If it succeeds in conquering Formosa? Will we go to war with the 450,000,000 people of Communist China? What do we do?

3. What is policy as to the following countries (a) if attacked by Soviet satellite forces, (b) if conquered by Soviet satellite forces, (c) if attacked by Russian forces, (d) if conquered by Russian forces, (e) if taken over by internal Communist revolution: French Indochina, Hong Kong, British Malaya, Indonesia, Thailand, Burma, India, Pakistan, Tibet, Iran, Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia, Finland, western Germany? What do we do?

4. What is the policy of the United States now if (a) Soviet satellite forces or (b) Russian forces attack a North Atlantic Pact nation? Is it intended to make unlimited commitment of American ground forces in defense of Atlantic Pact nations? What do we do?

Let us add another question: What is our policy if several attacks are made at once?

Mr. COUDERT points out that the total population of the Asiatic countries which we might defend is over 700,000,000 and the population of western Europe over 250,000,000. He says:

"It is not enough merely to mobilize. Where and to what extent are American military forces to be committed? Our political plans and commitments must not exceed our military capacity."

We wish President Truman would clarify all those points.

Are we pledged to do more than we can ever possibly do? Or are we just on a day-to-day basis of expediency?

For instance, our Korean policy, before war broke, was to abandon Korea. Russia and the North Korean Communists may have counted on that. Had our policy been clear, the attack might not have occurred.

It is imperative that Americans, wholeheartedly supporting the war, know where they stand.

The Public Demands That Johnson and Acheson Be Fired Now

REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the time has come, yes, long overdue, to terminate the striped pants-4-o'clock tea, double talk type of diplomacy that has been emanating for too long from our State Department. The people all over the Nation are disgusted, aroused, and angry. They have lost patience and confidence in our Hiss-loving, Russian-romancing, world-wooing Secretary of State. They want a man of consistent and dependable loyalty to the United States regardless of party affiliation who can develop a firm, sound, logical foreign policy that will command respect among the nations of the world and for an adequate Military Establishment to support such a policy for this Nation and then stand on it and stick to it. They want a change now, not after the November elections, and they do not hesitate to say so.

Here are some of the typical letters I have received from my constituents:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., July 29, 1950

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Dean Acheson and Louis Johnson must be forced to resign.

MARJORIE L. GOLF.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., July 31, 1950.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Acheson and Johnson must be forced to resign.

MARJORIE C. VAN SCOYOC.

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF., July 30, 1950.

DEAR SIR: I see no strong desire on the part of Congress to get rid of Acheson and Johnson. When can we expect them to be chucked out on their ears?

May I express my disgust on the part of certain officials to "wait until after elections."

Contemptible, when lives are at stake. Why must the public be treated as morons? When will we be given the truth? We can take it. Its pretty frustrating, Mr. McDONOUGH, to be thoroughly disgusted with the actions of certain people and lack the means to make your disgust known. I'd like to write the President, but since my letter would only be filed in the trash I must ask you to be my voice. For heaven's sake get rid of these stupid, incompetent nincompoops before they hand the country over to Joe Stalin.

Very truly yours,

FRANK E. CARROLL.

AUGUST 13, 1950.

DEAR GORDON: We are on a long trip. What we hear and learn in various States is so alarming, I wonder that more Congressmen do not speak up.

Surely those from Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, even Washington, and especially Oregon want Truman impeached.

All talk against Acheson remaining in any Government job. Young and old say the United States propaganda is only to fool United States citizens. They want fresh horses to cross troubled waters.

They say, to win in Korea we must defeat Communists in Washington, D. C.

Never before have I heard men say, "If you write your Senator, I'll write mine." A Democrat tells me he was forced out of the Treasury Department by Reds who speak openly of their contempt for America.

We Americans must begin making friends throughout our own country, and the world as well. Gifts of money and supplies don't do it. Too much talking doesn't do it. Can't you insist the United States boys in Korea and elsewhere be kept together; fight together and live together. Then infiltration can happen only once. Koreans don't live as we do; don't think or act as we—and their sanitation! Oh God, save our men from the disease, distress, and discouragement.

Note clippings. Really, United States citizens hereabouts are aroused. Much success to you in November and thereafter.

Sincerely,

CLEM AUSMAN.

The people's distrust and disgust is not limited to Acheson. They demand a nonpolitical Secretary of Defense. They want to know what the billions appropriated for defense was spent for. Why don't we have better tanks than the Russian-supported North Koreans? Why have our men been sent against a supposed third-rate enemy only to find that we are outgunned, undermanned, and caught off guard by poor intelligence and military advice?

Here we are engaged in a war with Russia through the back-door by way of Korea and our Secretary of Defense allows our Air Force to release vital and strategic photographs of one of our most important target areas—Los Angeles—which will undoubtedly be used to good advantage by Russia.

Read the following letter I just received from a disgusted and angry constituent about this:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 11, 1950.

Hon. GORDON L. MCDONOUGH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCDONOUGH: I was shocked this morning to open my newspaper, the Los Angeles Times, and see a photograph just released to the public by the Air Force and taken by the Nation's newest camera plane, the North American Aviation Co's 4-Jet-RF-45-C Tornado, after the craft climbed to more than 40,000 feet. You probably by this time have seen the photograph. I also picked up a Los Angeles Examiner and to my astonishment there was printed a full-page reproduction of this same air map, showing all of the reservoirs, such as San Fernando, Stone Canyon, Franklin Canyon, pointed out on the margin so that any enemy plane would have no trouble in finding our water supply. On the front page of the Examiner is an article, Los Angeles Is Focal Point in Raid Defense, covering details of the probable areas that might be attacked, stating that 16,000 citizens are to be trained for defense.

We are spending billions for defense, arming friendly nations all over the world, and fighting a Red war in Korea, and then somebody in the Air Force releases an air map of one of the vital areas in the United States with oil storage facilities and large aircraft factories clearly shown. This map is released to the newspapers and could be, and probably will be, transmitted to Russia and all of our other enemies.

I ask you, "wha' hoppened"?

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE H. MCCARTHY.

There are millions of confused, frustrated and angry people all over the Nation who feel the same way. Many of them go further than demanding the removal of Acheson and Johnson—they want the whole executive department cleaned out from Truman down.

Let me read to you items in the latest edition of the United States News of statements from all parts of the Nation from people who are thoroughly disgusted and have lost confidence in the administration.

From Maine:

It is quite apparent our great President is no leader. In my opinion he should be impeached for the mess he has gotten us into.

From Colorado:

What goes on in Korea? Where is the money appropriated for defense going?

From a small Minnesota town:

The people are angry about our Government from the President on down the line.

It is now evident that a lot of us made a great mistake in voting for Truman & Co. in the last election—

Writes a Midwestern farmer:

Unless some changes are made, I will do all in my power to influence voters in my group against the administration.

Repercussions from the charges of Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, Republican, of Wisconsin, about Communists in the Government show up in statements from people in various parts of the Nation such as the following:

From Alabama:

MCCARTHY's charge of communism in the State Department sure hasn't been disproved.

From Maine:

Why don't you clean the Communists out of our United States?

From Colorado:

How could a thing like this have happened unless it is true that our Government is riddled with Communists?

From Ohio:

I'd like to see the State Department cleaned out and fumigated.

The war in Korea causes a former GI from Minnesota to raise a question:

Those if us who have been in the Pacific are wondering what happened to all of the equipment we left out there. We've been wondering who gave the order to destroy the tanks on Okinawa, the LST's on Iwo Jima. The reports coming back say, "They have nothing to shoot with. Why?"

Many point fingers at Secretaries Acheson and Johnson.

From a New York minister:

It is the head of the Democratic Party and his Secretary of State who have exposed Korea to its downfall.

From Alabama:

Try to send Mr. Bull-in-a-china-shop Johnson back to private life. His widely advertised economy in the Defense Department has resulted in a disgrace to the military forces.

From Maine:

Secretary Johnson went around the country saying that he was cutting off fat but not muscle, and now its develops that we have the fat but not the muscle.

From Ohio:

We now find we are being given loose and false information. I do not believe Mr. Johnson is capable for what may be ahead.

From Minnesota:

Replace Acheson and Louis Johnson. They have made a sorry mess of things and people have lost faith in these men. If they are allowed to remain we will lose faith in the whole administration.

There can be little doubt that the rank and file of this Nation is aroused and demand action.

This is the first time in the history of the United States that we seem to have completely lost the initiative and seem to be subject to the whim and caprice of an unfriendly foreign power, Russia.

Never before in our history have leadership and wisdom in high places been so lacking, and the Government been rendered so impotent as it is this critical period due to the past mistakes of the administration.

The people of the Nation have spoken. Are their demands to be ignored or are we going to respond to their righteous indignation and act to save our beloved Nation from demoralization brought about by incompetent fumbling, bungling politicians in the administration.

Radio Broadcast of Col. S. W. A. Marshall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks I include the text of a discussion by Col. S. W. A. Marshall, military commentator of the Detroit News. This excellent talk was given by Colonel Marshall over WWJ on Monday, August 7, 1950, which I recommend highly as reading for those citizens interested in the vital problems facing our Nation and the world in this critical hour.

The discussion follows:

Good evening. The hands of the clock stood at about 11:59 for the Eighth Army in Korea last Friday, and have remained there since, the situation not having materially changed.

You all know why it is so late over there. Having made retreat after retreat, according to plan, the Eighth Army at last stood on the line along the Naktong River where planned withdrawals could no longer serve a purpose. Henceforth every plot of ground yielded to the enemy was a sharp knife pressed directly against Eighth Army's jugular.

It was at this time that the President of the United States spoke to a group of White House correspondents. While he spoke, the Eighth Army was waiting with its back to the sea and its front to the devil.

In balance was the great question of whether, having been thrown into war undertrained, undermanned and undergunned, and having had, as General Menoher put it, the hell whipped out of it, Eighth Army would be able to hold to life with its final breath and thereby save the American Nation a shameful and full defeat at the hands of a fifth-rate people.

For about 55,000 men, this was—and still remains—an issue of life and death; for all the rest of us it is, at least temporarily, just a matter of whether the flag will float as proudly as ever and we can keep from hanging our heads. For the strains of their embarrassment were on our hands.

Collectively, they had been given one of the sorriest deals ever handed a lot of men called on to serve their country. They had been ordered to undertake a task they did not understand, with weapons which could not conceivably serve the purpose, under conditions for which the Nation whose uniform they wore had in no wise suitably prepared them.

They were not geared for a fight; their organizational structure, their level of training and their supply discipline were still those of peacetime; they have paid a hard price in lives for these shortcomings.

Yet, in any case, they were pitifully understrength when weighed against the assignment; this, though the barrel's bottom had been scraped to provide Eighth Army with a facade of fighting power. At the moment of action, it was in fact weaker, and the Army as a whole was weaker, in relation to the immediate and world problems which confronted that Army and us than this Nation and its arms have been since colonial times.

These were sobering thoughts to any American. They were particularly sobering thoughts to those millions of Americans, now in civil life, who having in times past served their country in war, feel toward the situation of our countrymen in Korea only that awful futility which grips men when they would like to help but can do nothing. Our chief prop in these times is that, in spirit, this host is ready as ever.

But it was not of these things that the President spoke while the Eighth Army waited and hoped.

He picked that hour to tell the Eighth Army and the people who are behind it, and are sweating and praying for it, that Defense Secretary Johnson is not only all right, but triple-plated, superduper all right in his eyes.

No one could have cavilled at a little pat on the back for a Secretary who is having more missiles heaved his way currently than an African dodger at a country carnival.

But the President went far beyond that; he said that Louis Johnson would keep his job and continue to manage the security machinery of the United States so long as he remained in the White House. No matter that Louis Johnson said 3 months ago that we had all the military strength we need, and that events have proved only the vanity of this boast. * * * No matter that he said 5 months ago that if an enemy struck at 4 a. m. some day, we would be ready by 5 a. m., and that that has already proved to be the longest 1 hour in our history. No matter that he put away in mothballs carriers now sorely needed in the Pacific action. * * * No matter that 1 year ago he demolished infantry training divisions just beginning to do a job of reestablishing the field power of the United States. No matter that last fall he let the pruning knife sweep through the armories and cut away an irreplaceable percentage of that small crew of experts who knew how to condition tanks, get artillery out of the grease and send it on its way, and unlock the secret improved recoil mechanisms for Army and Navy guns. No matter that under Louis Johnson our field training exercises have looked more like a workout for PIO officers and news cameramen than a pass at the serious business of readying men for war. The man is all right; he is a very all right.

He is indeed! This is to his credit, if this is what we want, that he took over a generally inefficient and confused combined establishment and in 18 months shook it down until most of the guts and fire had been shaken out of it.

There are thousands of good men in it—men who in other days were not afraid to think along original lines and act according to their thinking. There is less of the spirit of challenge in them today than was ever before to be found in the American armed force. They know their master's voice and they sit there like the terrier at the phonograph waiting for something to come out of the horn.

No one of sound mind would say that this is all Louis Johnson's fault; but to say that he is without fault in the matter is to ascribe to his critics a venom and sinister political motive which they obviously do not possess. And now he has been told that he is good "for the duration."

That is one way of saying that, with impunity, he can double in spades every one of his incredible mistakes, regardless of who pays the price. That is the way of it.

But once upon a time there was a sense in this country that public office was a public trust. This meant that given a post of ultimate responsibility, any man was entitled to hold it so long as the people had satisfaction and confidence in his stewardship. That, but no more than that.

In the midst of crisis, Americans in former days could rally with a patriotic stirring to the ideal: "My country—right or wrong." Can the bonds of a strong spiritual unity, whence comes action, endure if in the midst of war we are given only the precept: "My man—right or wrong"?

After all, it is our Government; it is not a trusteeship; it belongs to the people; by law it is accountable to the people; their fate is at stake in its every act; their blood must pay for its failures; it cannot endure except as they possess it and take pride in that possession.

Were these things not so, young Americans would not be dying now among the hills and rice paddies of Korea in behalf of ideals which they have scarce had time to understand.

That is why the rifleman crouches in a foxhole while the bullets graze overhead; it is not to liberate South Korea, but to keep high the torch of freedom in its main dwelling. Each of these men has to face his final risk on a day-to-day basis. For every mistake made, a terrific price is exacted.

Is it just, is it decent that any higher hand touching the policy which may make or break such men should be judged and found other than on his own day-to-day record, rather than according to a promise that he will still be around in 1952?

This may seem a far cry from the war which I am supposed to be discussing. I argue, on two grounds, that it is not. First, that during World War II, we found that it was hard enough at best to rally American combat men to any real conviction that the main stakes were worthy of a life-and-death gamble; they still loved the square in the old home town, but they had become a bit cynical about the system under which they lived.

Second, the crucial struggle of today is the fight for men's minds. There is no point spending additional billions to beam messages to the enslaved masses of the world if we keep saying the wrong things to ourselves, and miss repeated opportunity for a strengthening of the common faith.

This is not a fight to put communism down; it is a fight to keep democracy up and to expand the ranks of those who continue to believe to the last punch and bell that freedom is the main thing.

We possess no special secret which can inveigh against those truths of history to which all people are subject. There is strong following only when the light burns strongly up ahead. Either we set a higher standard, or the standard we have will go down.

It would be a bad thing for us if the Eighth Army were to lose its final battle. But it would be a worse thing if there were to be defeated on this shore those possibilities of more perfect union and more courageous dedication which mature in a free people only when they know that their leading is the best possible.

In a sense other than the one intended, the Pentagon spoke perhaps far more wisely than it knew these recent days when it declared that Korea would not be another Dunkerque. True enough, that reference was to an army that in other days was beaten where it stood, and had to return, weaponless, to its home shore. But the other half of the story was that Lord Gort's army got back to a people already thrice armed because they knew what they wanted to do and were getting from their government and its leaders clear orders, steadying action, and some of the most stirring words ever said by men.

No, this isn't likely to be another Dunkerque, win, lose or draw. As greatly desperate as is the situation of the Eighth Army along its last river front, they need to hold on over there, for our own good even more than for the good of themselves, that we may again come to understand that holding on is the main thing, whether it be to old and tested ideals or to a fresh package of ground. This is the great virtue that one great example might inject into our cautious and careful manner of life.

Diocletian, cultivating lettuce in Salerno, said, "You cannot have butterflies in the summertime unless you are willing to feed worms in the winter." And if our eyes are open, we should now understand what he was talking about.

Is International World Student Congress Communist Controlled?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to state that my attention has been called to a press dispatch of August 15 stating that an American delegation attending the International World Student Congress in Communist-controlled Prague led the assembly in a demonstration in honor of Communist North Korean Lt. Col. Kan Buk, who told the gathering that his country had been attacked by the United States. He asked the congress to condemn the war criminals. The congress then adopted a resolution condemning the United States for imperialist aggression and the mass bombardment of peace-loving Korean population, for which the American delegation voted.

I rise for the purpose of raising certain pertinent questions. Why did the State Department, which has discretionary powers in such matters, grant passports to this delegation whose purpose it was to blacken the name of the United States before the world in a time of war? What punitive action, if any, will be taken against members of this traitorous delegation who consciously stabbed our boys in the back?

I propose to ask the State Department for the names of the members of this anti-American delegation so that the country may know who they are. It is high time that Communists be deprived of the privilege of traveling abroad on their nefarious and traitorous business in which they now engage with the official permission of the State Department.

The Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Loveland Reporter-Herald, August 17, 1950, on the Korean war:

AMERICA THE GOOF-ICAL

So you are not too happy about this war in Korea? So you are not so sure it was necessary? So you can't understand how we came to get mixed up in it anyway?

Well, it doesn't seem just that your son should be lying with a bit of shrapnel in his spine in some Korean rice paddy if there had been another way out. Surely the war was not of his making. It was not he who helped create the conditions that brought it on. Even if he had recognized those situations, he probably would have been too young to have voted against them. But he is paying the price as our boys always have paid the price.

Right now we are in a war—a war that may be over in the short matter of months or may drag on interminably until the whole world is engulfed in the holocaust. Unfortunately we Americans cannot necessarily determine now how long or how horrible it will be. That answer will be written in the Kremlin. Ours only is the obligation to face the exigency, regardless of cost or sacrifice. Our national honor was challenged in Korea and our future was jeopardized when Russia flung down the gantlet. It is said we should not look back, but forget the past and face the terrible ordeal ahead.

Perhaps. But if America ever is to cease being silly and stop making the same mistakes over and over again for no good reason, then perhaps a little looking back might be beneficial. Even a little sober perusal of an old history book might be productive of some thoughts that have escaped the proponents of the new world thinking.

Japan took our scrap iron and threw it back at us in bullets and shrapnel. We gave Russia boxcars, airplanes, industrial experts, and weapons of war. Our tanks and our payment is sudden death. We didn't know? We didn't suspect? Why? Is there no American intelligence service? Has our military no eyes or ears? Is our State Department entirely oblivious of world thinking or world intentions? Why was the military caught flat-footed in Korea?

Obviously many half answers can and are given for our failures and our Pearl Harbors. When we catch an Alger Hiss red-handed it is merely a "red herring." When our atomic secrets are stolen from under our very noses it takes years before the politicians will admit to the defalcation.

Not too many years ago our own America permitted Korea to be severed in twain. We almost insisted that the Soviet Union take half. No so long ago we had conferences at Yalta and Potsdam and we asked for Berlin but gave Ivan the key to the gate. Ivan, we were told, was "good old Joe."

Certainly, this is a complicated world and its problems are many and complex. But certainly also it would seem that a little simplified thinking in high places is going to be necessary if this Nation is to survive.

Electric Power Available in Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, electric power is a vital factor in the overall mobilization of industry in the national defense effort. Detroit, Mich., played an important part in providing the tanks, the automobiles, the planes, the ammunition, and other essentials necessary to win World War I and World War II. In short, the fate of our national defense must of necessity depend much upon the great industrial city of Detroit and its environs. In these circumstances, it is reassuring to know that there is plenty of electric power available in the Detroit area.

Pursuant to unanimous consent granted me by the House, I am including herein, as a part of my remarks a press release by the public information division of the Detroit Edison Co., on August 13, 1950, which is as follows:

"There is plenty of electric power available here in Michigan's industrial heart to carry out the area's full share of the Nation's new defense production program," Detroit Edison President James W. Parker said today.

There is available as much power as can be used when industrial plants take up their allotted share of the defense production loads, he said. In most instances, manpower will be the limiting factor. With every employable person in the area on the job, there will be enough electric horsepower to go around.

Parker declared there would be—just as during the last war—enough power to take care of the defense program without curbing either residential or farm use of electricity. He said the electric industry as a whole will have power to meet the country's needs provided no governmental restrictions are imposed which would retard the construction program now under way.

"Even though new peaks of demand have been reached during 1950," the Edison president said, "our capacity is advancing well ahead of use."

Present capacity of the Edison Co. is about 1,500,000 kilowatts—roughly 2,000,000 horsepower. This includes the 200,000 kilowatts added recently at Trenton Channel. Two new turbogenerators which will go into service at Conners Creek within a year will bring capacity to 1,750,000 kilowatts.

Also important are the interconnections with others. Between Consumers Power and the Edison Co. the interconnections have been tripled to strengthen Michigan's overall electric supply system.

Parker also announced that construction will soon start on a project to add another 250,000 kilowatts. Originally scheduled in part at an existing plant, this addition may, in view of recent events, require the building of a new plant.

The company's revised expansion plan will enable it to keep longer in service three older generators which were slated for retirement before the outbreak of trouble in Korea, Parker explained.

"I hope present stepped-up expansion of the Nation's electric power will not be interrupted," Parker said. "It is vital that the Government should cooperate in private power company expansion plans."

The present Edison expansion target is 1,850,000 kilowatts by 1953 or before. This represents an increase of more than 750,000 kilowatts since 1945.

Parker said this goal has been set with an eye to maintaining year-round, around-the-clock industrial production—either for armament or for whatever the Nation calls upon the Detroit area to build.

Commenting on Nation-wide power adequacy, Parker said reports of the entire electric industry show that power supply in most parts of the country is geared to keep well ahead of both industrial and civilian needs. This takes the defense production program, as now known to the industry, fully into account.

Electric generating capability today is nearly double that of 1941, totaling 66,000,000 kilowatts. Since World War II 16,500,000 kilowatts have been added. Another 18,000,000 kilowatts at least will be available by the end of 1953, according to present estimates.

At present, 80 percent of the Nation's electric power is being generated by investor-owned companies, whose systems have been built entirely with private capital.

Parker reiterated his hope that Government limitations would not halt scheduled expansions. Most electric companies' expansion programs have been speeded up since the United Nations undertook the task of driving the Communists out of South Korea.

Confidence was again expressed by Parker that the interconnected power systems of the United States are well prepared to cope with added defense loads. "The light and power industry has made tremendous strides since the end of World War II," he said. "The national power situation is good—and don't let anyone tell you otherwise."

Veterans' Loans in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have just received information from Gordon A. Huseby, director of the Department of Veterans' Affairs of the State of Wisconsin, that the Wisconsin Department of Veterans' Affairs, in 9 months, has either completed or committed funds for 1,271 housing loans for a total of $1,905,600. This represents a remarkable record for the first 9 months of operation of this work.

It is interesting to note how this record compares with the record of Federal agencies in making loans to veterans and other individuals. During the first year of its operation—1935—the Federal Housing Authority completed 255 loans in the State of Wisconsin. During the first year of its loan operations—1945—the Veterans' Administration completed 628 loans in the State of Wisconsin.

As Mr. Huseby aptly put it in a letter dated August 16, 1950: "I think our record will stand on its own."

Kansas Democrats Reject Brannan Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am herewith including an article by Mr. A. L. Shultz, able and well-known political commentator for the Topeka State Journal. Mr. Shultz's syndicated column of political comment is carried every week by a large number of Kansas newspapers, both daily and weekly. In his latest column Mr. Shultz analyzes the part which the Brannan farm plan played in the defeat of Carl V. Rice, Democratic National Committeeman, in his contest for nomination for the United States Senate. The article is as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., August 16.—Kansas Democrats who plan an elaborate and expensive all-out drive for handsome Paul Aiken for the United States Senate as the gold-rimmed, diamond-studded champion of the lofty principles of President Truman will start the campaign with red faces.

Mr. Aiken surprised a great many people in his smashing defeat of National Committeeman Carl V. Rice for the senatorial nomination. The victory was hailed as a glorious triumph for the man in the White House, who is a close friend and confidant of the nominee. There was no secret about Mr. Aiken's resignation as an assistant postmaster general and his return to Kansas to take Mr. Rice definitely and maybe permanently out of circulation as a potent factor in party affairs. Mr. Aiken was a master workman. All credit for his triumph, though, was placed at the President's door, and nobody was denied access to the secret that his candidacy was at Mr. Truman's personal request.

The senatorial campaign pattern, which was developed almost before the vote count in the 2,793 precincts in the State had been completed, was one to uphold the hands of the President in all things. Now, the vote tabulations reveal, the load that has been placed on Mr. Aiken's shoulders will not be easy to carry as the November election approaches. The very resourceful and capable Mr. Aiken, who got his lessons in political skill at the knee of the genial James A. Farley, waged his preprimary campaign almost entirely on the necessity of removing Mr. Rice to a spot of absolute oblivion. He went very little beyond that point except in his expressions of devotion and loyalty for President Truman. In the meantime Mr. Rice conducted an aggressive campaign, sponsored Fair Deal philosophies without qualifications or reservations and almost daily stressed the thought that the Brannan farm price-control plan had come almost directly from Heaven.

On the farm policy Mr. Aiken adroitly had little to say. He was friendly to the farmer. He was ardently for the laborer who was to receive lower food costs while the farmer got high commodity prices under the plan boosted by his opponent, Mr. Rice. When Mr. Aiken spoke he never mentioned Secretary Brannan's name. And he was wise beyond normal reason. He rode the fence on the Brannan plan and came through the campaign without saddle sores, but with the senatorial nomination in his inside coat pocket.

Now, the returns reveal, Carl Rice's enthusiastic endorsement of the farm-price-support plan as presented by the Secretary of Agriculture, probably cost him the senatorial nomination. The big wheat-growing area of Kansas turned thumbs down on Mr. Rice. That, in simple analysis of the primary returns, was nothing short of a protest against the Brannan plan.

Mr. Aiken won by being noncommittal on the subject. But the hurdle he must take is in the weeks ahead. The Brannan plan, loudly praised at the White House and by Democratic leaders in many sections of the land, is coming into the campaign as big as the giraffe at the circus. Mr. Aiken's stout endorsement of the President and his philosophies will hardly be able to ride around the commodity-price-fixing program on a greased track. So the voting areas where Mr. Rice was weak and Mr. Aiken was strong will certainly require adjustments to meet conditions as the campaign progresses. Some day Mr. Aiken must get on the line for or against the farm-price plan.

It is decidedly interesting to observe that in 22 of the big wheat-growing counties of the State, Democratic voters registered protests against the champion of the Brannan plan in the August 1 primary. Not only did they vote a definite "no" regarding Mr. Rice's candidacy, but they rolled up a 3-to-1 majority for Mr. Aiken. That was for the 22 counties. In a number of other counties, the Aiken majority was staggering. In all those 22 counties—complete but unofficial—the party vote for Mr. Aiken was 6,768 as against 2,261 for Mr. Rice. That's 3 to 1 as straight as the crow flies.

The Brannan plan was clearly and definitely the top-flight issue before voters in the Democratic Party which sponsored the program. Its rejection probably is the most significant expression in the primary vote viewed from the national standpoint. It checks with the June 5 Iowa primary when Democratic nominee Loveland went before the voters with Brannan's personal endorsement, plus blessings from the White House and a 100-percent farm-price-support pledge. His meager plurality was 38 percent of the party's primary vote.

Democrats in the Kansas farm belt gave Rice an even more impressive thumping. A plurality carried Loveland to a place on the ticket in a divided field. But Rice, who bared his breast to support the philosophy before the Kansas farmers, lost almost every important grain-growing county in his State—most of them registering emphatic Aiken majorities.

Comanche County, for example, voted 181 to 41 against the Brannan plan champion, Finney County went 6 to 1 against Rice. Lane County testified 104 to 24 for Aiken. Pawnee was 411 to 80. Stafford County was against Rice better than 9 to 1. Wichita County Democrats voted 230 for Aiken, 19 for Rice.

Majorities of 2 to 1 were a common pattern out in the area where the farmers and small-business men have been doing serious, sober thinking about Washington controls. Carl Rice, who had put his head knowingly and deliberately on the political block, almost has his brains knocked out as a reward for stalwart endorsement of one of Mr. Truman's pet proposals. Paul Aiken observed the mauling from the sidelines. His comments regarding the farm problem went only to expressions of friendship for the men who plan and harvest the crops or watch their grain wrecked by hail, floods, and hot winds.

Campaign workers will give great heed to voter expression in the recent primaries. Because of the tremendous importance of Kansas as a grain-growing State, reactions of Democrats in their recent voting is a matter of major concern. There was a specific and clear-cut pattern for the farm belt generally and the big wheat-growing counties particularly. Their answer to the Brannan plan appears to have been a clear cut "No."

All of this is decidedly interesting and for November election day results, highly important. Paul Aiken, colorful, likable, handsome, and resourceful emissary of the President, however, is on a spot. His skillful evasion of definite expression for or against the Brannan proposal enabled him to win an impressive primary day victory. The big tussle, though, is in the weeks ahead. You can do a not of speculating as to just the manner in which the skillful and thoroughly trained Mr. Aiken will uphold the hands of the President while peddling his campaign wares to the Kansas grain growers.

Congress Too Timid on Income Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Des Moines Register which I believe reflects the thinking of a great majority of Americans:

CONGRESS TOO TIMID ON INCOME TAXES

Federal personal income taxes are going up sharply, probably beginning October 1. The Senate Finance Committee has approved a bill which will boost rates as much as 20 percent in some cases. Withholding rates on wages and salaries, after exemptions, will rise from 15 percent to 18 percent.

The House and Senate are expected to approve a bill of substantially these specifications.

Congressional tax experts believe such an increase in rates will pull in about $3,000,000,000 more per year in personal income taxes.

This is not enough. It is not nearly enough.

True, Congress is planning to jump the rates on corporation taxes also. But corporation taxes are not as effective antiinflation medicine as personal income taxes. Many of the larger corporations are capable of passing on an increase in taxes to consumers in the form of higher prices.

Moreover, corporation taxes do not reduce purchasing power for consumer goods in the right places.

A wartime tax program should be aimed to cut down the buying power of the whole population in order to curtail demand for consumer goods. This is the only way that inflation can be stopped.

For this purpose, the personal income tax is ideal. It extracts buying power from people on a progressive basis: the higher the income the higher the rate. The machinery is all in operation and requires no new employees. All we need to do is push up the rates.

Excise taxes are very effective at reducing inflationary pressures, also. They take a uniform slice out of the pockets of everyone who buys the article being taxed. The only thing wrong with these taxes is that they bear heaviest on the consumers least able to pay. They make the poorest people bear the heaviest share of the load.

For that reason, excise tax increases should be used sparingly. They should be applied only to specific commodities, the consumption of which must be curtailed to conserve critical raw materials or to conserve labor. Luxury goods are a good place to apply heavier excises.

But we repeal, our main reliance for inflation control must be on the personal income tax. And the present bill in Congress is too timid.

As nearly as can be told now, our defense spending is likely to rise by $20,000,000,000 a year. We should try to get at least half of this from heavier personal income taxes. The other 10 may be obtained by (1) reducing nonmilitary expenses of Government, (2) the general rise in total production which will increase the tax take from given rates, and (3) increases in other taxes.

Congress is aware of the inflation danger, and it is making a good start toward a sensible wartime fiscal program. But it is not yet facing our real needs in personal income taxes.

Our Military Situation in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "We Have Had Our Pearl Harbor But We May Still Be Asleep," written by Edgar Ansel Mowrer, and published in the Boston Herald on Sunday, August 19.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE HAVE HAD OUR PEARL HARBOR, BUT WE MAY STILL BE ASLEEP

(By Edgar Ansel Mowrer)

FRANKFURT, GERMANY, August 19.—After dinner, over a very respectable German brandy, the American official relaxed.

"How do you see the world situation?" he asked me.

"Much better. We have had our Pearl Harbor before the outbreak of war. If we wake up and do what is necessary, we shall, I believe, avoid world war III altogether. The boys who are dying in Korea may be, in the finest sense of the word, the saviors of their country from an unspeakable calamity."

"Check," said the American official. "But are we still not awake."

E. A. M.: "That is how you read the picture?"

A. O.: "How else can you read it? See here. When Korea broke, President Truman electrified the world. Boy, were we proud over here. Things began to buzz. When he demanded ten billion cold from Congress, we felt sure that finally Washington's eyes were open. And then—what a flop."

E. A. M. "How can you say that? Finally, all the free governments are doing something—something pretty big."

FORCE INCREASES

A. O.:"Big as this (disgustedly pointing to a cigarette butt on the tray.) So far as we have heard, the American ground forces are being increased—the regulars, I mean—by just two divisions. Call that pretty big? What an anticlimax. No wonder the Germans are again jittery and turning to the commies."

E. A. M.: "But think of the rest of our military effort. Think of the atom bombs, the huge Air Force, the mighty fleet, we are putting into shape."

A. O.: "I have thought. That's just the trouble. Now I don't say that A-bombs may not win a world war. I just don't know. Furthermore, neither does anybody else. But I know that if they can't, then the United States is sunk if we ever become so crazy as to let Asia and west Europe go. Are these places—are the only powerful friends we've got in the world—going to be protected by airplanes and ships? They aren't. If Korea shows anything, it shows that the man on the ground, the infantryman, is still boss. All other weapons exist to support him. We saw it at Okinawa and at Cassino—and forgot it. We see it again in Korea—and call for just two new ground divisions, Mr. Mowrer, that is the way to sure defeat."

E. A. M.: "But we are building up in international ground force of imposing proportions"

A. O.: "Imposing my eye! Against an adversary with 175 ground divisions we plan to defend Europe with a force in being of thirty-five. Defend it where? Not on the Elbe. Not even on the Rhine. Maybe on the Pyrenees."

E. A. M.: "Then you favor rearming the Germans?"

A. O.: "Of course I do. But as matters now stand, we may not have the Germans with us, or at least, not armed in time. I do not say that with the forces we have planned we may not ultimately win a war. In the process we shall have seen Europe occupied and destroyed again. I want to prevent the next war, not win it."

E A. M.: "So what do you propose?"

A. O.: "To prevent the next war, save Europe and have the Germans with us, we shall have to arm and put into Europe and keep there 20 American divisions, at least, as long as the present tension lasts. Those 20 American divisions have to be the hard core of a Western ground force, not of 35 but of about 60 divisions."

E. A. M : "Mostly Germans?"

A. O.: "Of course not. I don't trust the Germans any more than you do. Give them an overwhelming force, they'll begin telling us where to get off. But a reasonable German force of five to seven divisions incorporated into the army of Europe now could not possibly get out of hand. Their presence would keep 80 percent of all Germans on our side. If we put 20 ground divisions in Europe, the Germans 5, then we have a right to expect our European allies to organize and equip those other 35 divisions and pronto. Short of that, I just do not see how we are going to avoid world war III. To avoid getting ulcers, I have accepted that fact and stopped worrying about it. But 60 divisions, of which 20 are American, in Europe will still prevent that catastrophe.

HELP FROM ALLIES

E. A. M.: "I am almost sure you won't get them all. From what I have learned wandering around west Europe, our allies may be able to furnish their 35. If we recruited now—say for Korea—8,000 or 10,000 Germans and trained with the new standard weapons, they could grow into five German divisions. I am afraid Congress will not be willing to station 20 American divisions in Europe. But I agree that 2 new divisions—12 regular divisions in all—are pretty silly. How would you settle for an American ground force of 25 regular divisions, whereof 5 to be stationed in Europe, and the present 25 National Guard divisions, making 50 in all? That would give you, with the Germans, 45 divisions more or less on the danger spot and 20 more in the United States."

The American official knocked the ashes out of his pipe. "That size force," he said slowly, "would not necessarily prevent the next big war—but it might. But by the almighty God, tell them when you go home that nothing less will."

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, a few days ago a bill providing for universal military training was introduced. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD editorials favoring universal military training, published in the Pittsburgh Press, the Philadelphia Bulletin, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, and the Philadelphia Inquirer. I should like to make the statement that the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph, while it has not spoken at this time editorially, informs me that it favors universal military training, as does also the Philadelphia News.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of August 20, 1950]

THE GI'S CAN'T ADJOURN

President Truman would like to have a universal military training law. But he does not wish to press the issue at this Congress session because of the greater urgency of other legislation more immediately related to the fighting in Korea and the limited time for its consideration.

What limited time?

And which is of more concern to the American people: National defense or the forthcoming congressional elections?

The boys in Korea are fighting in temperatures of 100—not working in air-conditioned chambers and offices, as Members of Congress are. They cannot recess or adjourn at will—as Congressmen can.

Congress well can afford to stay in continuous session until every bit of essential legislation has been enacted. Any Congressman who doesn't like the work under those circumstances can quit, which is more than our GI's in Korea can do.

Our troops can't even get the rest they need between battles because we do not have replacements to relieve them. Universal military training will provide replacements if there are any more "Korean" situations, as we fear there may be.

It isn't asking too much of Congress to make sure of that by staying on the job until this legislation has been approved.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of August 18, 1950]

WE NEED UMT NOW

Universal military training has long been urged by the leaders of our armed services as an essential part of a sound program of national security. The President recommended it at the start of his administration and again in January.

The idea was supported by an advisory commission headed by Dr. Karl Compton, which spoke for enlightened public opinion after a close survey of the problem.

The administration had decided not to press for it at this time because of the many other urgent problems, but Secretary Johnson wants to push the matter and the Armed Services Committees of Congress have been asked for instant action, at least on a stand-by basis.

The universal training issue has been a victim of the disposition of Congress to postpone action on contentious issues for political reasons. To many in Congress who approve it on principle, it never seems the right time for action. In a period of war, or of close attention to national defense, other questions, which appear of more immediate concern, get preference. In a period of demobilization and relaxation after immense efforts, nobody wants to urge it on a public seemingly indifferent. It's the old situation of the leaky roof: You can't mend it when it rains, and it doesn't seem so necessary when skies are clear.

However, our experience in Korea has been an eye opener not to take chances in the future with national security, even if they should seem of the calculated risk variety. While opposition has been very vocal, military training has long had the backing of a large majority of the people. A Gallup poll this week shows 78 percent favor it. If we need a strong Army and continuation of selective service, we need UMT.

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette]

ENACT A UMT LAW NOW

Congress ought to enact immediately a law providing for universal military training as requested by the administration.

Our Nation is engaged in a life-or-death defense of western democracy against communism. It cannot compete on anything like equal terms without an adequate reserve of trained manpower comparable to that in Russia.

The only way to provide such a reserve is to require physically and mentally qualified youths between the ages of 17 and 20 to devote a minimum of six months out of their lives to military training.

Until now, opponents of UMT have argued that we have entered into an age of push-button warfare obviating the need of great armies. Military success, it has been contended, would depend more upon scientific achievement than upon manpower.

The war in Korea has knocked the bottom out of that argument. The fact seems to be that no matter how much technical progress is made in this atomic age, wars will still be won or lost on the ground. We simply must have forces sufficient to take and hold land. Manpower will always be a decisive factor, as it is today in Korea.

The question of timing is important in the administration's request for immediate enactment of UMT law. It can give rise to much confusion which we should make the greatest effort to avoid.

Defense Secretary Johnson pointed out in his letter to Congress that we are now engaged in a rapid expansion of military forces on active duty. Obviously, then, we could not spare at this time enough officers and men to plan and launch a UMT program.

Hence, even though immediate enactment of UMT is requested, it is specified that the program would not be initiated until such time as the President may direct. In other words, it would be set up on a stand-by basis.

The timing, then, appears to allow for two considerations. First, it seems to be an acknowledgment that the chances of winning approval of a UMT program are better now, while the country is emotionally keyed up over war in Korea, than they may be once this particular war is over. Even more important, the request takes into consideration the possibility that war in Korea is only a curtain-raiser to a much greater tragedy ahead.

The best way to avoid that tragedy is to provide now for an integrated and balanced system of national security of which UMT is an essential element.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer]

KOREA'S LESSON: NATION NEEDS UMT

Reports of the enormous hardships and savagery our soldiers are facing as the Reds launch another offensive in Korea lend weight to the administration's request for passage of a law requiring intensive military training for American youth.

Our troops in Korea, although they have been reinforced recently, are still outnumbered by the hordes of North Korean Communists hurled against them. They are fighting in murderous heat over rugged terrain. They are slowly getting the weapons whose lack was a big factor in the early retreat.

But it is clear from front-line accounts that many of the men thrown into battle against the Reds were not adequately trained. Many had no combat experience, which was to be expected in an army that fought its last campaigns 5 years ago. Many more lacked the hardening up and training under simulated battle conditions which was the least they—and their country—had a right to expect.

A dispatch from Don Whitehead, Associated Press war correspondent, in the Inquirer yesterday emphasizes that the value of training for the Korean war can hardly be exaggerated. There are some lessons that can be learned only the hard way—not to underestimate the enemy, to be ready for his tactics of infiltration, to be on guard against refugees who turn suddenly with guns blazing.

There are other basic features of combat readiness which can be learned in camp, however. Whitehead stresses the need for physical stamina, for elementary tactics to avoid exposure to enemy fire, and for precautions against being isolated, which might have been learned before the soldiers went to Korea.

It is obvious that training alone can't spell victory in battle. But it is equally obvious that untrained men, no matter how brave, will pay for their lack of training in battle with defeats and needless loss of lives.

The first duty of the Defense Department is to make sure that the men now entering the Armed Forces get the kind of training they will need if they have to be sent up against the Reds in Korea. It is encouraging that the Army began to put its men through rigorous maneuvers under highly realistic combat conditions soon after the Korean war started.

This program must be pressed in all units which may be called upon for action in Korea or anywhere else in the near future.

But a more consistent, long-range program of training for possible future emergencies must be launched if the Nation is to avoid having to send untrained or partly trained men into battle again. For it is increasingly evident that the threat of Soviet communism may continue for years and that it will be necessary to keep our military defenses in readiness as long as that threat exists.

Defense Secretary Louis Johnson's request for immediate passage of legislation granting stand-by power to institute universal military training may seem belated. It clearly represents a switch from the administration's viewpoint voiced a few days ago that this measure should not be pressed at this time.

Most Americans, however, will appreciate the need for this program to train youths of 17 to 20 for military service. It is a necessity from the standpoint of manning our armed services, and it could be of vital importance in saving the lives of our young men by teaching them what to expect if they should have to go to war.

There may be reasons why UMT could not be started immediately. First call on training facilities and experienced officers must go to the units which may be needed in Korea.

But the Korean war has shown us some of the cost of our failure to train American youth. We should not repeat that failure. The universal-military-training program should be passed by Congress and put into operation as soon as possible as a vital factor in protecting both our country and the lives of our young men.

The Big Sleep

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Big Sleep," published in the Wall Street Journal on August 15, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK—THE BIG SLEEP

We have gone from war to war again in the space of 5 years because, as four Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee so truthfully state, two administrations—Roosevelt's and Truman's—slept the big sleep. Today is simply the tomorrow of Yalta and Potsdam.

But there is a bitterer and more important truth. That is that the people themselves were lulled by a magic potion called "bipartisanism." The Republics themselves seemed drugged by it. For too long a time there was no one to cry out that the sentry slept.

And now, once more, there is talk that we should drink it again. Those who venture to criticize the past or present conduct of our affairs, as these Republicans have done, are accused of "playing politics"; we should once more swallow the questions and the critisism, keep the war out of politics and be bipartisan.

Nothing could be more dangerous. And for the proof of it we need look no further than the sorry state of affairs today.

What made Yalta and Potsdam possible? They stemmed first of all from the hallucination that the Communists were pleasant, peaceful people whose only desire was to join the fellowship of nations; and, secondly, from the notion that foreign affairs was a field forbidden to the people, that what the experts and the great leaders did must be accepted without question lest we destroy "unity."

Both were blunders. But what reason did the people have for doubting them at the time? During the war and its aftermath there were few with the courage to strike at the illusion of Communist Russia or to question the wisdom of the great leaders. And the few who did speak were discredited and swept away with the easy slander that even to question was to "play politics."

A man ran for President of the United States in the middle of a war and the plans for peace, yet, in the name of bipartisanism, he would debate neither the war nor the peace. The war won, distinguished and capable men still held to a moratorium on the use of one part of their critical facilities for fear of the fetish of bipartisanism.

The overt blunders, it is true, were committed by Democrats. But where, one may ask, were the Republicans? The Democrats were at least carrying out their function of proposing policy, however ill-chosen the policies. The Republicans, as the minority representatives, were not even carrying out their one and only function, which is to examine, to question, to criticize and upon accasion to oppose.

All these things the Republicans did on domestic matters. But on foreign affairs they slept the sleep of bipartisanism. And then one day we awakened to find that the pleasant oplate was a mickey finn.

Neither the men in Korea nor the rest of us can now escape the consequences of past blunders. But it would be insanity to return to the drug that made them possible, to recommit our destiny into the unquestioned hands of the men who made them.

As never before we need, in the phrase of the four Senators, "to scrutinize relentlessly"—not only what was done but what is done and what is proposed to be done. Our greatest hope is that the four awakened Senators will awaken others and that the people will not again swallow this thing called bipartisanism. Else from the next big sleep we may be suddenly aroused by terrors unimagined.

Cheapest Government in the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, every day we in the United States hear statements in reference to the cost of maintaining our various branches of government, local, State, and Federal. No one can deny that our citizens bear a heavy burden, yet comparative figures indicate that the cost of government in America is relatively low in comparison with the burden of other people throughout the world.

As part of my remarks I include part of a column entitled "Observatorials" from the Coopersville Observer of August 17, 1950. The publisher of the Observer, Mr. L. W. Shears, runs an excellent weekly newspaper in the Fifth Congressional District of Michigan and he is to be commended for publishing such important facts as those contained in the following:

OBSERVATORIALS—CHEAPEST GOVERNMENT IN THE WORLD

One of the chief gripes of the American people is the cost of government—and in view of the terrific increase, especially during the Truman administration, they have reason to register a complaint and to worry about the future.

The other day in reading a recent issue of the United Nations World, official publication of the UN, there appeared an article so challenging that we are using some of the statistics given, in order that we may see something of the other side of the picture.

The article is entitled "The Cheapest Government in the World," and was written by David Cort. Following are the amounts in income taxes paid to the governments by a married man with two children, who has an income of $5,000:

Israel	$2,795
Finland	2,075
Norway	1,840
Belgium	1,660
Denmark	1,500
Sweden	1,500
Netherlands	1,460
England	1,450
Indonesia	1,120
Australia	1,118
Ireland	1,000
India	920
France	840
Switzerland	650
Brazil	600
United States	345
South Africa	317
Hong Kong	130

Now, after you have read this far, is there anyone who would like to trade places with their overseas brethren?

But—here is the question: If we continue to increase the cost of government, and are to pay for the arming and protection of the democratic world—a task that we have undertaken—just what will be the relative position of these countries, say, 5 or 10 years from now?

Overhauling of State Department Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by Mrs. A. D. Lange, of New Augusta, Ind., and published under the headline "Overhauling of State Department Needed," in the Indianapolis Times for August 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A LETTER TO THE PEOPLE—OVERHAULING OF STATE DEPARTMENT NEEDED

(By Mrs. A. D. Lange)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following letter was written by Mrs. A. D. Lange, of Rural Route No. 1, New Augusta, Ind., wife of the president of Pictorial Publishers, Inc., 107 South Capitol Avenue, as a spontaneous expression of her views on the world crisis. Mrs. Lange is not actively connected with any political or civic group.)

What I am about to write will probably bring me criticism and unfavorable publicity because, once the Armed Forces of the Nation are committed, the patriot is supposed to forget personal views and principles and get behind the administration at whatever cost.

In defense of my patriotism most of you who receive this know that my husband and my father fought in World War I. Even now, at age 80, my father is Arizona director of selective service and adjutant general of the National Guard—also, incidentally, a lifelong Democrat. My son was a fighter pilot and my son-in-law an ensign in World War II. We all stand ready to serve again to the best of our ability.

My son and son-in-law are just 25, so theirs will again be active service—which brings me to the reason for this letter.

If my boys have to give up promising careers and again go to war, I want them to have the benefit of support from leadership of unquestioned loyalty and outstanding ability.

To that end and as a beginning I want to see a general overhauling of the State Department.

There is no need to cite examples of the present Department's mistakes. The results of these men's judgment—whether deliberately traitorous or just plain stupid—are clear for all to see. We came out of the last war the strongest nation on earth. Today our boys are dying in a situation strikingly like Bataan. We have little more than a toehold in Asia. Russia is calling the plays.

If the views of MacArthur and General Wedemeyer had prevailed, Manchuria would have been placed under a UN trusteeship, China would not have been lost, and Korea would not now be under attack. Washington was warned more than 3 years ago that the Reds were organizing an army to invade South Korea. But the native troops we trained there were not, according to Gen. William L. Roberts, head of our military mission in Koren, allowed any offensive weapons such as tanks—this on order of our State Department.

MacArthur has had nothing to do with Korea or its defense program for 2 years. But when Truman suddenly reversed the Acheson Asiatic policy MacArthur was given only a few hours to meet an attack the Reds had been preparing for 3 years.

Now MacArthur and boys like my sons are heroically trying to salvage a situation for which our diplomats and politicians are wholly to blame.

There is no less pain for a mother who loses her son, or a wife her husband whether she be Republican or Democrat. Should not Republicans and Democrats all insist that the Achesons, Lattimores, Jessups, Services, et al., be routed from their positions of influence? To replace them there are Democrats and Republicans of unimpeachable honor and ability to choose from.

When our President asks us for the sacrifices necessary to carry this conflict to a successful conclusion, he should show his sincerity of purpose by acknowledging and correcting the tragic mistakes of his administration. Immediate action on his part is vital.

There are others in high places who share the blame for the agony of our outnumbered and poorly equipped men in Korea, but let's take first things first and start with the State Department.

While our boys are winning battles on far off battlefields, the American way of life may be lost in Washington.

Control of Floods on the Connecticut River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a long-range plan to ease and control flood threats by the Connecticut River through the length and breadth of the Connecticut River Valley, covering a highly valuable section of New England.

The plan is outlined in a letter written by George C. Waldo, chairman of the Connecticut State Park and Forest Commission, and sent to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission at Springfield, Mass.

Mr. George Waldo has championed the cause of conservation for many years. Indeed he has been a pioneer protector of our natural resources and is recognized as a public servant dedicated to preserving these resources.

Mr. Waldo's letter sums up briefly the long-range conservation program recommended for the New England area by the United States Forestry Service and the United States Soil Conservation Service. These two agencies cooperated in studying the flood problems caused by the Connecticut River. Their recommendations, as outlined in Mr. Waldo's letter, were drawn up jointly.

I feel the people of my State of Connecticut, as well as those of the other New England States, should be aware of the necessity for controlling flood threats. They should also know how these threats can be checked or completely eliminated. If the recommendations made by Mr. Waldo were followed there would be no need to fear the damage and hardship caused by recurring floods of the Connecticut River.

I agree with Mr. Waldo and the two Government agencies involved here that New England should proceed at once with a reforestation program to prevent further flood damage in the Connecticut River Valley.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 21, 1950.

To the PRESIDENT'S WATER RESOURCES POLICY COMMISSION,
Springfield, Mass.

GENTLEMEN: A study of major flood crests on the Connecticut River as recorded at Hartford, Conn., over a period of nearly three centuries, brings to light two alarming factors. First, that such major floods have greatly increased in frequency in strictly modern times. Second, that they have markedly increased in violence, or high water level.

Between 1683 and 1893 the river averaged one major flood every 12 years.

Between 1905 and 1940 a major flood was incurred every 3½ years.

For the first 200 years of the river's recorded history the major flood crests exhibited a surprising uniformity, an average of 25 feet with 1 or 2 feet plus or minus. Not until November 1927 did the river attain a flood stage of 29 feet at Hartford during the present century. But in March 1936 it rose to 37.6 feet and in September 1938 to 35 feet.

It is hardly necessary to point out that every added foot of flood stage increases the possibilities of damage in geometrical ratio.

While all major floods are due to special weather circumstances such as sudden thaws, or heavy rainfalls, or both, there is nothing in the records of the period covered to show that there has been any increase in the average precipitation during that time. Both of the factors mentioned—the increasing frequency of floods and their increasing magnitude—are due to the same basic causes, namely, the stripping of our woodland cover in the drainage area of the river, thus eliminating much of the old forest floor which once acted as a sponge to hold the water and feed it out slowly, and bad land practices resulting in erosion and gullying and thereby increasing the rapidity of run-off.

From these factors alone it becomes apparent that the flood problem of the Connecticut River Valley cannot be solved by the erection of enormously expensive flood control dams. So long as present conditions are permitted to continue such dams will rapidly lose their capacity by being silted up with eroded topsoil, while increasing flood crests will overwhelm them. In any case, such dams are enormously expensive and utterly wasteful except for the one purpose of holding back major flood crests. They take thousands of acres of productive land and eventually must be dredged at enormous cost to retain any effective capacity. Meantime a great part of the major damage—the erosion of our valuable topsoil—continues unabated.

The only intelligent long-range attack on this program would therefore consist of means for checking floods where they originate, by holding more of the water where it falls in the first place and by checking soil erosion.

To this end I submit a survey of the entire drainage area of the Connecticut River from the Province of Quebec to Long Island Sound together with a plan for checking floods and ending soil erosion, and ask that it be made a part of the records of your commission.

This survey was made by the United States Forestry Service and the United States Soil Conservation Service in cooperation. These two Federal agencies are highly respected for their scientific and objective approach to such problems. Their Connecticut River survey and tentative flood-control plan—a document of 150 pages—covers all factors in great detail.

The two major elements of the flood-control plan can be stated very simply. They consist of the reforestation of all cut over or abandoned land in the drainage area of the river, where reforestation is the highest use to which the land may be put and the practice of modern soil-conservation measures on all cultivated land draining into the river valley.

In reaching their conclusions as to the effect of these measures the two services did not indulge in any guesswork. They sampled the soil in all of the regions drained by the Connecticut River, estimating its water-holding capacity; they measured the extent of the existing forest floor and computed the possible increase both in its area and water-holding capacity; they measured the rapidity of runoff, the extent of soil erosion, and all other factors entering into the problem. They envisage a 50-year program in which erosion will be stopped almost immediately and in which the frequency and intensity of floods will decrease as the forest is restored. The plan offers a permanent cure, not a temporary expedient.

Furthermore, it offers the prospect of immense economic benefit to the whole valley.

For example, the reduction in average annual flood damages would amount to a saving of $1,518,000 a year. The reduction of gullying, protection of fish and wildlife, and stopping of bank erosion would result in a saving of $1,750,000 annually.

The average annual cut of timber on reforested lands, both public and private, would bring an income of nearly $12,000,000 a year. The increase in the value of farm crops because of better soil practices and a higher water table resulting in more luxuriant crops, would amount to nearly $9,000,000 a year. These are direct and measurable benefits which can be closely estimated.

In addition there would be many other benefits, difficult to estimate in terms of dollars and cents because of the great enhancement of the fish and game resources, great increase in recreational possibilities and protection to the natural beauty of the whole region.

I might add that the measures proposed have the effect not only of cutting flood crests but of raising low water levels in the river during periods of drought. This stabilization of water flow would be an immense advantage of all power projects, public and private, on the main stream or its tributaries.

Melting snow or rain water held back at the source by the methods mentioned, sinks into the water table and replenishes it, becoming a source of supply for our springs and brooks between rains and for our private wells or city water systems. And the methods of control suggested for Connecticut's major river are equally applicable to minor streams, and might very well become a pattern of water control for other affected areas.

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE C. WALDO,
Chairman, Connecticut State Park and Forest Commission.

Appointment of Francis S. Murphy to Connecticut Aeronautics Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Bridgeport (Conn.) Post, titled "Mr. Aviation." This editorial pays high and much-deserved tribute to Francis S. Murphy, publisher of the Hartford (Conn.) Times. Mr. Murphy's leadership in the development of aviation in the State of Connecticut is well known from one end of the State to the other, as are his many other contributions to public service. Too often we hear allegations that the taxpayer does not receive his money's worth. As the article points out, we taxpayers have received more than our money's worth from Mr. Murphy's public service.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

MR. AVIATION

Connecticut spends a deal of money annually at which the taxpayers grumble but the State also gets a large amount of free service, concerning which the taxpayers know very little. What the same service would cost the State if compensated at strictly commercial rates we cannot say, but we are sure that the total sum would make the finance department dizzy.

As an example we might consider the reappointment by Governor Bowles of Francis S. Murphy, publisher of the Hartford Times, to the State Aeronautics Commission. When it comes to promoting aviation for the benefit of Connecticut, Mr. Murphy is a one-man whirlwind. He has headed the aeronautics commission since 1946 and far from profiting by the arrangement, has given endlessly of his time, and has spent substantially of his own funds in promoting the cause.

Frank Murphy was responsible to a large degree for the development of Bradley Field near Hartford and recently gave a party there, at which General Eisenhower was the guest of honor, to celebrate the breaking of ground for the new headquarters building. The purpose of the party was not mere jubilation but to impress visitors from other parts of the State with the facilities available at Bradley Field and to invite the maximum use of such facilities.

But being a Hartford man doesn't limit Commissioner Murphy in his geographical outlook. He is equally interested in the promotion of the most modern means of transportation in every part of Connecticut. The commission of which he is chairman—a commission made up of other volunteer citizens like himself—hopes to keep Connecticut in the forefront of aviation not only because the State needs the best transportation facilities possible but because Connecticut industry is a large factor in aviation. The State's industrial payrolls benefit correspondingly.

For this, so far as we know, nobody has said, "Thank you, Mr. Murphy." He doesn't expect to be thanked. A wise person in public service never does.

This May Be Extreme—But

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in today's Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an excellent editorial from the August 4, 1950, edition of the Granite State News.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THIS MAY BE EXTREME—BUT

As the news out of Korea continues to get worse, it is only fair that we stop and take stock of our perilous position. We have been in a dominant position in world affairs so long that it will take some time for us to adjust our thinking.

Since traitors sold us out on the know-how of making the atomic bomb we are now at Russia's mercy if she should decide to attack. Probably the only reason she does not use that weapon at once, is fear of airborne retaliation. On the other hand, she may be waiting until the moment she has a stockpile of sufficient size to permit the smuggling of an atomic bomb into each one of our defense industry centers and the simultaneous exploding of these weapons. With our wide open coast line there is no reason why Soviet submarines cannot land atomic bombs. These bombs can be trucked to our defense cities and triggered off at a given day and hour.

We are at the mercy of the Soviets as to where the next world shaking incident will break out, using up our men, machines, money and material.

We practically handed China to the Reds. Now they have so much manpower that they can run mass infantry attacks at us without bothering to count the cost. A few hundred thousand dead Koreans and Chinamen mean nothing to the men in the Kremlin. A few thousand dead American youths mean everything to us.

So here we are!

Since the close of the Second World War we have been disarming while our enemies have been arming. Everyone knew it except some men in the administration. Our President cut armament costs. When armament costs are cut, disarmament takes place.

There is no use arguing about the Army-Air Force-Navy-Marine Corps now.

The fact remains that the one restraining influence on the Russians is the existence of the great bombers that can come over the roof of the world to use atomic weapons on their cities.

As far as defense of our outposts is concerned our Army is useless unless we can carry the men to the scene of action quickly. They must have the best of equipment and training.

Today we cannot carry our men to the point of combat quickly and when they arrive they do not have the arms or the training.

Today we have developed a civilization with the highest standard of living in the world. Here in New Hampshire we let our fuel wood stand till it falls and rots, for we burn oil. Our farms are going back to the woods again, for we find it cheaper to bring food from the Middle West and South than to raise it ourselves.

There is hardly a family in the State so poor but that it owns a radio, an automobile, an electric washing machine, an electric refrigerator, and hopes to acquire a television set as soon as stations are established. The more well-to-do families have luxuries in proportion.

This is no attack on creature comforts. Easier living and a fuller life are the objectives toward which we all work in one way or another.

But if we are to survive we must begin to change our habits of thought. While we may continue to debate around garages and coffee shops whether the new Hudson or the new Olds has the better automatic transmission, we should also begin to argue as to who has the better tank, ourselves or the Russians. The question as to what is the matter with the Red Sox is most interesting, but a far more vital question is how effective is our national radar screen and if it is in operation? And if not, why not?

We have been living in something of a fool's paradise. Too often the most important problem has been as to whether or not we could afford to buy a second or third radio set for our home. Now we must face grim reality. If we do not, there may be no more radio sets of any kind, and, for all too many cities, no homes to put them in, and no people to live in those homes.

Some citizens, sitting in the lovely quiet of our August New Hampshire countryside may read this editorial and say that it is extreme and alarmist in tone. But Herman Goering told the people of Germany, with sound reasoning, that enemy bombs would never drop on their homes. In 1940 the Japanese military would have laughed at any man who prophesied that American bombers could and would tear the heart out of Tokyo five short years hence.

Peace or War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH HARVEY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Banner, Knightstown, Ind., for August 18, 1950:

PEACE OR WAR?

Many pros and cons are being heard on the Korean situation, and whatever anyone may decide, the international situation at the present writing looks anything but rosy.

For a Nation that has supposedly been indoctrinated with peaceful thinking, the United States in the past 12 years has changed to being a warring Nation—even if it is in defense of ideals and territory. It even now appears that our troops, our tanks, our planes will be expected now, and in the future, to police the entire world against communistic aggression. Not a pleasant thought, is it?

Yet, that is exactly the role the United States has adopted internationally.

The shrewd, chess-playing Russians are not to be underestimated in their ability. Their strategy appears to be that of wearing us down by degrees until we are incapable of denying them.

If the United States is going to plunge into the thick of international controversies, let's get prepared and in a hurry. If the United States is to be the police power of the world, we must expect trouble from now on, and the only thing which can preserve this Nation is preparedness—whether we like it or not.

Frankly, the United States was sold down the river when our leaders naively placed reliance in Russia and cooperated with that nation by sending her tanks, planes, food, ammunition, etc., during the last war and then conceding her every wish at the conference table.

Now our innocent blunders are going to provide a light to the finish.

In Washington today, our lack of leadership, which the American people chose in 1948, may be our downfall. An example is the way the President is playing politics and looking toward the November elections while our soldiers are dying in a merciless campaign in Korea. At a time when we need administrative and organizing ability, along with diplomacy, we're sadly lacking.

The only thing we can do, however, is give our very best in the war effort and the defense preparations, and even though our present leadership is weak, America's preservation demands the united efforts of everyone toward the common goal of liberty.

Construction of School Facilities in Areas Affected by Federal Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD BREEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to set forth a few reasons why Senate bill 2317, a bill relating to the construction of school facilities in areas affected by Federal activities, is extremely important at this time and deserves the support of this body.

The immediate vicinity of Dayton is one of nine districts in the State of Ohio in which Federal activities have caused a tremendous increase in the school population. This increase is over and above the power of the real-estate tax duplicate to carry.

The increase in school population without an accompanying increase in the size of the real-estate tax duplicate has resulted: First, from loss of taxable land because of Government acquisition; second, presence of tax-exempt Federal housing; and, third, an influx of new population.

Such a condition is present in the Mad River Township school district, which is adjacent to the east boundary of the city of Dayton. On the other side, Mad River Township is bounded by the Wright-Patterson Air Force Base. Its area is 11.7 square miles. Its population in 1939 was less than 4,000. Today Mad River Township has a population of roughly 20,000.

This has resulted in a tremendous increase in the school population. This increase is so tremendous that it far exceeds the tax revenues, and as a result the school system there is in a distressed and critical condition.

I would like to cite one example. Harshman and Overlook Homes projects of 1 040 living units have added 1,000 children of school age to the township school system.

The school census has increased from 836 in 1939 to 2,980 at the beginning of the last school term. The tax duplicate has also increased, but at not such a rapid pace—$2,610,240 in 1939 to only $4,215,568 at the opening of the 1949–50 school term.

Brought down to simple terms, this means that the taxable wealth per pupil has been reduced from $3,122 to $1,880. In other words, the enrollment has increased 222 per cent, the taxable wealth to support schools 36 percent.

The increase in school population had resulted in a shortage of classrooms and other facilities. This has become so acute that it has become necessary to limit some 1,600 elementary pupils to half-day sessions and to "farm" out to other districts nearly 500 high-school students.

In Mad River Township alone two elementary-school units and a complete high-school unit are needed, but the district is bonded almost to the legal limit set by the State of Ohio. Through the acquisition of land for Federal activities, taxable wealth of $1,111,230 has been lost to the district.

To add to this present condition, within the same district some 1,000 Wherry housing units are to be constructed within the next year. This will increase the school enrollment by another 800 students, according to the best estimates.

Congress must give some aid and remedy to school districts such as Mad River Township. This can be done through S. 2317.

GOP Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer on August 4, 1950, entitled "GOP Opportunity."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOP OPPORTUNITY

The Truman administration's inconsistencies and crimes of omission and commission in far-eastern policy have been under unceasing Republican attack in Congress since Korean Red troops crossed the line in late June.

Representative LAWRENCE H. SMITH, of Wisconsin, member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, has laid before his colleagues a detailed report on testimony given to the committee by General Marshall, when he was Secretary of State, and by generals and admirals. It reveals that the military men and the administration were in agreement that our troops should be withdrawn from Korea and that we should not intervene if the southern republic were invaded.

We quote from the record.

"Mr. JUDD. If North Korea and Manchuria should be taken over and organized by the Communists, do you think our position in Korea would long be tenable?

"Secretary MARSHALL. I think it would not be tenable."

* * * * *

"Mr. RICHARDS. I just want to ask one question, is it your position that it would not be wise to keep troops in Korea?

"General TIMBERMAN. Yes, sir; it would not be wise.

"Admiral WOOLRIDGE. I concur.

"General HAMILTON. I concur fully, and that has been the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It has been unanimous. There has been no difference so far as I know."

On the same day that Representative SMITH was making this testimony available in the House, STYLES BRIDGES was reviewing far-eastern policy by means of other materials in the Senate. He began with the State Department's China white paper, which he called a product of the thinking of Philip C. Jessup—our American Ambassador at Large—whose personal prejudices and those of his associates against the Republic of China are too well known to require further comment." He went on to remind his colleagues that Jessup's last trip to south Asia was delayed while he testified for Alger Hiss.

Then Senator BRIDGES traced some of the steps by which Formosa and Korea were written off by the Truman administration as part of a policy which fed all of China to the Russian bear.

On January 5 President Truman gave impetus to the policy by releasing a State Department bulletin which said: "The United States Government will not pursue a course which will lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China. Similarly, the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa."

Secretary Acheson followed up 1 week later by warning against "foolish adventures" in the Far East, and proclaimed to the world that Korea was not included in American defense plans, an act which has been severely criticized as constituting an invitation to Red Koreans to take over.

Over in the House again, Representative VORYS, of Ohio, was pointing out that Korea was peculiarly the child of the United States, Britain, and China by virtue of the Cairo and Potsdam agreements. He reminded his colleagues that up to June 30, 1949, the American Army provided Korea's defense and American funds bolstered its economy.

VORYS went on to show that Owen Lattimore strongly advised the disastrous course we have followed since June 30 of last year. VORYS quotes Lattimore as recommending: "The thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall, but not let it look as though we pushed it." And in a memorandum to Jessup, according to VORYS, Lattimore said: "South Korea is more of a liability than an asset to the interests and policy of the United States. * * * The United States should disembarrass itself as quickly as possible of its entanglements in South Korea."

The administration, we see, withdrew military aid from Korea and excluded it from our defense zone. Then, when the invasion so often discussed and long expected came to pass, it turned around and intervened. It is quite obvious that by adopting one policy and following another, we have fallen into unnecessary perils and military difficulties.

The tragic events of the last 5 years set forth clearly the duty and responsibility of the Republican Party. While giving unstinted support to war mobilization, which the Republicans are doing, they must formulate a complete and specific program for American participation in world affairs.

Let them state what we will do when we have driven the invaders back to the thirty-eighth parallel. Let them state what our policies should be elsewhere. So far, unfortunately, they have been more critical than constructive.

But if they will come forth with a complete and sensible foreign program, they will capture national confidence, and help save the Nation from bungling tragedy.

Clear and Present Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY O. STAGGERS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Spirit of Jefferson Advocate for August 17, 1950:

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

This newspaper has contended for some time that we ought to be careful in our zeal to suppress the insidious evil of communism, lest in being overzealous we suppress some of the basic liberties guaranteed to us by the constitution. It was for that reason we opposed the shameful acts of Senator MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, in conducting a witch hunt on Capitol Hill with utter defiance of the rules of fair trial and fair play. It is for the same reason that we have always been hesitant to endorse any type of legislation which infringes on our civil liberties.

Now we are faced with the grave question of deciding whether legislation designed to curb the teaching and preaching of communism constitutes an encroachment on the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech.

The first amendment of the Federal Constitution prohibits Congress from making any law abridging the freedom of speech. The Supreme Court has held time and time again that the fourteenth amendment is a similar prohibition against the respective States. Superficially, it would therefore appear that any Federal or State legislation designed to limit and curb the teaching and preaching of communism would be in direct conflict with the constitutional prohibition, and therefore invalid. Such an interpretation would mean that the only way Congress or the States could curtail communistic activity, short of overt and treasonable conduct, would be by repeal of the first and fourteenth amendments. But, fortunately, court interpretation has not been so literal.

The late Justice Holmes has said that when there is a clear and present danger of a substantive danger which Congress has a right to prevent, then Congress may pass legislation which, but for the presence of the clear and present danger, would otherwise be invalid. In other words, the Communists cannot hide behind the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech contained in the first and fourteenth amendments, and in so doing seek to overthrow the Government which Congress has a clear right to preserve by such legislation as may be necessary. The freedom of speech guaranty cannot and should not be prostituted in such a manner as to obtain the elimination of the basic freedom it guarantees.

There is certainly ample justification for the statement that international communism constitutes a clear and present danger, and that therefore its disciples are not protected by the letter or spirit of the Constitution in the espousal of their cause. Inasmuch as the legal power to suppress the doctrine is present by virtue of its exclusion from the constitutional guaranty, the only question remaining is the question of the practical or political expediency of doing so. In other words, the question is not whether the Congress can legislate against further Communist missionary work, but whether Congress should legislate in such a manner.

We are of the opinion that Congress should so legislate. We are brought to this opinion by the realization that we are engaged in a struggle to the death with a dangerous and sinister force that will stop at nothing to realize its objective. To allow such a force freedom of action in our society would seem to us comparable to arming the enemy we seek to destroy. We therefore advocate legislation designed to outlaw the Communist Party, to deny the right of free assembly to those groups who assembly for the purpose, direct or indirect, of advocating the overthrow of this Government, and to deny all constitutional guaranties, except that of a fair trial, to all those who advocate the overthrow of this Government by force.

We are fully aware that such a course will involve serious encroachments on the basic civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution, but in our opinion treasonable utterances are part of treasonable acts, and therefore not entitled to the constitutional cloak.

Doctors and Dentists for the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY O. STAGGERS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Mineral Daily News-Tribune, Keyser, W. Va., for August 16, 1950:

Since Congressman HARLEY STAGGERS reads this department, we'll use the Colyum to air our views on a sore spot with us, rather than write him a personal letter.

As each day goes by we're getting more and more burned up at the way all those doctors and dentists who were educated by the Government during World War II are avoiding military service now. According to a recent United Press dispatch, there were 4,500 men who were picked out by the armed services during the last war and educated into doctors, dentists, and veterinarians.

Many of these men never served a day after graduation. The war was over and they went right into private practice. What's more, only 43 of them even took Reserve commissions, according to the UP story.

It was the taxpayers' money that educated these men. They were given everything free, room, board, tuition—and were even paid. It seems to us they owe their Government something.

But are they responding to the urgent pleas for their services in the Army, Navy, and Air Force? Apparently not.

Under existing laws, only those 43 out of the 4,500 can be called to active duty. The others can continue their practices in private life, while hard-working doctors and dentists, many of whom made sacrifices to educate themselves, are being called back.

What to us would be a popular action, would be for Congress to pass a special law, requiring that all doctors, dentists, and veterinarians who were educated under the Army specialized training program be put into service first, whether they belong to the Reserve or not.

It's the only fair thing to do.

It was back in October of 1945 that we, and several thousand others, were back on Clark Field in the Philippines sweating out our return home. The war was over, but transportation was scarce.

One of those anxiously waiting to get home was a dentist friend of ours from Syracuse, N. Y. Doc had been overseas almost 4 years. He had followed the long, torturous route from the Solomons, up New Guinea, through Morotai to Luzon. He had had a real tour of duty.

One day he received a letter from his wife, but before he was halfway through it, he slammed it on the floor and started swearing in true soldier fashion.

"What's the trouble, Doc?" we asked.

"Here I am over here in these so-and-so islands for almost 4 years," he muttered. 'I gave up a good practice back home to help my country. And what do I get for it? The Army picks out a neighbor of mine, sends him to dental school and educates him free. The war is over just about the time he graduates. And now he has opened up an office and is practicing in the same block where my office is."

And chances are, if the law isn't changed, Doc will be called back into service before his charity-educated competitor.

Business-as-Usual War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Joseph Alsop from today's Washington Post:

WITH UNITED STATES FORCES IN KOREA.—Our thin lines here in Korea are held by increasingly exhausted troops, whose customary rest is a few moments of troubled sleep in a ditch or foxhole.

When these men attack, their first task is to scale precipitous mountain heights in blazing heat under enemy fire. And when they are attacked, which is more usual, it is by a seemingly omnipresent enemy skilled in mountain fighting, fatalistically tenacious and vastly more numerous.

Add to that the want of reserves, which makes it necessary to keep even the worst-mauled divisions in the line indefinitely, with almost no relief. It may then be understood why this Korean fighting is as cruel and disheartening as any that American troops have known, despite our improving ground-fire power and complete air supremacy. And it is then also understandable why anyone who has been with these Americans at the front, grows bitterly indignant at the all too visible signs of business-as-usual in the rear areas.

These unpleasing hints of continuing complacency and political-mindedness take two well-refined forms. First, things are not being done that obviously ought to be done—almost all our huge trans-Pacific air transport and ocean cargo capacity is still given over to profitable commerce and a luxurious tourist trade, while reinforcements and supplies are long and breathlessly awaited in Korea.

Second, and almost worse, the real gravity of the situation here in Korea is still being elaborately concealed from our people at home—the dreadful toll of the fighting is being hidden, for example, by greatly delaying announcement of totals of known dead, missing, and wounded.

Nor is this all. In two previous reports in this space, the hard fighting on the Chinju approaches, the first American offensive action in Korea, has been described at some length. While well conducted as an exercise, it must now be added that in the outcome this tough and painful American effort seems to have served no visible military purpose whatever.

At heavy cost, our men fought their way forward. They had hardly reached their objective on the heights above Chinju when they were recalled again and with bitter anger retraced their steps to the same positions where they had jumped off.

When all the facts are known, this maneuver will seem an imitation of the "good old Duke of York who had 10,000 men, who marched them up the hill and marched them down again." In other circumstances, we might have afforded a sally to probe the enemy's reaction, even at considerable cost. But in this case the potential reserves that were so desperately needed to bolster our thin line were gravely impaired in value. Little was added to the security of our main Korean harbor, Pusan (although this excuse will also be offered), since our actual defensive position is now almost exactly the same as it was before. Meanwhile we lost the immediately valuable Pohang airstrip at the other end of the beachhead.

And in the face of these facts, one of the highest possible authorities has frankly admitted that the real motive of the fighting on the Chinju approaches was that we needed a victory.

In brief, in the area involved, the North Koreans had only their somewhat understrength Sixth Division, with limited artillery, almost no armor and no air support at all. In contrast, besides many tanks and powerful air support, it has already been published that we had in this fighting the First Marine Brigade and the Fifth, Thirty-fifth, and Twenty-fourth Regimental Combat Teams, with all their many attached units.

We enjoyed, therefore, a manpower superiority of at least 1½ to 1; a superiority in tank and artillery firepower of at least 4 and perhaps 5 to 1; an estimable advantage in a strong, wholly unopposed air effort, and an incomputable superiority in transport and supply. In interpreting these facts, special allowances must be made for certain special circumstances, such as the absolute greenness of some of the key American outfits involved. Yet what still stands out is the great weight we had to muster in order to overwhelm one division of the enemy.

With 15 divisions now in the field, the North Koreans are more likely to take heart than lose heart from their Chinju defeat.

Of course, we may reasonably expect that our continuing air effort will eventually dry up the supply of all the North Korean forces, gradually starving them of ammunition and other necessities. Of course, this attrition of North Korean strength will ultimately make the problem here much more manageable.

But the facts still remain: this is a very big job. We have not enough strength here, even now, to be sure of avoiding a fearful catastrophe in the rather near future. Even after we have passed the crisis, we are going to need vastly more strength to get this job done in a reasonable time. And it is downright treasonable to try to do the job on the basis of business-as-usual, politics-as-usual, and the usual doses of poisoned soothing sirup for the American people.

A United States Peace Academy

REMARKS

OF

HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, when we have won this war we must not stop before we have won the peace. Since we are in this crisis we must make an all-out effort to back our boys on the fighting front to bring the war to a successful conclusion, but we must also begin to make plans for winning the peace. The loss of lives in Korea today demonstrates very clearly the importance of our foreign policy and the necessity of taking steps to make it as strong as possible for the future. We cannot overestimate the importance of our foreign policy. It largely determines whether or not we will have war, and how much in taxes we will have to pay. It sets limitations on our peaceful developments and enjoyment of our culture. In this atomic age, our foreign relations determine whether or not we will continue to exist as a free nation or whether we will exist at all.

Annually it is necessary to spend billions of dollars on our Armed Forces, including the operation of two great academies, naval and military, in preparation for war. It is high time we spent a few pennies, relatively speaking, toward the prevention of these wars. I urge the Congress to establish a United States Peace Academy, to train some of our best young men and women from every State of the Union and from all walks of life, in national and international relations. We should give them on-the-job training here in Washington. The graduates of the peace academy would form an available pool of well-trained Americans, for service abroad or in our Government at home. The graduates who did not go into this work would become leaders in their own communities which would bring about better understanding and broader participation in these important matters. Much has been done to broaden the field from which our foreign service personnel is drawn. However, it is still not broad enough, because the training necessary for this type of work is not available in many sections of the country and to many outstanding young people with potential greatness. Selecting the best personnel available throughout the United States and giving them the best possible on-the-job training in Washington for work in the field of national and international relations will constitute a positive investment for peace.

For too long a time our Foreign Service personnel has been more or less restricted to those who could afford the higher education obtained from expensive institutions in the United States. The result has been that as late as 1949 over one-half of our Foreign Service officers came from six wealthy States and the District of Columbia—681 out of 1,319. This is not a wise or a healthy procedure. I think our foreign affairs would be on firmer ground if we could bring into our Foreign Service more diverse points of view, from varying backgrounds representing all sections of our great country. My bill would accomplish this by allowing entrance into this graduate academy to be won on a competitive basis, with at least four persons coming from each State.

The Peace Academy would instruct and train our young persons on a graduate level in international and diplomatic relations and in the political, economic, social, and cultural affairs of the world. All of the talent of those in Government in Washington would be at the disposal of the dean of the academy. All of the Government departments, including the legislative and the judicial, would be close at hand for the students to study in operation. This graduate school would fill the present gap between our colleges and the demands of a Foreign Service career. We should invest more time, money, and effort in selecting and training our diplomatic and foreign representatives who have so much responsibility for keeping us out of war.

This academy would accomplish more than the broadening of our foreign service by bringing fresh viewpoints from the people who after all have to support the policy if it is to be successful. It would also create a reservoir of trained personnel upon which the Government and business could draw, not only in sending representatives abroad but in their operations here at home as well. Graduates of this academy would be very valuable in the teaching profession, or any other line of endeavor they should choose. Regardless of what field they entered, they would be capable of spreading an enlightened and informed point of view on world affairs throughout the country. This, I believe, would promote among the people of the United States a better understanding of world affairs by stimulating constructive thinking with respect to world problems. It would help to promote peace, good will, respect, and understanding among the peoples of the world.

The students of the academy will be chosen on the basis of merit through open and competitive examination. My bill calls for four students to be enrolled from each State annually, and two from each Territory, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. The President may appoint 10 students, who must also pass the entrance examination, and the remaining 42, making a total enrollment of 250, will be chosen from Government employees through open, competitive examination with approval by the Secretary of State. The academy will be located in Washington, D. C., and will be operated by a dean subject to the authority of a nonpartisan board of trustees. The board shall be composed of nine members: Four from Congress—chairmen and ranking members of the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees of the Senate and House—Secretary of State or his representative, a former United States ambassador appointed by the President and three persons well versed in educational principles and methods appointed by the President, not more than two from a single political party.

Mr. Speaker, in the days of our country's beginnings, we were blessed with statesmen of unusual stature to guide the destiny of our American democracy. Our forefathers, with their vision and imagination, decided that above all else peace was the thing they should strive for in our relations with other countries. It is significant, I believe, that they created a national peace establishment, rather than a war or defense department as we have today.

When we have won this war, we must not stop before we have won the peace. It is time we adopted the type of sound, practical thinking of our forefathers to help prevent future wars through positive steps such as this peace academy. The emphasis should be placed where it belongs. We must look ahead and develop real peace programs to augment our defense establishment. Positive investments for peace could help absolve the reasons for war.

I call on Congress to take this step forward by establishing this peace academy and training our young people to guide us and the world through the stormy times ahead.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include a copy of the bill I have just introduced for the purpose of establishing this peace academy:

A bill to establish a United States Peace Academy

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the purpose of this act to provide for the instruction and training of a group of citizens of the United States who—

(1) will be qualified to fill positions in or out of the Government requiring education and training in world affairs;

(2) will promote among the people of the United States a better understanding of world affairs by stimulating constructive thinking with respect to world problems; and

(3) will promote peace, good will, respect, and understanding among the peoples of the world by dissemination of enlightened and informed views and attitudes with respect to world problems.

SEC. 2. In order to accomplish the foregoing purpose, there shall be established and maintained in the District of Columbia, as an independent establishment in the executive branch of the Government, an Academy for the instruction and training of persons in international and diplomatic relations and in the political, economic, social, and cultural affairs of the world. Such Academy shall be known as the "United States Peace Academy" (herein referred to as the "Academy").

SEC. 3. There shall be a Board of Trustees for the Academy selected on a nonpartisan basis consisting of the following members—

(1) the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate;

(2) the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives;

(3) the Secretary of State (or an officer of the Department of State appointed by, and to serve at the pleasure of, the Secretary);

(4) a former United States ambassador to a foreign country appointed by the President; and

(5) three persons (at least one of whom shall be a woman), who are well versed in educational principles and methods, appointed by the President, not more than two from a single political party.

The terms of office of persons who are appointed by the President as members of the Board shall be 4 years, except the terms of such members first taking office shall expire, as the President may designate at the time of appointment, one at the end of 1 year, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 3 years, and one at the end of 4 years after the date of enactment of this act. Any person appointed by the President to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. Members of Congress who are members of the Board of Trustees and who have been reelected to the Senate or to the House of Representatives, as the case may be, may continue to serve as members of the Board notwithstanding the expiration of Congress. The Board shall select a chairman from among its members. A majority of the membership of the Board shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 4. The members of the Board of Trustees shall receive no compensation for their services as members, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Board.

SEC. 5. The Board of Trustees shall have general supervision and charge of the Academy. The Board is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary with respect to the Academy.

SEC. 6. (a) There shall be a Dean of the Academy, appointed by the Board of Trustees, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum. The Dean shall have immediate supervision and charge of the Academy and shall be subject to the authority of the Board.

(b) The faculty of the Academy shall be composed of such assistant deans, full, associate, and assistant professors, and instructors as may be necessary for the proper education and training of students attending the Academy. The Dean of the Academy, subject to the approval and authority of the Board of Trustees, (1) shall appoint, without regard to the civil-service laws, qualified persons to serve as members of the faculty of the Academy for such period and upon such basis as he deems advisable, and (2) shall fix their compensation without regard to the Clasisfication Act of 1949, as amended.

SEC. 7. (a) In order to supplement the instruction and training regularly provided at the Academy, the Dean of the Academy is authorized (1) to procure the services of specially qualified guest or occasional lecturers and other persons, and (2) to utilize the personnel, equipment, and facilities of any department, agency, or independent establishment in the executive branch of the Government with the consent of such department, agency, or independent establishment.

(b) Any such lecturer or other person shall receive no compensation for his services at the Academy but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by him in connection with his services at the academy.

(c) Any expenses incurred in the utilization by the Dean of the Academy of the personnel, equipment, and facilities of any such department, agency, or independent establishment shall be reimbursed from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available to the Academy.

SEC. 8. The course of instruction and training at the Academy shall be an advanced course designed for graduates of accredited colleges and universities and shall, in accordance with the purpose of this act, be prescribed by the Dean of the Academy with the advice of the faculty and subject to the approval and authority of the Board of Trustees. Such course shall be designed to give students at the Academy a thorough knowledge of (1) international and diplomatic relations, (2) the historical development of the foreign policy of the United States, (3) the theory of government on Federal, State, and local levels, and (4) the history, culture, and economic and political affairs of the peoples of the world. Such course of instruction and training shall be for a period of 1 year. Upon satisfactory completion of such course, students shall be awarded an appropriate graduate degree.

SEC. 9. (a) The number of students at the Academy at any one time shall not exceed 250 and shall be selected for admission to the Academy as provided in this section.

(b) There shall be selected annually 4 students from each State, 2 students from each Territory, and 2 students from Puerto Rico, making a total of 108 to be so selected. Such students shall be actual residents of the State or Territory from which they are selected, or of Puerto Rico, as the case may be. Such students shall be selected by a committee of three members chosen by the State college association (or similar education association) in the State or Territory concerned and in Puerto Rico, in the order of merit established through open competitive examinations prescribed by the Dean of the Academy and held by such committee and in accordance with such character qualifications as the Dean may prescribe.

(c) Ten students shall be selected annually by the President from the United States at large, except that two of such students shall be actual residents of the District of Columbia. Such students shall be required to pass the examinations held under subsection (d) and to satisfy the character qualifications prescribed under such subsection.

(d) Forty-two students shall be selected annually from officers and employees of the Federal Government in the order of merit established through open competitive examinations prescribed and held by the Dean of the Academy and in accordance with such character qualifications as the Dean may prescribe. Any such officer or employee so selected shall have performed not less than 1 year of service as an officer or employee of the Federal Government.

SEC. 10. No student shall be admitted to the Academy unless he is a citizen of the United States, of good moral character, and a graduate of a college or university approved by the Board of Trustees.

SEC. 11. No tuition or other fees shall be charged any student admitted to the Academy. Each such student shall be paid the sum of $1,000 for quarters, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in attendance at the Academy.

SEC. 12. Each student admitted to the Academy shall agree in writing to accept appointment (if tendered), upon graduation or at any time within 3 years thereafter, to a position in the Federal Government requiring education and training in world affairs and to serve in such position, or in a position requiring comparable qualifications, for not less than 2 years after such appointment. The Board of Trustees may, in its discretion and upon application, release any person from his obligations under such agreement.

SEC. 13. No graduate of the Academy who is subsequently appointed to a position in the Foreign Service of the United States under the Department of State shall, by reason of his attendance at or graduation from the Academy, be exempted from undergoing any specialized training required of any officer or employee in the Foreign Service in preparation for assignment to duty outside the continental United States unless the Secretary of State determines that such specialized training shall not be required in the case of such graduate.

SEC. 14. The Board of Trustees shall make an annual report to the President and to the Congress with respect to the operations of, and other matters concerning, the Academy. Such report shall contain, among other matters, such recommendations as the Board deems advisable.

SEC. 15. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

A Million Like Her—Why?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, there is printed herewith a letter from a mother, which appeared in the Readers' Forum in the August 15, 1950, edition of the News-Palladium, a newspaper published at Benton Harbor, Mich.:

FROM A MOTHER

BENTON HARBOR.

EDITOR, THE NEWS-PALLADIUM,

I have just returned from visiting my son and his family in a distant State. He is in the Air Corps. I didn't let them know I was coming. I anticipated his surprise and joy as I knocked on the door. He met me with: "I knew you were coming, Mom; I called home last night. They told me you were on the way."

"But why, what happened?' I asked, knowing he only "calls home" for special reasons (like when he called to tell us the twins had arrived safely).

"I'm going overseas, Mom." Just like that. Overseas. That dreaded, far-away place where boys go to and men return from * * * sometimes.

"But why you? You leave a wife, babies, dependents; you should be deferred; you * * * ," me, making noises like a mama. I thanked my lucky stars, the powers that be, the mother's instinct or whatever it was that had prompted me to make the trip at this time.

Eventually I met my daughter-in-law, held my first granchildren in my arms. Was I thrilled! Almost as much as the first time I held their father. My mind went back and back. Back to the time when a certain small boy used to give me a hard time. He was a "pistol!"

"I want Pauline and the kids to be near you, Mom, while I'm gone." he broke into my thoughts. "I want my kids to be brought up the way I was." A beautiful compliment? Looking at him, I thought so.

I thought of the time when, at a district meeting of my organization, the guest speaker said, "You mothers are a very important factor in our Nation." That is a prize understatement if I ever heard one. Mothers important? Say, we are the Nation. Who helps build strong bodies, who guides little feet into the paths of righteousness and hopes they never stray therefrom? Who bandages cut fingers, doctors black eyes, kisses hurt places, listens to prayers, gives vitamins? Science is wonderful, but there has never been a machine invented that will turn out a mother's son.

You put in your coins and out come cigarettes or soft drinks. Yes, mothers are important.

I bought my son a small Bible. It has a bronze colored steel cover on which the words "May the Lord be with You" are engraved. I heard those Bibles saved many a life in the last war.

I couldn't stay with them as long as I wanted to. Their apartment is tiny and hotel rooms so expensive. Anyhow, what did they want me around for, when their time to be together is so short. Besides I left four at home, and they need me, too.

They took me to the depot. There were other mothers there too. Most of them got on the bus before the tears came. My son tried to be cheerful. "The fellows don't call me 'Junior' any more, Mom, since I'm a daddy of twins. I'm making sergeant by the 26th," he bragged. He was the youngest in his outfit when he enlisted at 16. He's 19 now.

I kissed his young wife, kissed each small twin, then I patted a familiar cheek, roughish—he shaves now. He said, "Don't cry, Mom, I'll be all right." I pressed the dearly loved one close again and said "Good-by, son." What else could I say?

Mother of World Wars II and III.

Ring Around the Rosy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I called the attention of the House to the fact that in the first 5 months of this year the United States imported more than $17,000,000 in goods from Russia, and that during the same period we sold Russia only approximately $500,000 in American goods.

I pointed out, that by this trade with Communist Russia we have been supplying her with about $3,000,000 a month which Russia is using to buy war goods in western Europe. This trade, which permits Russia to obtain war goods to be used against United States troops, should be stopped.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, one of the largest and most influential newspapers in Washington State, dealing with one aspect of this trade with Russia. The editorial follows:

RING AROUND THE ROSY

The refusal of American longshoremen to unload a cargo of Russian crab meat from a British vessel in New York City has brought to light an amazing case of ring around the rosy in international double-dealing.

The longshoremen themselves were only showing their patriotic reluctance to help Russia make money in this country now that we are at war.

But the British Ministry of Transport, owner of the cargo, disclosed some interesting facts about the shipment, which it frankly described as having been rammed down our throats.

What happened was that the British, under the terms of their trade agreement with Soviet Russia, had shipped a quantity of industrial machinery to Russia with repayment to be made in timber.

The Russians, however, failed to supply the timber as they agreed, although Britain's need for it was very great; and sent in its stead the crab meat, for which the British had no use whatever.

It was a simple case, as far as the British were concerned, of taking the crab meat or nothing; and having already shipped the machinery to Russia, they took the crab meat.

But the British, with a reputation for sharp trading of their own, found a prompt solution of the problem by dumping the unwanted crab meat on the American market.

They were undeterred by the fact that American crab-meat industries would be impaired by this solution.

They were previously undeterred from making the original trade agreement with Soviet Russia by the fact that Russia was America's potential and even avowed enemy, and that any industrial machinery sent from Britain would arm Russia for war against America, and that it was only because of American assistance that Britain has any machinery to trade away.

What a sweet pocket full of posies this situation had turned up.

The British are selling Russian crab meat in the United States, to get American dollars with which more British machinery can be produced for shipment to Russia to be used in possible and probable ultimate war against America.

Indeed, it is quite possible the war of aggression in Korea, which is unquestionably supported by Russian industry, has been tooled in some part and perhaps a considerable part by British machines produced with American dollars.

This is the interesting game of international ring around the rosy into which the patriotic American longshoremen have thrown an unexpected but very enlightening diversion.

Statehood for Hawaii and Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit an editorial from the Washington Post of August 20, 1950, as follows:

STATEHOOD RUNAROUND

If the Hawaii and Alaska statehood bills were presented to the Senate for a vote, there is good reason to believe that both would pass. In view of this, and in view of the administration's pledge and President Truman's express interest in the bills, it is hard to understand why there has been no more assurance forthcoming from Majority Leader Lucas. The Senate, to be sure, has some more essential defense and tax measuses that must be passed, and there is always the off-chance that some bitter-ender would try to prevent a statehood vote by bringing up other controversial legislation. But statehood has strong bipartisan support, it is thoroughly justified by every fair-minded investigation that has been made, and it would be an important asset, not only in military defense, but also as an example of enlightened treatment of dependent territories. As Senator KNOWLAND noted Tuesday in answer to some of the venomous attacks on Hawaii, the best way to judge Hawaii's loyalty in the fight against communism is by the number of Hawaiian casualties in Korea. Surely it is within Senators LUCAS' power so to manage the Senate calendar that a vote on the statehood bills will be assured.

Moscow Works Over Four United States Labor Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I attach the following article by John Herling in the August 21 issue of the Washington Daily News for the benefit of those who have sometimes been unable to distinguish real anti-Communist leaders in the United States:

NEW TARGET FOR WORDMONGERS—MOSCOW WORKS OVER FOUR UNITED STATES LABOR LEADERS

(By John Herling)

Russia knows the key importance of labor support in the the world-wide battle raging today.

The Kremlin knows that the battleground is at the worker level.

So this week the Soviets stepped up their propaganda campaign all over the Far East. The special target is not Wall Street. The target is the American labor movement.

Fifteen million members of organized labor in the United States, including the milkman in Omaha, the auto worker in Detroit, the steel worker in Pittsburgh, etc.; they're all going to get a terrific bang out of the latest Soviet propaganda.

And throughout the country responsible labor leadership feels pride and importance in the new recognition of the role American labor plays in international affairs.

Here are some of the men singled out for special propaganda burns by the Soviet word mongers:

CIO President Philip Murray, who approves "the criminal United States intervention in Korea."

AFL President William Green, who is the "arch traitor to the interests of the working class."

Maritime union President Joseph Curran, for "repeating the lying standardized assertions of the American official propaganda."

And auto workers President Walter Reuther, for "his acts of treachery to the working class."

AFL President Green is given a special Soviet working over for "demanding from the workers constructive collaboration with the Government and employers—in other words, unconditional support for the imperialist intervention of the United States against the Korean people."

Yes, screams the Soviet radio: "Murray and Green gave the lead to the American trade-union bureaucracy. On their order the reactionary trade-union leaders of all classes supported the American intervention in Korea."

The labor press gets a special belaboring. And how: "The trade-union papers are no better than the American monopolist press in the vile slanders against the Korean people and the democratic republic, the international camp of peace and democracy, headed by the Soviet Union."

REASON FOR WRATH

Then the Soviet leaders reveal their special reason for anger: the systematic elimination of the Communist elements from the CIO by the CIO.

These CIO'ers are charged as follows: "They are cruelly persecuting the progressive elements in the American trade-union movement and slander in every possible manner the partisans of peace."

Moving along from one propaganda theme to another, it's also pretty clear the Soviet policy boys are boiling because the AFL, CIO and independent maritime unions have set up a voluntary antisabotage screening program. Actually, the unions met in Washington a few weeks ago to make sure that union rights would be respected while national interests are protected.

This leads the Soviets to charge: "There is a complete conspiracy between the Government and the reactionary trade-union leaders as to the best way to fool the American workers and to exploit them in carrying out the intervention against the Korean people."

SINKFUL OF SCORN

Pounding his gums hard, the Soviet commentator charges: "The reactionary trade-union leaders are ready to aid the Government to transform the American trade-unions completely into a branch of the military, bureaucratic United States state apparatus."

An especially tasty bit is reserved for CIO auto workers' President Reuther. For him, in fact, a whole sinkful of scorn:

"In the interests of monopoly, the trade-union reactionaries are committing more and more acts of treachery to the interests of the working class. In May of this year, Walter Reuther signed an agreement unprecendented in the history of American trade-unions, with one of the largest corporations of the United States—General Motors."

And what did Reuther do? "For a few cents' worth of concessions by the company, the trade-union bosses have abrogated for 5 years the right to strike in the plants of General Motors."

Since the Soviets are confident they have got everybody east of Suez by the ear, their commentator can tell the biggest lies and multiple untruths without fear of successful contradiction.

The Soviet mouthpiece then remarks: "The reactionary newspapers praised Reuther and the routine act of treachery to the working class."

HAPPY ENDING?

But this long Soviet tirade gets a happy ending for the anxious listeners in the Far East:

"The reactionary policy of Murray and Green is being met by the growing resistance of the progressive elements in the American trade-union movement."

And, says the same source: "United States public opinion more and more demands the withdrawal of American troops from Korea, including the progressive trade-unions of the United States." Hm-m-m-m. Go ahead, tovarisch, name them.

Meantime, American labor leaders who weren't named by the Soviet radio—all those we could reach in a few hours—are furious at being overlooked.

Says President David Dubinsky, of the AFL Ladies Garment Workers, one of the pioneer anti-Soviet labor spokesmen:

"What have Green, Murray, and Reuther got that I haven't got? I'm going to fire my publicity man."

REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I am pleased to include one of the best articles I have ever read on the conservation of our natural resources. This article should inspire every deep-thinking, Christian, loyal American in our land to do his part in conserving our priceless soil and all the natural resources by which we live, and by which our children will live and on which depends the very existence of our God-given free Republic.

I am proud of the fact that most every Iowa businessman's organization and many ministers of the gospel have joined hands with the farmers and farm organizations, in my district and all over Iowa, in the all-important duty of soil conservation and flood prevention as recommended by the Iowa Conservationist, the Soil Conservation Service, the PMA, the Iowa State Extension Service, and now the Iowa State Watershed Association.

To further accelerate this all-important program, valley-wide watershed soil conservation and flood-control organizations have been established in the several watersheds in the Seventh Iowa District, which I have the honor to represent in Congress. To further assist the program, about a year ago, a magazine entitled "The Nishna Valley Bulletin," began its publication under the editorship of Mr. Barr Keshlear, of Shenandoah, Iowa, a landowner and businessman, and a tireless worker for proper and effective soil conservation and flood control in the Nishna-Botna Valley. The value of such an organization and magazine was immediately recognized by the people in many other sections of Iowa to the end that a State-wide meeting was called in Des Moines, Iowa, last spring, at which time the Iowa State Watershed Association was organized and the Nisha-Botna Watershed Bulletin was made a State-wide publication. The Iowa State Watershed Bulletin is published at Shenandoah, Iowa. Barr Keshlear, of Shenandoah, Iowa, is editor, and association officers are Barr Keshlear, president, Shenandoah, Iowa; William P. Gannon, vice president, Valeria, Iowa; Paul A. Johnson, secretary-treasurer, Denison, Iowa.

The first issue of the Iowa State Watershed Bulletin was published in July and much valuable information to the farmers and to the people of Iowa is contained even in the first issue. Great and lasting good, at relatively small cost, will come to the people of Iowa through active participation in this program by the farmers with the proper cooperation by the Department of Agriculture, the Iowa Extension Service, the Iowa Legislature, the businessmen, the churches, and schools, with the help of such publications as the Iowa Conservationist and the Iowa State Watershed Association Bulletin.

The people of Iowa invite every State in our Nation to follow Iowa in the goal it has set for complete soil and natural resources conservation, remembering always that a nation is only as secure and strong in peace and war as its aims and purposes are righteous and its soil productive.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF CONSERVATION

(By Earl L. Shaub)

Volumes have been written from the scientific angle on the needs of conserving our natural resources. We should also see these needs from a spiritual viewpoint. The fact that we draw our very life from these resources carries with it some tremendous moral obligations.

One of the greatest of these is our duty to wisely use, conserve and restore the natural resources from which we live, so that future generations may enjoy the same abundance that we have. This is a sacred obligation, stressed in the Scriptures as well as in the experiences of the human race. Dominion over the earth with its plants and animals, fish and fowl, is a big responsibility that should be met wholeheartedly and with solemnity and dignity.

The first of these resources, of course, is the soil. The Scriptures refer to man as a handful of clay into which the Creator has blown his warm breath. Though this may be taken as an allegory in Scriptural language it is in reality a great truth. Most of the elements in our bodies came from the soil into which the processes of creation have blown the warm breath of sunshine, air, and water.

Good health, then, and even life itself depends on good soil. In fact, everything we have or hope to have—our food, the wool and cotton in our clothes, the materials in our houses, all the commodities in our commerce—came from the soil. Our standard of living, therefore, and even civilization depends on the fertility of the earth.

Nations of the past flourished as long as their soil was good and decayed when their soil was depleted. Palestine, large stretches of China and Greece are glaring examples of what happens to once prosperous countries that fail to conserve and restore the ground from which they draw their sustenance.

So, if we are to have healthy bodies, a high standard of living, and a thriving, prosperous civilization, we must keep the soil in good condition. The conservationists and the soil chemists know how that can be done, but they are having a stubborn uphill fight against ignorance, greed, and public indifference, and it is every man's duty to assist them in every way we can, for we all have a stake in the good earth.

More of this should be taught in the schools; more ministers of the gospel should base sermons on this subject; more bankers should deny loans to farmers who fail to practice conservation and all businessmen and housewives should be alert to this vital cause because their health and prosperity depend on it.

Next in importance to the soil is the forest. We must protect and restore our trees as rapidly as we use them. Exploitation of the woods is a crime against nature and society. The importance of wood in our daily lives and in our economic world is seen in the fact that forest industries are second only to agriculture. A tremendous number of useful products, in addition to lumber, come from trees. Where the woods have been slashed, we find desolation and poverty.

Forests also ameliorate climate and guarantee a perpetual and even flow of clear, pure water in the streams and rivers. When the forests are gone, they will be replaced by deserts. Then at times the river beds will be dry and at other times they will be the paths of raging floods that will destroy property and lives. Fish and other forms of aquatic life for which we are responsible will vanish as well as the water we need in our homes and factories.

It is in the forest that we get a clear sense of unity. Anyone who meditates for 5 minutes in the grove will feel his kinship with all. Then he must realize that one source of life equally animates the tree, the bird, the deer, and man.

Trees and other forms of vegetation also provide the habitat and food for the birds and animals of which we are the guardians. They are an active part of the plan of creation and we could not exist without them. It is a high privilege to be the custodians of those creatures and we must meet that responsibility by maintaining the balance of nature or suffer the natural consequences.

And so it is with all other natural resources, including the streams, which we must keep clean and free from eroding silt and the pollution of cities and industries. If we fail to protect and replenish the bounties we use we must suffer and die. That is the natural penalty for failure to keep the sacred trust.

The results of our neglect to keep faith with nature are appalling. Forests are disappearing before the ruthless axes; fertile land is washing down the rivers and into the sea at a costly rate; many species of birds and beasts are becoming extinct. Our neglect is all the more shameful because we know how to repair the damage. Conservationists have all the scientific remedies to the problem but they are helpless without public support.

Conservation is just sound common sense economics and good business from which everybody will profit, and any practice that will benefit the world is surely based on fundamental spiritual laws.

We must conceive of the earth as the Lord's, not the property of individuals who hold legal title to the land. The Scriptures word it this way:

"The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof:"

We also read:

"The cattle on a thousand hills, all these are mine."

When we take that to heart we will realize that we are treading on holy ground and that we are the stewards who have the privilege of caring for the earth. Then we shall know that conservation is a vital part of spiritual life and an expression of practical love for those who will come after us.

We should meet our obligations with devotion and joy. Our task should be as pleasant as working in a garden where the rewards are manyfold, with full larders, good health and prosperity.

This work is a means of self-expression, for we are a part of the living landscape. The man who participates in it is a partner with God in a creative act. The very subject is alive and the thing that binds us in fellowship is a quiet, deep feeling a—love of the land, the source of our sustenance, our inspiration, our enjoyment.

It is a high calling to preside at the mystery of the growth of the plants, the birds, and the animals. It is in this work that we live closely with nature and read the story she is continually writing. Let's be acutely sensitive to perceive and feel and appreciate that story. Let's live and enjoy it.

It is in that story that we read that creation is all one piece. We must conserve all or we will lose all. Soil, water, forests, wildlife are but pieces in the pattern. All are bricks with which the Master Builder has created the pyramid of life—a pyramid on which man stands at the apex, presiding over all.

All this was aptly summed up by Charles N. Elliott in what he calls the eleventh commandment, which reads:

"Thou shalt inherit the holy earth as a faithful steward, conserving its resources and productivity from generation to generation. Thou shalt protect thy fields from soil erosion and thy hills from overgrazing by the herds, so that thy descendants may have abundance forever. If any shall fail in this stewardship of the land his fertile field shall become sterile stones and gullies, and his descendants shall decrease and live in poverty or vanish from the face of the earth."—The Tennessee Conservationist.

Analysis of Columns and Broadcasts of Leading Commentators

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW JACOBS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a series of articles appearing in the Providence (R. I.) Journal and Bulletin from June 25 to July 11, 1950, analyzing the columns and broadcasts of Drew Pearson, Walter Winchell, Westbrook Pegler, and Fulton Lewis, Jr.:

Along the Main Street of American journalism there are many permanent establishments dispensing the complex news of the day in a manner that is sometimes dignified, sometimes snappy, and sometimes dull as dishwater. But here and there on raised platforms in plain sight of the passing throng are a number of engaging gentlemen who urge one and all to step right up and get the news of the day in one neat package, brightly wrapped, and containing easily swallowed capsules that will cure broken political bones, subversive snake bite and military migraine. These are the pitchmen of the press.

These are the columnists and commentators, the men of publishing and radio who bring warmth and personality to the news of the day. In the past there have been suspicions that some of them also brought a good deal of artificial sensation and manufactured suspense. Three years ago the Commission on Freedom of the Press said of such false sensation and phony suspense:

"The worst offenders in this direction are to be found among the newspaper columnists and radio commentators. The members of this craft have come to perform an indispensable function in American public discussion. But they must attract the maximum audience, too. Some of them have thought that the way to do this is to supply the public with keyhole gossip, rumor, character assassination, and lies."

But that was 3 years ago. How do our leading columnists and commentators operate today?

FOUR SELECTED FOR STUDY

Four of the most spectacular newspaper columnists and radio commentators were selected for a study in accuracy and fairness. They were selected not necessarily because of any failings but because they are among the best known men in the trade.

They are Walter Winchell, and his weekly radio news program; Drew Pearson, and his weekly radio predictions; Fulton Lewis, Jr., and his nightly newscast; and Westbrook Pegler, and his daily syndicated newspaper column.

For 15 weeks, beginning in January and ending in April, the radio programs of Lewis, Pearson, and Winchell as heard locally were recorded and analyzed. During the same period the syndicated column of Westbrook Pegler also was analyzed. The Pegler column is distributed by a Hearst syndicate and in order to see the printed column as closely as possible to the way Pegler wrote it, a Hearst paper, the New York Journal-American, was selected as the paper in which to read Pegler. Other papers with standards of news and taste that differ widely from Pegler's often cut out parts of Pegler columns and not infrequently omit entire columns. As it was, the Journal-American omitted one column that was clipped for the study from another paper.

PEARSON, WINCHELL COLUMNS EXCLUDED

The newspaper columns of Pearson and Winchell were not studied. Pearson's column contains a preponderance of straight news and acknowledged editorializing. Winchell's column contains much Broadway gossip not related to ordinary news.

If the estimates of their employers are accurate, these four men have a tremendous following. They have, according to the syndicates and networks involved, an aggregate audience of 95,000,000 Americans. Undoubtedly, there is much duplication in that figure. A man who reads Pegler faithfully, for example, is likely to be found among the admirers of Fulton Lewis, Jr.

The rewards of these men are also impressive. Their aggregate income from the activities studied is nearly $1,500,000 a year. This does not include income from Pearson's and Winchell's newspaper columns, from books, magazine articles, personal appearances, fees for posing as a "man of distinction," and other activities connected with being a commentator.

The politics of the four men covers a wide range, from Pearson who appears generally sympathetic to the Fair Deal, to Pegler who accuses Governor Dewey of being a Socialist.

SOMETIMES HIT AT EACH OTHER

These four giants in American journalism tell their public not only the news of the world but also about themselves. Pearson has accused Lewis of fabricating a spectacular story for commercial gain and Lewis has said that Pearson told an unqualified lie. Pegler has called Winchell a gent's-room journalist and Winchell has called Pegler "a louse in the blouse of journalism."

These men wield a powerful influence in public opinion and in politics. Yet the 15-week study showed that the methods of some of them are nothing short of astonishing.

The study was concerned primarily with accuracy of fact and fairness of comment as based on the facts.

While errors were looked for in the study, it was realized that any man handling a large number of facts in a short period of time will make mistakes. It is absurd for any reporter or commentator to claim infallibility and it is just as absurd for the reader or listener to expect infallibility. Thus, the study was not a project for looking, at leisure, for errors made in haste.

But when errors consistently fell into a clear pattern, and when these errors permitted the commentator to reach conclusions that would be impossible with accurate facts, it was felt reasonable to record such mistakes or misrepresentations and the patterns into which they fell.

In some cases, these lapses from fact permitted the commentator to create a political atmosphere to his liking; in others they simply gave the commentator a glamour that would disappear under cold fact.

While the 15-week study was concerned primarily with factual accuracy, it was born in mind that many commentators in the past have appealed to emotions and—having discovered the adrenal glands easier to stimulate than the brain—arranged the news to produce an agitated audience that would return periodically for further doses.

Giraud Chester, writing in Public Opinion Quarterly last year, warned that the popular commentator "should not through excessive emotionalism induce panic or extreme insecurity in his listeners * * * his ability to popularize and dramatize should not be employed on one side of an issue only."

Many leaders in American journalism have been dismayed by the tendency of commentators to hold onto audiences through souped-up news, artificial suspense, and superdramatic deliveries. This commercial emotionalism, they argue, comes at a time when civilization is in a crisis and the fate of society depends on the sound knowledge and sober judgment of its citizens.

While no measure of emotionalism seemed possible during the 15-week study, it was interesting to note that the commentators more often appealed to emotion than addressed themselves to the facts.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the first of three articles on the broadcasts of Walter Winchell.)

Every Sunday night at 9 o'clock an estimated 25,000,000 Americans tune in to hear a fast-talking, superdramatic, ultrapatriotic gossip fling information at the nations of the world, the Government of the United States, the listeners themselves, and, lastly, to the newspapers which try so feebly to compete with him in bringing news to the public.

This international ball of fire is Walter Winchell. Nothing is too large, nothing too small for his consideration. In just one broadcast he was able recently to tell his audience that he was the first man to announce the name of a new atomic weapon, and a few moments later, in the same dramatic staccato, proclaim that a midwestern actress might elope at any minute.

(The fact that both of these items were inaccurate did not dampen Winchell's enthusiasm for bringing truth to the American public.)

ONE THOUSAND-DOLLAR-A-MINUTE TALKER

In return for this generous service, Winchell gets for his single weekly broadcast about $650,000 a year. This amounts to exactly $12,500 a broadcast, and since his personal delivery on each program is limited to 12½ minutes, he gets $1,000 a minute for every minute he talks.

A check of his facts over a 15-week period shows that scarcely a broadcast went by without items that were either untrue, or predictions that were inaccurate.

But there can be no doubt about the quantity. Winchell's 12½ minutes are full ones. In his syndicated newspaper column on March 3, he wrote: "A clocker at the last broadcast reports: 'The first 3 minutes were paced at 226 to 228 words per minute.'" An ordinary radio announcer speaks from 150 to 175 words a minute.

What is the nature of this highly paid wordage?

The listener hears a somewhat harsh, staccato voice firing off news items and advice in white-hot bursts, punctuated by an occasional slow-down for dramatic emphasis. He opens his program with, "Good evening, Mr. and Mrs. North and South America and all the ships at sea; let's go to press."

3,000-MILE EXTENSION

(On April 9, and on that night only, for some undisclosed reason he extended his territorial claims some 3,000 miles with: "Good evening, Mr. and Mrs. North and South America, Midway, the Hawaiian Islands and all the ships at sea, let's go to press.")

He leads off each new section of his newscast with such headings as "A reporter's report to the Nation", or "The international news," or "Tips to the papers." All of it sounds as infallible and competent as a smoothly working machine gun.

On one program recently, he gave 35 items to his listeners. Four of them were predictions (one of them the reverse of a previous prediction and another that the Federal budget would not be balanced this year). Two of the remaining items had been broadcast on previous programs that night; four were marriage or divorce notes; three were reports of surgery or childbirth among celebrities; seven were news items that were carried on the standard news service hours before Winchell went on the air. Among the remaining items was such disparate information as: "The French Army in Indochina is flanked. The door to Singapore is wide open" and the intelligence that a certain gentleman on the west coast had placed a large bet on a horse named "Your Host."

SERIES OF QUICK FLASHES

The first section of Winchell's broadcast frequently is a series of quick news flashes from all over the country. At no time does he say outright that these are exclusive tips, but it is easy for listeners to get that idea from his use here and there of such phrases as "I can now state with authority" and "exclusive."

But an analysis of one recent opening batch of news flashes showed that at least half the items had been carried on the wires of the Associated Press, the United Press, and the International News Service hours before Winchell went on the air. The remaining items consisted of four hospital or divorce items about celebrities, one prediction and one historical item.

A newspaper reporter listening to Winchell broadcasting standard wire service news at the rate of $1,000 a minute might ask what makes such news so expensive in the mouth of Winchell.

The answer is that Winchell has built a reputation for possessing inside information, he has surrounded his news with the air of spectacular drama, and he has the advantage of broadcasting news on the one day when America, for the most part, sees no afternoon newspapers.

PRESSES HAVE BEEN SILENT

Almost none of the 1,700 daily papers in the country publish afternoon papers on Sunday. By the time the Winchell drama goes on the air Sunday night at 9 o'clock, the presses of the Nation have been silent for more than 18 hours.

Thus, Winchell can say, as he does from time to time after an item, "Monday papers will confirm," giving the impression that the newspapers will have learned the item from Winchell and will have found it correct. During the 15-week study a reporter discovered that such items frequently originated with newspapers in the first place and were made available to newscasters like Winchell, already confirmed.

Naturally, broadcasting accurate news quickly is a service, whether it comes from radio or newspaper. And it is true that from time to time Winchell does score a news beat. But when news items processed through the disciplines of factual reporting are broadcast alongside speculation and personal whimsy, the reader has no way of exercising critical judgment. When this mixture of news and speculation and advice is spewed out at machine-gun speed, the listener is faced with taking it all or leaving it all.

PEARSON GETS FIRST CRACK AT WIRES

Winchell's spot at 9 o'clock Sunday night is complicated somewhat by the fact that Drew Pearson, also aided by the publishing void on Sunday, goes on the air 3 hours earlier. Pearson gets first crack at the waiting wire service news piled up unpublished all day Sunday, though he appears to use less of it than Winchell.

Both Winchell and Pearson make some predictions that any newspaper reader could make. Winchell once declared, "The FBI, I can report with authority, is determined to solve the $1,000,000 hold-up of the Brink bank." Pearson once predicted, "J. Edgar Hoover will give convincing arguments tomorrow why FBI files should be kept secret." If you are to predict that the sun will rise in the east, the only factor you must worry about is to make the prediction before anyone else. Thus, Pearson has the advantage over Winchell.

On January 22 Pearson said that Admiral Leahy would be sent to Spain as an Ambassador. Three hours later Winchell predicted that we would send an ambassador to Spain. So far they are both wrong.

BOTH WRONG ON COAL STRIKE

The next week Winchell and Pearson both predicted the President would intervene in the coal strike before 48 hours. Both were wrong.

Sometimes, their predictions weave around each other, now contradicting, now in harmony. On March 19 Pearson said that the French Embassy had reported that Stalin may be ill. Three hours later Winchell said, "The Russian Embassy at Bern, Switzerland, has broadly hinted that Joseph Stalin would be willing to leave Russia for a peace rendezvous." The next week, however, Winchell apparently came around to Pearson's point of view. Without referring to his previous Stalin travel item, he announced, "Stalin's rheumatic heart is keeping him at rest." Some time later, Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations, saw Stalin personally and flew in the face of both Winchell and Pearson when he announced that Stalin was "healthy and lively."

Winchell is outraged by conflicting statements from others. When Government officials disagree on a matter that he is interested in—such as going to war—he is apt to say bitterly of Government officials, as he did on February 19, "In the 12½ minutes I have at this microphone, I could not begin to tell you how many times a day they keep contradicting each other."

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the second of three articles on the broadcasts of Walter Winchell.)

One of the major attractions that Walter Winchell holds for many of the estimated 25,000,000 Americans who listen to this Sunday night broadcast is Winchell's genius for turning any piece of information into a red-hot inside tip.

On the night of March 5, millions of people heard Winchell proclaim breathlessly:

"Washington. There may be another super bomb. The hydrogen-trittium—trittium—t-r-i-double-t-i-u-m. The hydrogen-trittium bomb. That's the first time, I think, those words have been used over the radio.

The H-T—the initials—are the President of the United States."

It is hard to tell from this presentation whether Winchel mean that the elements hydrogen and tritium were so named as a sentimental gesture toward the thirty-second President of the United States or vice versa.

PRINTED 33 DAYS BEFORE

But the joy or dismay of hearing this red-hot, inside tip from Winchell may have been dampened for those listeners who were aware of the fact that on February 1—33 days before Winchell's dramatic announcement—there appeared high up on the front page of the New York Times, an article by Pulitzer-prize winner William L. Laurence, which said:

"This, the most powerful superbomb that can be built on earth, it can now be revealed, actually is a triton bomb in which the basic element is tritium, a hydrogen isotope (twin) of atomic mass 3. It is an element hardly known to the public but well known to nuclear physicist. A triton is a nucleus of tritium composed of one proton and two neutrons." Laurence was careful to spell it t-r-i-t-i-u-m, with only one "t" in the middle.

The story of the hydrogen-tritium bomb was picked up by radio newscasters on the night of January 31, even before the Times hit the street. So Winchell was not the first man to utter the word "tritium" over the air. He was 34 days late. But, anyway, he undoubtedly was the first man ever to misspell it over the air.

TIPS TO THE PAPERS

Winchell spreads the benefit of his inside tips to newspapers as well as to lay listeners. One of the major portions of his program is his final section, "Tips to the papers."

On the night of February 5, for example, in his "Tips to the papers," he announced, "New York Mirror and Boston Record: That rumor last week that the insurance people in the Brink's hold-up are hedging, was unfounded. The companies have already paid out over a million dollars."

He did not add, however, that that rumor was circulated by Winchell in the broadcast 1 week before and presented as an inside tip. That week he had said, "Boston Record: Insiders tell me that the insurance companies are hedging on that million-dollar Brink's hold-up."

In another of his "Tips to the papers," on March 19, he barked that Gypsy Rose Lee would become a disc jockey at the Diamond Horseshoe, a New York night club. It is not recorded whether the papers of the Nation snapped to action with this flash but apparently Gypsy Rose Lee and the Diamond Horseshoe did not. In his newspaper column 3 weeks later, Winchell wrote sulkily, "That disc-jockey deal between Gypsy Rose Lee and the Diamond Horseshoe is off, now that both swindled us out of some hefty broadcasting advertising."

SLANDER TIP FAILS TO MATERIALIZE

Another time, when interest was high in the mercy-killing trial of Dr. Hermann Sander, Winchell gave the following tip to the papers: "Legal experts here and in Washington say that any action against Dr. Sander in New Hampshire will start off the greatest civil-liberties case in United States history." Thus warned that they should expect something bigger than the Sacco-Vanzetti case, the Scopes trial, and the appeals of the Scottsboro boys, the newspapers of the Nation may have been somewhat surprised when Dr. Sander was indeed suspended by his medical society and his license revoked but riots did not break out in all the major cities.

Possibly while waiting for the Sander riots, newspapers could have contemplated Winchell's talent for bringing together in conjugal bliss the great and small issues of the day. Probably nobody else ever thought of connecting the Alger Hiss perjury trial with the daily double at Hialeah. The week end of Hiss' conviction, while the jury was apparently following the judge's instructions not to reveal the jury vote, Winchell told the newspapers and his listeners, "The jury in the Alger Hiss trial was 10 to 2 for conviction. The two who held out for awhile were jurors 5 and 8. That's a good hunch for me for tomorrow's daily double at any track."

NEWSPAPER STORY DIFFERS

The next day, the New York Journal-American, ignoring Winchell's generous tip, carried a story said to be from one of the jurors, saying that the first count in the jury room was 9 to 3.

The only major track with daily doubles that week was Hialeah in Miami. On Monday, the daily double was won by horses 12 and 4. On Tuesday, though Winchell limited his tip to Monday, the daily double was won by horses 2 and 8. Not one 5-and-8 combination won all week.

Yet the next Sunday Winchell gave yet another proud "tip" to the papers: "Morning Telegraph and Racing Form. Hunch players who heard me announce last Sunday night that the two jurors who held out the longest (he had not said "longest" the week before) in the Alger Hiss trial were numbers 5 and 8, played 5 and 8 all week and won plenty. It paid $325 for two and it clinched the great daily double at Hialeah—$1,635."

The truth is that most newspapers flagrantly ignore Winchell tips. For example, listeners heard him say on March 5 in his tips to the papers, "Minneapolis Star-Tribune: Mildred Mayo, the actress daughter of the topman at the Mayo Clinic may elope at any moment." Only readers of the Minneapolis Star-Tribune realize that the Star-Tribune gratuitously ignored that tip, as did Miss Mayo who, at this writing is still uneloped and still unmarried.

"I realize that a microphone is a great moral responsibility."

These words were uttered on the night of February 12 by Walter Winchell in his regular Sunday night broadcast of news, rumor, and speculation.

A 15-week study of the Winchell broadcasts shows that part of this "great moral responsibility" as Winchell considers it is to see that the United States goes to war as soon as possible, an act that would verify a Winchell assertion of 3 years' standing. Almost weekly he castigates the Government for not beginning war on Russia as he advised so long ago.

KEPT LASHING THEM ON

Even when certain Government officials were reported—by Winchell—to be coming around to his way of thinking, he kept lashing them on. On March 26 he said scornfully of these officials, "These are the same leaders, ladies and gentlemen, who for the last few years consistently contended that war with Russia was not inevitable, but highly improbable—when your New York correspondent (Winchell) every Sunday night tried to wake them up."

When Life magazine devoted an entire issue to war preparations, Winchell said that Time and Life had heckled Winchell's call to war in 1947 but "Now they feature the same warnings using almost my identical language—3 years tardy."

Winchell neglects to consider the possibility that the Government and Time and Life may simply have been indoctrinated by the Winchell party line 6 years ago rather than the Winchell line only 3 years ago. Six years ago Winchell was proclaiming the splendid cooperation of the two great democracies, the United States and the Soviet Union and castigating bitterly those who disagreed with him.

NO MERE GENERALITIES

Winchell's declarations of war are not mere generalities. Together with Drew Pearson, he reports the moves of Russian divisions, now to Siberia, now to the Yugoslav border, back to the Baltic, down toward Manchuria. Nevertheless, Pearson and Winchell do have differences in their attitude toward the tenuous peace in the world today.

Pearson, a Quaker, frequently urges all peoples to work for peace. He devoted an entire broadcast—which was ultimately sent by short wave—to Europe in general and Russia in particular—to a plea for sanity and peace. Winchell, on the other hand, looks with suspicion at those who talk of peace.

Neither Winchell nor Pearson, however, has ignored the opening move in the war.

Winchell recently set the stage for firing the first shot of World War III—not a unique instance for him—with a typically patriotic service. This service includes the reading of "confidential intelligence reports" to the public as he hears about them.

On the night of April 2, Winchell said that the garrison of the tiny Kattegat islands between Sweden and Denmark would fight if invaded, a move that might come soon. He said, "London intelligence has reported that these islands will witness the start of the third world war, which is what I have been saying all along."

DISAGREED WITH SELF

(Winchell apparently did not consider this in conflict with his flash 5 weeks earlier: "London! Interception of secret Russian orders unquestionably disclose that the big showdown—Stalin's D-day on a global basis—may be October 1952!")

Pearson was somewhat later in starting the war. It was not until April 30 that he reported, "Allied defense chiefs think the Russians may be ready to move on Bornholm Island which belongs to Denmark but which Moscow has long wanted as a submarine base. If this should happen, then world war III would almost be here." It is interesting that Pearson began his war only 150 miles from the islands that Winchell selected for his opening shot.

Winchell's "great moral responsibility" involves not only getting the Nation successfully launched into war, but also informing all interested parties of confidential moves. On one Sunday, for example, he said that gangsters were going to a certain Southern State to murder a man. But, he told the public, the gangsters were certainly going to get a surprise. (Winchell may have assumed that gangsters do not listen to his program.)

The next week, on April 16, the gang apparently had not killed its man and had not been surprised, for Winchell gave the following tip to a newspaper: "Miami Herald: Regarding last Sunday's tip that gamblers were planning to kill at least one man in a Southern State, I can now state with authority that the Southern State is not Florida!"

DIVORCE A FAVORITE TOPIC

Any count of Winchell items reveals a substantial number of flashes about Hollywood divorces, rumors of divorces, guesses at divorces, results of divorces. Yet, on occasion Winchell draws back in disgust at the sight of newspapers printing Hollywood divorce stories. After announcing that Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Goldwyn would celebrate their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary soon, he added piously, "Recommended to all newspapers that play up Hollywood divorces."

Another exercise of his "great moral responsibility" came recently while the city of New York was urging its citizens to conserve water because of the shortage. On April 9, Winchell declared that there would be no more attempts at artificial rain-making in New York—because the reservoirs were overflowing. The day he made that broadcast, officials of the New York water system announced that while one reservoir was overflo g, the total reservoir system for the city was only 75-percent full as compared with 94.7-percent full at the same time the year before. Numerous artificial rainmaking attempts were made shortly afterward. In order to get the Nation forthright into the atmosphere of war and in order to make his great moral responsibility effective, Winchell appe rs willing to sacrifice a fact for a dramatic effect. On April 16 he concluded his program with: "I remain, your New York correspondent, Walter Winchell, who leaves the President and the Department of Defense with this nightmare: The Russians shot down one American plane—cutting our Air Force right in half!"

It is hoped that ev those devoted followers of Winchell's colorful figures of speech did not believe that the destroyed Navy Privateer constituted 50 percent of our Air Force. Presumably Winchell was merely underlining his complaints that our Air Force is too small. The loss of the Privateer was tragic, but as a matter of simple, unimaginative fact, it was not 50 percent of our operational Air Force but eleven one-thousands of 1 percent.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the first of three articles on the broadcasts of Drew Pearson.)

Sometime after 6:10 o'clock on any Sunday night, some 15,000,000 people hear an excited announcer proclaim:

"Now, Drew Pearson with tonight's predictions of things to come—predictions that have proved 86 percent accurate."

That is how the Nation's top prognosticator enters the final of his 15-minute news program. His broadcast contains news, editorial comment, and predictions, but probably the greatest of these in the public mind is the predictions. They are a major factor in a reputation that gives Pearson a radio income of $400,000 a year. This awe at the man's powers of prophecy is not diminished by the announcer's proclamation of 86-percent accuracy.

NEARER 47 PERCENT

A study of Drew Pearson's radio predictions of 15 weeks shows that the announcer, if he is talking about the current period of Pearson's prophesying career, would be more accurate if he said:

"* * * predictions that have proved 47 percent accurate."

The predictions which are said to be 86 percent accurate are uttered in a special prediction portion of Pearson's program. During the main body of his program he makes other predictions and these, the study showed, are approximately as accurate as the prophecies in the special section.

Pearson's predictions were not always simple to tabulate. Sometimes the events he predicted came true but not when he said they would. Sometimes part of a single prediction turned out to be accurate and another part inaccurate. Some of the predictions are for events which still have not transpired.

THREE TABULATIONS MADE

Three tabulations were made: 1, a strict tabulation which held Pearson to the very letter of his prediction and which called a prediction inaccurate if any part of it was inaccurate; 2, a lenient tabulation which ignored small errors in timing and which gave Pearson credit for fractions of predictions that were otherwise wrong; and 3, a charitable tabulation which assumed that the predictions for events still to come about a quarter of all those made during the study period—will turn out to be completely accurate.

The results of these tabulations were:

1. Strict test—47 percent accurate.
2. Lenient test—55 percent accurate.
3. "Charitable" test—67 percent accurate.

In all fairness to Pearson, it should be said that he appears to make fewer errors than other superdramatic and supersalaried commentators. He scores genuine news beats with regularity, and his sources are among the best in the Nation's Capital.

Pearson does make mistakes. What is astounding for a high-powered commentator, he sometimes admits them.

NO TABULATION HITS 86 PERCENT

But under no circumstances can his predictions during the study period be tabulated to come within striking distance of the 86-percent accurate figure with which the final portion of Pearson's 15-minute broadcast is introduced.

At first glance, a 47-percent accuracy seems to be some 3 percent lower than mere chance. A 5-year-old child predicting the flip of a coin would, if he carried on long enough, predict 50 percent of the results accurately. It would appear, then, that Drew Pearson would do better to flip a coin for his predictions. But this is not necessarily so.

It is true that Pearson makes some yes-or-no type predictions. For example, he predicted on February 26 that Dr. Herman Sander would be acquitted in his mercy killing trial. This had only two likely outcomes and anyone would have a 50-50 chance of being right on a prediction. Pearson said Dr. Sander would be acquitted and he was right. Another simple prediction was the one on April 30 that Senator PEPPER would win in the Florida primary. Here, again, there was a 50-50 chance at being right. Pearson said PEPPER would win and was wrong.

UNLIMITED POSSIBILITIES

But a large number of Pearson predictions deal with an unlimited number of possibilities. For example on February 5 Pearson predicted that the Justice Department would bring an antitrust suit against the Shubert Theaters. Three weeks later the Justice Department did. No ordinary 50-50 guesswork would have produced that prediction. Official appointments, in which Pearson specializes, also offer more than two possibilities. On April 2, for example, he predicted that Roger Lapham would be appointed to run the State Department's point 4 program. The number of possible appointees here was considerable. Actually, Capus M. Waynick was given the appointment, at least temporarily, and Pearson would appear to be wrong.

Under the strictest accounting, some 18 of Pearsons' 52 predictions were accurate. Twenty were wrong, and 14 were predictions of events still to come. Under these conditions, only 47 percent of the predictions of events already transpired are accurate.

But giving Pearson the benefit of ignoring slight errors in timing, and giving him credit for parts of predictions that were otherwise wrong, 21 predictions, or 55 percent, for events already transpired were accurate.

Even assuming that the 14 predictions of events still to come should turn out to be 100 percent accurate, only 35 of the 52 predictions would be accurate. This would make for 67 percent accuracy.

A GENEROUS ASSUMPTION

(That these future events will be 100 percent accurate is a generous assumption. Some of the still untested predictions are that if the Treasury Department changes the color of paper money to orange, racketeers will be foiled; that the next time a Russian submarine gets too close to an American shore the Navy will not hesitate to fire; that when the perspective of time returns to the country the present hysteria will appear worse than the Salem witch burnings.)

It might be said that the announcer says merely that the predictions "have proved" 86 percent accurate, that it was at some time in the past that Pearson reached the 86-percent score. It might also be said that Pearson was proud of this past score and continued to announce it in the manner of a mustard manufacturer who continues to print on his labels a medallion for excellence in mustard granted at the Columbia Exposition in 1893. But there is little doubt that the impression most Pearson listeners get on Sunday nights is that the predictions are—not just have been—86 percent accurate.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the second of three articles on the broadcasts of Drew Pearson.)

Drew Pearson, one of the leading brothers in the fraternity of radio prophets, occasionally breaks the club regulations by admitting that he has made a mistake. This is a grave and highly unusual infraction of the rule of infallibility. Nevertheless, through one means or another, it is still possible for many of his 15,000,000 listeners to get the idea that Pearson approaches infallibility in his predictions.

Perhaps the plainest of these devices is the announcer's statement that Pearson's predictions have been 86 percent accurate. A 15-week study showed that the predictions during that period were only 47 percent accurate.

Another device is to rephrase a prediction after the event has occurred. In this way, a prediction is made to appear better than it really was.

ENGLISH ELECTIONS AN EXAMPLE

On the night of February 19, for example, Pearson said of the forthcoming English elections:

"I predict that the next government of Great Britain will be—a Labor government. But I also predict that the margin will be so close that Winston Churchill will be invited by the Laborites to become a member of the Cabinet."

On the surface, this seemed to be a daring prediction. Many other professional prognosticators were freely predicting the fall of the Labor Government.

(On February 7, 2 weeks before Pearson's prediction, the British Gallup poll gave the Labor Government a 45½-percent victory over 44 percent for the Conservatives. This was made available to Pearson before his own prediction.)

The election was held on February 24. The Labor Government did win. It was by a slim margin. Winston Churchill's joining the Cabinet failed to materialize but there was talk of a new election. The Sunday after the election, Pearson's announcer proclaimed:

"And now, the man who hit it right on the nose last week with his prediction that the Labor Government would win but by a margin so low that new elections might be held soon—Drew Pearson."

HADN'T MENTIONED NEW VOTE

Of course, Pearson had said nothing about new elections. He said said, "so close that Winston Churchill will be invited to become a member of the Cabinet." As it turned out, Churchill was not asked to join the Cabinet and 3 months later, no new elections had been held.

In the tabulation for accuracy, in the severest test (which showed 47 percent accuracy), Pearson was given a failure for that one, since the prediction as a whole was wrong; in the lenient tabulation (which showed 55 percent accuracy) he was given credit for two-thirds accurate and one-third inaccurate for that prediction.

Even when Pearson commits the unspeakable sin of admitting error, he softens the blow for his listeners by reminding them of the glories of the past. On the night of January 29, for example, he was introduced:

"And now, the man who went wrong in predicting that the FEPC would pass the House last week, but whose exclusive revelations regarding the hydrogen bomb has focused Nation-wide attention on this question—Drew Pearson."

ANOTHER DIFFERENCE

Pearson differs from his soothsaying brethren in yet another respect. He apparently bears no ill will toward people who have attacked him. The other columnists and commentators studied during the 15-week period devoted much of their time attacking others and castigating those who have attacked them. Ordinarily, to attack such a commentator is to be condemned to everlasting criticism.

But Drew Pearson, a Quaker, seems to have the power of forgiveness. Pearson and Dean Acheson were once good friends but after a quarrel 12 years ago they have not spoken. Yet Pearson has defended Acheson in the recent attacks by Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY. Last year President Truman was so provoked by Pearson's revelations about certain White House personnel that the President called Pearson an "S. O. B." Pearson, who has a wry sense of humor, suggested on February 26 that in honor of Brotherhood Week, the President's epithet be known as "Servants of Brotherhood."

Few of the spectacular commentators could have been called an "S. O. B." without forever after being tempted to color their news about the man who called them that. But when Truman's Kansas City political friends were being mentioned in connection with the killing of the two racketeers, Binaggio and Gargotta, Pearson said that Truman had ordered a grand jury investigation and that the investigation was a thorough one. "Let's be fair," he said.

AN EMOTIONAL PATRIOT

In at least one respect, Pearson is a brother in good standing with his fellow prophets. He is an emotional patriot. On one program he told his 15,000,000 listeners that for the good of the country they should not repeat what he had told them. On the same program he let them in on a "confidential" cable: "London—exclusive—the American Embassy has cabled the American State Department confidentially that * * *"

In a fury of secrecy he announced one night: "Attention all Americans along the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Canadian border: The Air Force will soon start building a radar wall completely around the United States to detect enemy airplanes. The location of these radar sites must be kept secret. So, if the Government has bought land for a secret project in your neighborhood, pay no attention to what goes on, and, above all, please don't talk about it."

MANY NOTABLE SCOOPS

In the presentation of news, Pearson has scored many notable scoops. One such beat was broadcast on April 30. That night he opened his program with this item:

"Moscow—this will be denied. However, intelligence reports from Moscow state that Russian fishing boats have located the American Navy bomber at the bottom of the Baltic and are trying to salvage the highly secret radar equipment in the sunken plane. This is the most secret equipment we have. The wreck of the plane, by the way, is reported about 40 miles offshore, not near the Latvian coast."

Eleven days later the Associated Press carried a story quoting "a Government official in a position to know" substantially verifying the Pearson scoop, minus the portion about the radar equipment.

Just to show that his knowledge of the incident over the Baltic was not completely accurate, it should be recorded that on April 16 Pearson stated as a fact: "The 10 Americans (on the lost Navy plane), instead of crash-landing, which might have given the Russians our secret equipment, undoubtedly and deliberately crashed their plane into the sea."

Six weeks later the Navy said that an investigation of the remains of the plane showed the craft probably had exploded in mid-air.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the last of three articles on the broadcasts of Drew Pearson.)

Drew Pearson, the newspaper columnist and radio commentator, has a number of useful skills and one of them is the ability to make politicians boiling mad.

A study of his radio broadcasts for 15 weeks early this year ordered several examples of the pixie-ism tactics that give certain Congressmen high blood pressure. On February 5, for example, Pearson said on his regular Sunday night broadcast:

"GOP leaders have been meeting all day yesterday and today to form a new magna carta. Yesterday a pledge of secrecy was sworn to and Senator BREWSTER warned his colleagues that this pledge really meant business. He said he didn't want to hear the inside story of what they had done on Drew Pearson's radio broadcast tonight. However, Senator, though I hate to scoop you, here, in brief, is the report your policy committee will submit tomorrow * * *."

TWO-DAY BEAT

And Pearson went on to give a fairly accurate summary of a policy statement that did not appear on front pages across the Nation until 2 days later.

On March 5, Pearson may have irked General Eisenhower. The general was in the midst of what seemed to be a quadrennial boom for the Presidential nomination, a boom that was based on his statesmanship and high purpose in life. Pearson was irreverent enough to report that the statesman-general has a one-third interest in a restaurant in downtown Washington together with Ed Pauley and George Allen, both one-time intimates of President Truman.

Pearson's barbs are both small and temporary ones and large and long-lasting. On April 12 he shot out a small item on Senator MCCARTHY saying that MCCARTHY was so afraid of being sued for libel on his charges against Owen Lattimore that the Wisconsin Senator had conferred with experts to make sure he would not suffer financial loss. But Pearson's campaign against MCCARTHY took on much weightier material. In April Pearson publicly suggested that a special lobbying committee find the answers to the following questions:

"Who pays for Senator MCCARTHY'S secret headquarters in room 316 in the Congressional Hotel? Who paid for 200 long-distance telephone calls from that room? Who paid four ex-FBI agents who worked for MCCARTHY and they quit in disgust? How much did Alfred Kohlberg contribute to MCCARTHY'S campaign funds?" (Kohlberg is a leader in the so-called Nationalist China lobby.)

PEARSON REVEALED NAME

When Senator MCCARTHY announced publicly "that he had the name of Russia's top espionage agent in the United States" it was Pearson who revealed that the name MCCARTHY had was Owen Lattimore. When MCCARTHY said that this "top espionage agent" had brought "three Communist agents" into the country Pearson announced that the three men were the "living Buddha" and two Mongolian princes, all with Communist prices on their heads, and that Lattimore brought them here so they could plan resistance to Communists in their native lands.

While concentrating on high-level attacks on MCCARTHY, Pearson could not resist the tiny, wry items he uses to embarrass public figures. On April 30 he announced:

"Senator MCCARTHY'S outcry against sex unfortunates in the State Department is about to backfire against him. While he has been calling the roll on these persons, he has overlooked a member of his own staff who is on the Washington Police Department secret list. When this man offered to resign after he was arrested by police, believe it or not, MCCARTHY wouldn't let him but kept him on the payroll another 3 months."

(While certain other columnists were referring to homosexuals in the most violent terms of contempt, Pearson called them "sex unfortunates.")

APOPLEXY IN HIGH AND LOW PLACES

Pearson can induce apoplexy in high places and low. President Truman became so riled up last year he called Pearson an "S. O. B." Yet Pearson still had time to stimulate strong emotions in some obscure municipal official. On February 12 Pearson announced:

"Los Angeles: Mayor Bowron, did you know that one member of your equalization board has a mysterious income of $60,000—not including his salary from the city?"

While he seems to get pleasure from startling complacent politicians, Pearson is not perverse. He and Dean Acheson had a personal falling out 12 years ago and have not spoken to each other since. Under similar circumstances most other popular commentators could not resist carrying out their personal hurts into the news they broadcast. But Pearson has consistently defended Acheson against charges that he believed were unfounded. On February 19 he said: "It is not true as reported by another commentator that Dean Acheson contributed $25,000 to the defense of Hiss. He gave nothing." (It is also interesting that Pearson did not mention that it was Walter Winchell who printed the allegation.)

On January 29 Pearson said, "Secretary of Defense Johnson who doesn't like Acheson, is whispering about that Hiss has something on Acheson and that's why Acheson made his famous statement. I can state, however, that this is not true." Pearson then went on to give the background leading up to Acheson's statement, a background that was later verified by conventional news sources.

HIGH SCORE ON INSIDE TIPS

Pearson has a high score of accurate inside tips. During the study period he revealed that two more scientists were being watched and that more arrests would follow (this was months before the arrest of Harry Gold and Alfred Slack.) In January he accused five New York collectors of internal revenue of taking bribes, and on March 3 the five men were indicted.

Frequently, Pearson broadcasts items that are based on knowledge that cannot be documented by conservative news standards but which carry some weight because of Pearson's reputation for having facts most of the time. He said on January 29 that fellow-prisoners in the Federal penitentiary at Danbury, Conn., were protesting the special privileges given ex-Congressman Parnell Thomas. On February 5 he said that the American Ambassador had demanded that France fire Joliet-Curie, an avowed Communist, as head of the French atomic project. (Later Curie was fired.) On February 12 he said that the FBI is under fire for wiretapping but that most of the tapping is being done by the Army and Navy.

CAN AFFORD TO TAKE CHANCES

Pearson has been able to score many news beats because he could afford to take long chances that ordinary, competent reporters could not afford. For example, by using judgment he can use items picked up at cocktail parties that most correspondents would not dare to use as news. Pearson also has been able to get a beat on other reporters, say correspondents, by violating confidences from time to time. Other times he obtains news items from interested parties who are willing to reveal inner secrets to a popular commentator for purposes of their own. (A minority Congressman emerging from a conference in which he lost a position might reveal the inside information if it will embarrass the majority for example.)

Pearson has also been accused of sloppy reporting and phony sensationalism. In February he reported shocking conditions in a two-cell, log jail in Taylorville, Ky., where "a 13-year-old runaway boy was locked up * * * for 4 days with a screaming, laughing maniac." A local newspaperman said that the jail was built in 1927, was built of concrete, had four cells, and had not been used for a runaway boy for 7 years. A reporter from the Louisville Courier-Journal wrote that Pearson had learned his facts from one of his legmen who had picked up the information from the recollections of a worker in the United States Children's Bureau. Pearson presented the story as a current condition as reported by the United States Children's Bureau.

BASED ON SHREWD GUESSES

But many of Pearson's items are based merely on shrewd guesses. On February 26 Pearson said he would give a hat to Congressman SMATHERS, then in a primary race against CLAUDE PEPPER for United States Senator from Florida, if SMATHERS could shake hands with President Truman while Truman was in Key West. It would seem not too hard for a Congressman to shake the hand of the President while the Chief Executive is visiting the Congressman's home State, especially with national publicity centered on the handshake. But Pearson knew that Truman preferred to have PEPPER win since PEPPER was a supporter of the Truman program, but could not make overt moves in support of PEPPER because of the delicate civil rights issue in the South. So it was almost a certainty that Truman would not then shake hands with SMATHERS, an admitted enemy of most of Truman's program. A handshake would have given the anti-Truman SMATHERS the Presidential blessing. As far as is known, SMATHERS did not get to shake the President's hand. He lost Pearson's hat but won the election.

Not all of Pearson's shrewd guesses turn out to be right. On April 30 Pearson said that Truman would pay his personal respects to Senator MCCARTHY in MCCARTHY's home town of Madison, Wis. Presumably this was based on the President's itinerary, released the night of Pearson's broadcast. The itinerary included Madison and it was generally assumed the President would use that whistle stop to combat MCCARTHY's attacks. But the President did not refer to MCCARTHY or his charges in the Madison speech.

Any list of Pearson news beats is impressive. Any list of his news flops is impressive. It leaves him in the same position as any commentator who gives the impression of being infallible—since the listener is faced with accepting all the news as infallible he must have serious doubts when any of it fails.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the first of four articles on Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

The most confident reporter in the Nation's Capitol has been called "probably the most influential man of his profession on Capitol Hill." A former President of the United States called him "lucid, fearless," and a man "of profound importance to all good Americans." A certain Chicago publisher called him a "great reporter," and a west coast businessman said, "No man in our time is so fearlessly on the side of truth, so inspired by God's universal justice."

That man is Fulton Lewis, Jr., whose 15-minute news program each weekday evening from 7 to 7:15 reaches nearly 10,000,000 Americans through 400 radio stations.

A careful analysis of his programs over a 15-week period shows that this tremendous figure in the reporting world in 70 percent of his news programs uttered statements that could be regarded as misleading to the public.

WAR WRITER'S BOARD CRITICAL

That Lewis is not universally accepted as "inspired by God's universal justice" can be seen by the finding of the War Writer's Board, a body composed of professionals such as Clifton Fadiman, Carl Carmer, Franklin Pierce Adams, Rex Stout, Russell Crouse, and others. That board declared that Lewis' wartime news broadcasts constituted "a shockingly isolationist, intolerant and divisive program."

Later, during the 1948 Presidential campaign John Crosby, radio columnist for the New York Herald-Tribune and the Providence Journal-Bulletin, declared: "I think he ought to be recognized as a campaigner, not as a commentator, and his national air time paid for and so listed by the Republican National Committee."

Just last year, Lewis was singled out as an example in a study of "irresponsibility on the air," by Giraud Chester in the Public Opinion Quarterly.

But Lewis seems little bothered by such criticism. He feels that his position as a top-salaried radio commentator was predestined even when he was a Hearst reporter.

"My keen sense of the dramatic and my knowledge of the use of the human voice made it clear even then that broadcasting should be an important part of my professional life," he has said.

VOICE A MAGNIFICENT INSTRUMENT

And he is right. His voice is a magnificent instrument It has been called the Golden Voice of Reaction. Whatever one's opinion of the words that issue forth, there is no doubt that Lewis' voice is, indeed, golden. It is honey-smooth and confident. It is fully as decisive in its manner as that of H. V. Kaltenborn, but it is much more suave. His delivery is easy going and sincere. Now and then he stops to think of a word; occasionally he seems to make a mistake—"the Alger Hissky, ah, ah, ah, Alger Hiss case." His rich enuciation reminds one of movie actor Carey Grant. He pronounces his own last name, for example, with a sharp distinction between syllables, "lew-ISS."

Lewis' voice is golden in another sense, too. It is a remarkably profitable instrument. Income from his broadcasts alone is in the vicinity of $350,000 a year. The voice was so well thought of that the National Association of Manufacturers was willing to pay him $1,000 each for a series of 50 short broadcasts during the war. During the war he also received a $1,000 award from du Pont for "excellence in news commentary."

His voice is close to being invulnerable. He has enraged thousands, maybe millions. But they cannot reach him, economically.

NO SINGLE SPONSOR

Lewis has no single sponsor. He is carried by Mutual Broadcasting System, a network partly owned by an enthusiastic Lewis admirer, Col. Robert R. McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune. Mutual pipes the Lewis broadcast to 400 local stations, which, in turn, can sell three available commercial spots in the program to local sponsors. Lewis has 530 of these local sponsors. If the people of one city protest to an advertiser, the advertiser may stop subsidizing Lewis. So then Lewis will have 529 sponsors instead of 530—and the network probably will continue to broadcast the program as a public service.

Some idea of Lewis' independence of the commercial spots on his program can be gained from the broadcast of March 29, when, at least locally, the 30-second spot in the middle of the program was a free commercial for the Bureau of the Census, which ended "Help the census taker by truthfully answering his questions." When Lewis came back on he spent the final 6½ minutes of his program ridiculing the farmers' census.

DEFENSE A STRONG OFFENSE

Lewis must occasionally defend himself against other reporters whose facts disagree with his. This defense usually takes the form of a strong offense. In one such attack during the study period, he prefaced his assault with "Now, ladies and gentlemen, I dislike very much indeed to become involved in any personalities with my reportorial colleagues, however sharply I may disagree with their views. But * * * *" A quick survey of the 15-week period shows that Lewis in that time attacked by name or made derogatory remarks about 15 reporters, writers, and radio newscasters.

The 15-week study revealed that more than 70 percent of Lewis' broadcasts could be judged misleading. A random selection shows that Lewis told his listeners:

That President Truman apparently invented some statistics in a congressional message whereas the statistics came from a standard source which was named by the President; that the libel suit of William Remington against Elizabeth Bentley, who called him a Communist, was no different from the libel suit of Alger Hiss against Whittaker Chambers, who called Hiss a Communist, whereas Remington in effect won his suit and Hiss did not; that Mrs. Roosevelt apparently wishes to help Russia to act against the United States, whereas all the known statements and acts of Mrs. Roosevelt point in the other direction; that certain persons removed from Government jobs were fired for disloyalty, whereas they were named only bad risks, an important distinction, since a man with a Communist aunt may be perfectly loyal but a bad risk; that Senator TYDINGS is secretly related to Communist programs, whereas all the known evidence points in the opposite direction; that a former Government official publicly attacked Lewis, whereas Lewis had actually attacked the official; that certain Government publications were "peculiar" and "anonymous" whereas independent authorities agree with the contents and the authors were plainly indicated in the front of the publications.

OTHER WEAPONS, TOO

But Lewis has other weapons, too. One of these is a unique literary invention, known to the trade as Lewisisms. A Lewisism is a word or phrase which draws the life blood out of any other word or phrase near it. Some Lewisisms are "so-called" and "purported," which, without further explanation, tells the listener that the words they modify ar really fraudulent ("I listened with some curiosity last night to a gentleman who purports to be a great factual reporter * * * Mr. Elmer Davis * * * a sample of his so-called factual reporting"); the term "individual" which implies that its object is subhuman; "none other than," which is used to imply that Lewis has just lifted a political rock and found underneath a subversive cockroach; "the same" is used to reintroduce an "individual" who has been previously introduced with a "none other than." Sometimes when Lewis is about to quote an unfriendly sources he merely giggles before the quotation in order to show that the following statement is not to be taken seriously.

Another weapon in the hands of Lewis is the compound adjective. No piece of legislation that Lewis dislikes can escape the machine-gun fire of hyphenated description. The Brannan plan is one such measure that has been ridiculed. On one occasion during the study period, Lewis declared, "It is the same old program of consumer subsidies which the OPA long-haired, left-wing, star-gazing, mouth-hanging-open, fair-haired boys insisted upon all the way through the war."

Having perforated the Brannan plan supporters with adjectives at close range, Lewis went on a short time later, to castigate President Truman for suggesting in a press conference that a certain woman reporter should write some sympathetic articles about the Brannan plan.

"She might well have answered," said Lewis in a pious defense of unbiased reporting, "that her job is as a reporter and as such it would be entirely unethical of her to work for or against the Brannan plan or any other piece of legislation."

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the second of four articles on Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

Every night on the radio from Monday through Friday, Fulton Lewis, Jr., like the poet Milton, describes a titanic battle between the good angels and the angels of the Devil.

This war of the angels is for control of the social and economic structure of the United States.

Regular listeners to Lewis' "top of the news" come quickly to recognize the good angels and the bad angels, as revealed in the gospel according to Lewis.

Some of Lewis' favorite angels are Senator TAFT, Senator BYRD, Senator MCCARTHY, Senator WHERRY, Senator BRIDGES, Senator HICKENLOOPER, Senator MUNDT (who once called Lewis "the fairest and most accurate news commentator in America"), Representative "CHARLIE" HALLECK, Representative VELDE, and Representative NIXON.

There are also organized squadrons of angels, including such organizations as the Republican National Committee and the House Un-American Activities Committee.

DEVILS IN THE STRUGGLE

The devils, on the other hand, include President Truman, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Senator Humphrey, Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, Secretary of State Acheson, Federal Security Administrator Ewing, former Vice President Henry Wallace, the late Harry Hopkins, Supreme Court Justice Frankfurter, Governor Bowles of Connecticut, Representative Sabath, Wilson Wyatt, Elmer Davis, Drew Pearson, and many others.

The squadrons of devils include such bodies as the Democratic Party, the Americans for Democratic Action, the CIO, and the British Labor Party.

Needless to say, Fulton Lewis, Jr., is on the side of the angels. The list of angels and devils, as a matter of fact, was compiled by a look at the persons and organizations consistently quoted by Lewis with praise (the angels) and the persons and organizations consistently quoted by Lewis with criticism (the devils).

Sometimes devils are elevated to temporary angelhood. Sometimes angels fall from grace.

Since he became an outspoken critic of the late President Roosevelt, James A. Farley has become, according to Lewis on February 17, "probably the best-loved, most-respected high political officeholder, so far as the press is concerned, in the last 20 years."

SUPERLATIVES AWARDED

Similar superlatives have been awarded by Lewis to entire organizations who have qualified for a temporary angelic state by an act pleasing to Lewis. When the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, a nominally Democratic body, voted a criticism of Dean Acheson for his statement on Alger Hiss, Lewis climaxed his critical statements on Acheson on the night of January 27 with:

"The really stunning blow, however, so far as Mr. Acheson is concerned, came when the Mississippi House of Representatives, passed an official resolution of censure against Dean Acheson * * *."

That the lower house of the Mississippi Legislature could deal such a really stunning blow to the Secretary of State probably was never before appreciated by most citizens.

Just as there is some chance for salvation among the devils, by the same token, there is always a danger that an angel might fall. Ordinarily, Senator GURNEY, a Republican from South Dakota, would be safe in Lewis' heaven. GURNEY has a voting record more antiadministration on key issues than his Dakotan partner, Senator MUNDT, or Senator TAFT. He voted against the President's slum-clearance program, the educational finance act, the measure to end injunctions in strikes, and other similar Truman bills. But when an even more conservative angel, Representative FRANCIS CASE, decided he wanted GURNEY's seat in the Senate, Lewis rushed to CASE's aid. On February 21 he said CASE would tell the electorate that our national life is in peril from the power-drunk, colorblind, inept and spendthrift leadership. This technique received Lewis approval. It shows, said Lewis, a strong and positive campaign of opposition to administration policy. CASE defeated GURNEY.

TYDINGS FALLS

Another angel who fell from grace was Senator TYDINGS, an economy-minded, conservative Democrat. TYDINGS plummeted out of paradise by appearing skeptical about the recent charges by angel JOSEPH MCCARTHY that there were Communists in the State Department.

The division of angels and devils is important in any understanding of Lewis' reporting technique. A Washington correspondent who has seen Lewis in action for years said that the greatest single reportorial quality of Lewis is his ability to select facts that agrees with.

One program—that of April 5—was selected at random for an analysis of Lewis' statements for and against his angels. On that night he devoted his broadcast to three main items: (1) The administration agriculture program; (2) the administration budget; (3) the Senate hearings on the charges of communism in the State Department.

On item 1, the agricultural program, Lewis devoted 308 seconds (5 minutes, 8 seconds)—all of it against the program. He quoted all antiprogram sources, such as the Farm Bureau Federation, the National Milk Producers Association, the National Council of Farmers' Cooperatives, and Representative HAROLD COOLEY of North Carolina.

TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE SECONDS TO BUDGET

On item 2, the budget, he devoted 225 seconds (3 minutes, 45 seconds), 140 seconds of it quoting Representative HARRIS ELLSWORTH against the budget, and almost all the remaining 85 seconds to his own arguments against the budget.

On item 3, the State Department hearings, he covered the session which was the State Department's day in court. All the actual testimony was pro-State Department. Lewis devoted 158 seconds to the entire subject—59 seconds presenting the testimony, 99 seconds to his own attack on the testimony.

The next day, he started with the administration's program for expanded social security. He devoted 45 seconds to explaining the program, 205 seconds to attacking it. On that day it was Owen Lattimore's day in court. He had been accused of being Russia's top espionage agent by Senator MCCARTHY, charges which Lewis had aired at great length. On April 6 Lattimore gave his side of the picture. Lewis devoted 75 seconds to the matter, most of it attacking Lattimore.

On April 20, two persons appeared before the same hearing committee. Louis Budenz, who gave anti-Lattimore testimony, and Brig. Gen. Elliott R. Thorpe, who gave pro-Lattimore testimony. Many leading papers divided the headlines or lead paragraphs of their stories between Budenz and Thorpe. Lewis devoted 20 seconds to Thorpe, and 630 seconds to Budenz.

LOP-SIDED DIVISION

It would be unreasonable for a listener to demand that Lewis divide up his radio time equally between his angels and his devils, but it would be reasonable to expect that the division of time should not be so lopsided as to obscure the facts as they exist. After the recent British elections, for example, Lewis quoted his angels who heralded a Conservative victory and referred to the Labor Party's outcome in the election as a "resounding repudiation by the British people." From such a presentation it would be easy for the average listener to overlook the fact that the Laborites had won the election, though narrowly.

Lewis' devotion to his angels and his hostility toward the devils has produced some useful results. He has, on occasion, combined it with his skill as reporter.

His reportorial skill was first exhibited 2 decades ago when as a reporter for Hearst's now-defunct Universal Service, Lewis uncovered almost single-handedly the air mail contract scandals. It was this favoritism in awarding air mail contracts that led to the Government's disastrous attempt to fly the mail, but the exposure of preferential contract awards was a notable Lewis scoop.

EXPOSED CANOL PROJECT

In recent years Lewis has turned his devil-harassment to some good use. It was his documented criticism which exposed the expensive and abortive Canol oil project. He also disclosed the futile attempts at completing the Latin-American highway, and his constant barbs helped accelerate the synthetic rubber program.

But critics of Lewis have pointed out that his angel-devil standards produce negative effects, as well. They say that while his criticisms sped the synthetic rubber program needed for wartime defense, his bitter denunciation of Roosevelt's armament program before World War II retarded our wartime successes. They also argue with Lewis' method of selecting angels and devils.

What makes a citizen an angel and what makes him a devil, in Fulton Lewis' battle? Lewis makes his political standards pretty plain.

On the day that Lewis announced an increase in FBI funds he said, "That is one increase in Government spending that very few American citizens worthy of the name are going to complain about. And if you find anybody who does complain, look him over carefully and suspiciously."

"GUESS WHO?"

When some Representatives voted against additional funds for the House un-American Activities Committee, he listed the names, ending with "guess who, Mrs. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, of California."

Another Lewis yardstick is the attitude toward the United Nations. If a public figure speaks in favor of maintaining the United Nations, he is described by Lewis as "a member of the Russian appeasement group."

Still another indelible blot on a man is to have served the OPA during the war. On March 28 Lewis reported that Willis Ritter of Utah would run into serious objections in his nomination for a judgeship. "I might mention," said Lewis darkly, "that Mr. Willis Ritter was regional rent director for OPA for the Mountain States during the war."

People who object to wire tapping are also of doubtful loyalty, according to Lewis. On January 19, he told his listeners, "Why should any honest man be worried one way or the other about whether his wire is being tapped? * * * I have nothing to be ashamed of. I am not engaged or involved in any shady or illegal deal. Doesn't worry me in the slightest who listens in on my telephone calls. But if I were a part of an underground movement * * *."

This casting of suspicion on all who object to wire tapping puts the cloud of disloyalty on Attorney General McGrath, who once called wire tapping a violation of civil rights, and members of the United States Supreme Court, who refuse to recognize evidence obtained by wire tapping. But this, presumably, would not bother Lewis. He has indicated from time to time that he is not too sure of those people, either.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the third of four articles on Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

"My integrity as a reporter had never been questioned before."

In a sense, this statement made by Fulton Lewis, Jr., in 1947, was a reflection on his integrity as a reporter.

Up to that time his integrity as a reporter had been attacked many times. In 1943 a Congressman called him a "hatchet man." In 1945 the War Writers' Board termed his news commentary "intolerant and divisive." And a short time before Lewis made the above statement, the Rev. Wilfred Parsons, then editor of the Catholic magazine, America, had said publicly that Lewis' reporting "could only proceed from some obscure ill will."

SHOULD KNOW FACTS ON SELF

The 15-week study of Lewis broadcasts showed that more than 70 percent of all his programs contained statements that could be regarded as misleading. It is conceivable that he was misinformed about some of the news he reported. But on at least one story, he was reporting the activities of Fulton Lewis, Jr., and it can be assumed that he knew the true facts. On the evening of February 14, Lewis told his audience:

"The garish and lurid scheme of the erstwhile high-pressure Federal Housing Expediter, Mr. Wilson Wyatt, who was going to cure the postwar housing shortage by underwriting a $50,000,000 project of metal prefabricated housing, came to a dim and dingy end of the trail today. You recall, no doubt, the violent and indignant attack which young Mr. Wyatt made against me * * *."

A student of Lewis' reporting integrity might recall that:

1. "The violent and indignant attack which young Mr. Wyatt made against me * * *" was in fact an attack by Lewis against Wyatt. Lewis claimed over the radio that Wyatt's office made a certain decision because of bribery and added, "I have sworn affidavits telling this entire story in detail." An official investigation showed no bribery and—incidentally—that Lewis had no affidavits.

2. Lewis had to issue a public retraction of his attack on Wyatt. The "retraction" was so accusing that four subsequent retractions were necessary, the last being time on Mutual Broadcasting for Wyatt to make his own defense.

ATTACKED WYATT'S JUDGMENT

3. Lewis attacked Wyatt's judgment in recommending that a certain war-surplus factory go to the ill-fated Lustron housing concern. Lewis failed to remind his listeners that his own recommendation was to give the factory to Preston Tucker, "a good, red-blooded American." Tucker is head of a corporation that was to have manufactured a "dream car" for the postwar market, turned out 40 hand-made cars in all the years since the war, was subject to endless litigation, was indicted by the Government for mail fraud and conspiracy and violation of Securities and Exchange Commission regulations. The corporation officers were acquitted of the Federal charge, but the firm is now in Federal bankruptcy.

On other occasions Lewis exercises his favorite device of presenting only those views that he approves of, leaving the listener with the impression that they are the only views in existence.

On January 30 Lewis broadcast from Dallas, Tex., and devoted a large part of his newscast to the effects of lifting rent control in Dallas. These effects have been argued bitterly. But for Lewis listeners there was no dispute. He assured listeners that there had been practically no hardships, that "average rents here in the Dallas area are up 10 to 12 percent." Listeners to Lewis might never have discovered that there was another version of the Dallas housing picture if Lewis had not 12 weeks later given his own unique report on a Presidential message involving Dallas housing. On April 21 Lewis' version of the President's message was:

"In rental units under $30 he [President Truman] said in the city of Dallas, Tex., rents have increased 56 percent. Just where he got that figure is something of a mystery, because the Dallas Times-Herald several months ago made a spot survey to find out what happened to rents in the city since decontrol and came out with the finding of an 11-percent increase. The Bureau of Labor Statistics conducted its own alleged survey and said the increase was 35 percent. Not even he [the man who headed the Government survey], however, suggested anything like the President's figure of today, 56 percent. But there it is, and it looks very frightening and impressive when stated so specifically and authoritatively. If a President of the United States says it, it must be so, presumably."

LISTENERS MIGHT HAVE LEARNED

Listeners whose interest was piqued by the implication that President Truman had invented the figure "56 percent" might have discovered the following:

1. "Just where he got that figure is something of a mystery" was an odd statement for Lewis, the reporter, to make, since part of the President's message was a plain reference to the source.

2. As for the bureau's "alleged survey," it was conducted in Dallas by way of 800 personal interviews in each type of housing by rental rate, income level, and white and nonwhite. The Times-Herald survey was made by 300 telephone calls and it included no Negro housing.

3. "Not even he, however, suggested anything like the President's 56 percent" is also a strange piece of information to give the public, since the President gave the source, which was the March 1950 Monthly Labor Review, volume 70, No. 3. On page 254, table I, entitled "Changes in residential rents, by rent and income group, all units, by city, 1949," is the notation:

"Dallas area average percent increase, 36.1 percent."

The very next line is: "Under $30 a month, 55.6 percent."

ATTACK ON EWING

On another occasion, Lewis' reporting might be ascribed to a fervent devotion to alarming language and a slightly less intense attachment to fact. In describing a meeting of the House Labor Committee in its study of the bill for Federal aid to education, he attacked the Federal Security Administration, which would handle the education program, by an attack on Oscar Ewing, whom he attacked in turn by "revealing" some pamphlets issued by Ewing's agency.

These pamphlets, Lewis reported, "the Federal Security Administration is circulating to parents purporting to advise parents in the sexual handling and education of their children between the ages of 6 and 12, the advice being along ultramodern—and, in the minds of many House Labor Committee members—highly questionable lines. The gist of it was to let the children go their own merry way on certain sex problems and not to deter or even speak to them on certain sex problems for fear of giving the children an inferiority complex. I might interject that another bulletin by the Federal Security Administration, entitled 'Guiding the Adolescent,' goes even further in its advice to the parents in the handling of children above the age of 12."

A nervous listener could easily get the impression that the Federal Security Administration is conducting a correspondence course in sex mania—unless the listener examined the pamphlets themselves.

MOST "STARTLING" PASSAGE

Selecting the most startling passages from Your Child From Six to Twelve, one finds this passage about sex play in small children:

"It is often better to say nothing whatever to the children, for fear of saying too much, or the wrong thing. Instead, divert their minds, give them new interests. Wholesome attitudes toward sex are not built up by making a child feel that his interest in his body is something dirty or bad."

The pamphlet, Guiding the Adolescent, contains on page 11, what Lewis termed this "highly questionable" line:

"* * * more real harm may come from the worry, anxiety, fear, and feeling of guilt and inferiority caused by unwise efforts on the part of the parents to prevent or stop an undesirable sex practice than the practice itself. This does not mean that the subject should be permitted to go on without parental intervention. It does indicate, however, that sex instruction should be frank, honest, and in keeping with the facts."

Lewis apparently believed that "This does not mean that the subject should be permitted to go on * * *" is telling parents "to let the children go their own merry way."

Lewis then concluded his dissertation: "The head of the Federal Security Administration is none other than Mr. Oscar Ewing, our old friend. * * * But the question that was brought up (about policies of the proposed Federal aid to education) * * * whether Mr. Ewing, perhaps under the guidance of the anonymous individuals who wrote these peculiar pamphlets, will be dictating these policies."

PAMPHLETS NOT ANONYMOUS

Not only has Lewis assured his listeners that the pamphlets are peculiar but now that they are anonymous.

Your Child From Six to Twelve is prefaced: "This bulletin was written by Mrs. Marion L. Faegre under the direction of Dr. Katherine Bain, director of the division of research in child development."

The preface to Guiding the Adolescent declares:

"The principles underlying the guiding of adolescent children have remained the same since this bulletin was written for the Children's Bureau in 1933 by Dr. Douglas A. Thom, director of the Habit Clinic for Child Guidance, of Boston."

One can only gather that (1) Lewis does not know the meaning of "anonymous"; or (2) he did not bother to look at the pamphlets before he told 10,000,000 people they were "peculiar" and "anonymous"; or (3) he read the books and deliberately misled his audience.

Perhaps the high point in Lewis' recent reporting career was reached in Lewis' accounts of a story he had created himself. This was the now-famous "bomb powder plot." On the night o' December 2, 1949, and subsequent nights Lewis unfolded a story of the shipping of secret atomic materials and information to Russia during the war, a story involving treachery in high places. The story was launched when Lewis introduced one George Racey Jordan to his radio audience and vouched for the story Jordan told.

THROUGH LEND-LEASE AIR BASE

Lewis and Jordan said that the Russians spirited uranium compounds, or "bomb powder," heavy water, atomic blueprints, and other secrets through the lend-lease air base at Great Falls, Mont., where Major Jordan was stationed in 1943. They added that Harry Hopkins, President Roosevelt's most trusted aide, had conspired to arrange these shipments in violation of the country's security regulations. They made similar charges against Henry Wallace, then Vice President.

A congressional investigation was started at once. The hearings showed that the uranium shipments were of negligible quantities as far as an atom bomb was concerned, that all the shipments were approved by the proper authorities at the time, that Hopkins and Wallace had nothing to do with the shipments.

As this information came out, Lewis each night assured his listeners that his story was being proved. Actually, the majority of the House Un-American Activities Committee, the investigating body, consistently made public statements ridiculing the story.

An example of Lewis' reporting accuracy of these hearings is the account on the night of March 2 after the committee investigator, Donald T. Appell, told the results of an exhaustive probe of Jordan's claim that he had made many reports on the alleged secret shipments and that he had seen numerous high officials in Washington about the alleged treachery.

NEVER MENTIONED IT

Appell said that the superior officer that Lewis spoke to every day during the period in question said Jordan never mentioned uranium compounds, atomic plans, Harry Hopkins or any of the story that the major and Lewis broke 6 years later. Appell also said that the two high officials in Washington that Jordan said he had seen during the war about the bomb powder shipment, said they had never seen or heard of Jordan during that period.

The committee counsel then asked what about Major Jordan's warnings to high officials after the war? Appell replied:

"The records show that after Major Jordan was out of the service, he went to the State Department, and in the memorandum there, he reported some Russian pilots bringing furs into the United States without paying duty."

Reported Fulton Lewis, Jr., that night.

"Mr. Donald Appell produced 2 hours of documentation and affidavits substantiating to about 98 percent the story of Maj. George Racey Jordan * * * the 2-hour testimony was a mass of documented substantiation of the Jordan story. Mr. Appell blasted to bits the attempted criticism of Jordan that he should have reported at the time as to what was going through—did so by showing records showing a succession of such reports."

That was Fulton Lewis, Jr., reporting on his own biggest story of the year.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the last of four articles on Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

Fulton Lewis, Jr., the personable commentator who broadcasts the news to 10,000,000 Americans every weekday, has been credited with a number of impressive projects. He is said to have been instrumental in killing the wartime OPA program, of paving the way for David Lilienthal to leave Government service, and of managing to cast a cloud of treason over a former Vice President of the United States.

But Lewis has now undertaken what must be regarded as the most impressive project of his career—the destruction of the United Nations.

This is not to intimate that Lewis is capable of dismantling the international organization single-handed. But his activities in the present campaign to disband the United Nations are a good example of Lewis' peculiar role in the task of bringing information to the public.

CITES REDS' PRESENCE IN UNITED NATIONS

Lewis began his jibes at the United Nations during the study period in what was, for him, a mild enough manner. On February 8, for example, he was able to limit himself to a remark that a known Communist was a member of a subcommittee of the UN, under the kindly protection and good offices of United Nations credentials."

In all his subsequent attacks on the United Nations, Lewis apparently looked upon it as a strictly American institution, an arbitration service to which no one who disagreed should be admitted.

On March 13 he objected to the United States paying anything toward the United Nations since the United Nations does not close its doors to those opposed to this country. "What a goofy set-up that is, when you come down to it. And what a monumental collection of suckers we are."

On April 14 he increased his fire. Talking of the case of the lost Navy privateer in the Baltic, he said, "It is destined to go before the United Nations, but with the appeasement and mollycoddling of the Soviet Union since the beginning of the United Nations, nothing can come of it. There at Lake Success they deliberate and discuss, discuss and deliberate, and then deliberate and discuss some more. And it's all very pious and all very polite. But nothing ever gets accomplished, and if it were to be accomplished there is no way to effectuate it.

SEES PROTECTION FOR SOVIET

"The truth is, and this is an excellent and forceful demonstration of the fact, that not only is the United Nations Organization as it is presently constituted, not solving any international problems, but it actually is serving as a protective blanket for the Soviet Union to do whatever it wishes to do in its ruthless and reckless campaign of world piracy. As long as the United Nations Organization exists, the participating powers have to attempt to use it, a completely impotent implement, to try to settle their difficulty. And as long as Russia knows that she has no fear of retaliation or any reprisals from anybody, regardless of what she does. Think it over. It's worth thinking about.

"That's the top of the news as it looks from here."

An examination of this line of discourse by Lewis would impress one first of all, with the factual disputes involved. 1. The United Nations has accomplished a number of useful functions since the war; 2. Russia has a fear of retaliation since she must face the nations of the world at the UN for what she does; 3. the participating nations are not impotent to settle their own problems, as witness, the Marshall plan, the Greek-Turkish aid, the Atlantic Pact, the Economic Cooperation Administration, the military-aid program, etc.

What a student of Fulton Lewis, Jr., would notice most, however, is the familiar Lewis strategy of building up a subject with increasing intensity, to have the build-up climaxed with a major move by a well-known public figure. Lewis did just this, for example, in the campaign against David Lilienthal that ended with Senator HICKENLOOPER'S statement of incredible mismanagement in the Atomic Energy Commission. In the case of the United Nations, one sees similar possibilities.

FORMIDABLE PERSONAL RELATIONS

Lewis has formidable personal relations to bring to bear. In 1930 he married Alice Huston, daughter of the chairman of the Republican National Committee at the time. President Herbert Hoover sent a silver salad bowl to the couple, and later became personal friends with the couple. Not long ago, Hoover said of Lewis: "His lucid, fearless, and exhaustive examinations of the vital issues of our time are of profound importance to all good Americans."

In the early spring, however, an observer would have to move carefully along the premise that Lewis' new attack on the United Nations had anything to do with a high-level political campaign. It would hardly do to fall into the same guilt-by-association thinking that Lewis practices.

By April 25, Lewis had uttered strong statements against the idea of the United Nations with increasing frequency. On the 25th, the fifth anniversary of the San Francisco conference where the United Nations was created, Lewis said, "It all looked very glamorous and promising then, or we said it did * * * we were very palsy-walsy with the Communist Russians under the friendly aegis of Mr. Alger Hiss' direction and management. * * * There were a few who were skeptical. * * * In looking back, if it has served any purpose at all, the result has been to help Russia in what Russia has done. The nations which might have taken individual action or even collective action cannot do so and could not do so because such action is supposed to be the sole province and prerogative and responsibility of the United Nations."

REVERSE OF THE FACTS

Again, an observer would assume that Lewis had either not read the Charter of the UN nor any news about the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, the Greek-Turkish aid program; or else he decided to tell his audience the reverse of the facts.

The next day, Lewis again returned to the United Nations.

"I might suggest that you be on the lookout for a speech tomorrow night which I understand will be carried by some of the networks, a speech by former President Herbert Hoover on international policy, because I personally have seen an advance copy of that address and it really is of major importance. He proposes some new approaches on the international picture that make a lot of sense in my language and, I suspect, will make a lot of sense in yours. That's the top of the news as it looks from here."

In his next broadcast after Herbert Hoover proposed to kick out Russia and the iron-curtain countries from the United Nations, Lewis, having prepared the way with 10,000,000 listeners, moved to the next phase in a typical Lewis program—destruction of the opposition.

BRANDS FOES APPEASERS

After discussing the Hoover proposals, he said:

"It soon became rather evident that the latter proposals rests very poorly, indeed, with the Russian appeasement group because they hastened to express their criticism at once. And it might be injected here that this issue constitutes a very illuminating selective test as to just where certain important people stand. Whether they are Russian appeasers secretly feeling that the Soviet Union is all right and the present trouble will all blow over or whether they have the facts realistically. So count them: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt * * * apparently the lady seems to think that with the Russians having gobbled up nearly half the world under the very noses of the United Nations organization in the past 5 years of its existence and that organization having been completely impotent to do anything about it * * * prefers to have it remain ineffective and unworkable, thus enabling Russia to continue to gobble up the world unmolested and unhampered * * *."

Others who issued statements disagreeing with Hoover were John Foster Dulles, former Senator Sherman Cooper, and Assistant Secretary of State John D. Hickerson.

Having assumed for his 10,000,000 listeners that Mrs. Roosevelt wishes to help Russia gobble up the world and having placed such bitter foes of Russia as Republican John Foster Dulles into the Russian appeasement group, the golden voice of Fulton Lewis, Jr., was able to conclude his program with the usual:

'And that's the top of the news as it looks from here."

Since then certain highly placed political figures have started a campaign to disband the United Nations, some of them repeating terms and phrases used by Lewis 3 months ago.

Next: Westbrook Pegler and the Gravestone.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the first of four articles on Westbrook Pegler.)

Westbrook James Pegler writes a newspaper column that is read each day, according to the Hearst syndicate that owns the column, by 45,000,000 Americans. This column is called Fair Enough in some papers but in others, As Pegler Sees It.

The syndicate estimates its figure on the basis that the two-hundred-odd newspapers that print Pegler in this country have a combined circulation of 15,000,000 and that at least three persons read each of the 15,000,000 newspapers sold, and all of the readers follow Pegler.

If that is so, then on January 13 some 45,000,000 Americans—approximately all those who vote in Presidential elections—had their attention held to some eight-hundred-odd words, for about 4 minutes, of violent attack by Pegler on 10 words from a book written by a physician. At first glance the 10 words would not seem to warrant 180,000,000 reader-minutes or rage. The 10 words were:

"At Harvard he rowed on the crew and played football."

BEGINS TO HAVE MEANING

But at second glance, and at careful glances made during a recent 15-day study of Pegler's printed words, the attack on those 10 words begins to have some meaning.

For the "he" in the above sentence refers to the late Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In the 15 weeks of the study, ex-sports-writer Pegler wrote 72 daily columns. Of these 72 columns, 33 (or 45 percent) of them were devoted entirely to attacks on Roosevelts, dead and alive. Of the remainder, some 23, or 32 percent, were attacks on the Truman administration (which Pegler blames on F. D. R.); 10 columns, or 14 percent, were devoted to attacks on unionism (which Pegler also blames on F. D. R.); and the remaining six columns were on miscellaneous items.

The miscellaneous six were not without some significance. One was an attack on Marshall Field, whom Pegler accuses of being sympathetic to Roosevelt. Another was on the State of Arizona were Pegler lives half the year—"there are few foreigners in Arizona," he said—and in which he suggested that officers of the Phelps-Dodge Copper Corp. should take over the government of the State. Another was a whimsical piece against the mixed cocktail in which Roosevelt was attacked for only one paragraph. Another was an 800-word denunciation of Charlie Chaplin as "a detestable alien guttersnipe who had four wives, three of them just kids, and, in his nasty senility seduced another young American girl, got her pregnant and had her run out of town." This same column also attacked the Atlantic Monthly for printing an article about Chaplin, which article, said Pegler, was evidence that the magazine's stately old character has been modified by strong but undeclared political inclinations. One column was an enthusiastic campaign plug for Vivien Kellems, the Connecticut woman manufacturer who is running for GOP nomination for United States Senator. And the last miscellaneous column was on the sanctity of the marriage ceremony.

CAN'T RESIST OCCASIONAL JABS

Even when Pegler is in his miscellaneous columns, he cannot resist occasional jabs at the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt. A psychologist might regard this as an obsessive trait. If it is an obsession, Pegler pursues it with the required energy, willing to find a Roosevelt error in little things and great things alike. In the study period, Pegler addressed himself to proving that Roosevelt was a traitor to his country, a somewhat effeminate mama's boy, and at the same time, an unfaithful husband with a secret attachment to another woman.

First, Pegler takes the historical view. He asserts in his column of January 24 that the recognition of Russia in 1933 was an act of treason. "The original culprit in this historic calamity," he wrote, "wrought by a combination of recklessness, vanity, and treachery, was Franklin D. Roosevelt, who recognized Soviet Russia and built up her power when it was plain that only Russia could profit from this mistake. It was more tragic than any defeat that we have ever suffered in battle. It was worse because it was wrought by a vain, willful man."

OVERLOOKED 16 YEARS

Without examining Pegler's opinion of the character and personality of the late President, students of recent history might regret that Pegler overlooked the fact that Soviet Russia had existed some 16 years without United States recognition and that every major power in Europe had recognized Russia 8 years before the United States.

Nevertheless, the next day Pegler returned to the theme, declaring: "The decline of the United States dates from December 5, 1933, when Franklin D. Roosevelt 'recognized' Soviet Russia." It would be unfair to call Pegler a Marxist simply because he agrees with the Communists that capitalist old America is in a decline. But even Pegler might be taken aback by the fact that he missed a chance to add 19 days to Roosevelt's guilt. The United States recognized Russia not on December 5, 1933, but on November 16.

Part of the Roosevelt treachery, according to Pegler, was a carefully laid plan to ruin the Constitution and to place Moscow agents in key Government positions. On January 28, Pegler declared: "There is absolutely no doubt that Roosevelt did permit Communists to filter into the Government, well knowing, for he was an all-wise leader, that communism was fundamentally hostile to the American Constitution which he was sworn to uphold."

TIME FOR SMALLER MATTERS

While not neglecting the major strokes of history, Pegler does find time for smaller matters. In probing the cosmic significance of "At Harvard he rowed on the crew and played football"—words written by Dr. Ross T. McIntire in his book, "White House Physician"—Pegler says, "I cannot offer to say whether the misleading statement was deliberate or innocent, Roosevelt was a mama's boy * * * and did not take part in the rough-and-tumble of body contact sports * * * Roosevelt did not row on the crew at Harvard and there is no record in the archives of the Harvard Athletic Association of his participation."

Many of the people that read this particular column must have voted for Franklin Roosevelt a few times and it might have troubled some of them that the man they elected to be thirty-first President of the United States was not on the crew at Harvard. For such conscientious readers, there is relief. The Harvard Athletic Association did tell Pegler that young Roosevelt rowed on several house crews, though not on the varsity. And though there is no record of F. D. R. playing football at Harvard, there is this letter he wrote to his mother, 51 years ago, when he was a 17-year-old boy at Groton:

"We played football all afternoon * * * as it is the last line-up before the game. * * * I got both knees banged again and my head cracked, but very hot water and massage took down the swelling * * *. Mr. Sturgis has been made a first substitute so I now fill his place at halfback, having been moved there from end * * *."

MAY SEE HOLY MISSION FOR SELF

It would be unkind and probably untrue to suggest that Pegler carries on such a virulent campaign as a mere commercial enterprise that pays him an estimated $90,000 a year. It is more likely that Pegler believes himself on a holy mission. He seems to feel that Franklin D. Roosevelt was not only a traitor while masquerading as President of the United States, but that he planned to extend his treachery beyond his death by keeping his memory alive. Pegler believes that all respect to the dead President is part of his plot to promote Roosevelt's memory. Any statement that is complimentary to Roosevelt becomes part of the plot to destroy the United States, another stone wickedly placed in the treacherous temple to Roosevelt's memory.

Consequently, Pegler spends much of his time—and most of his writing—trying to batter down the temple. In his attempt he examines microscopically the entire life of Roosevelt and his heirs. The temple is a terrible challenge. Pegler's ambition is to see that temple reduced to powder. If he should spy just one stone upon another (at Harvard he rowed on the crew and played football) Pegler hurls himself at the tiny construction, pounds it with his fists, kicks it with his feet, stamps on it passionately, and, in the end, stops only to catch his breath, panting and perspiring, as he stares at the imagined rubble.

DISTRUST OF DEMOCRACY

It is not clear whether Pegler's hatred of the Roosevelts began with a distrust of democracy or whether he went from hating F. D. R. to hating the democratic forms of government. In either case, Pegler has traveled almost the entire distance. On February 7 he wrote in his column:

"Democracy has tried to corrupt the Republic and substitute emotional popular rule by means of initiative and referendum."

Last year he told a congressional committee:

"I am not interested in democracy, except to oppose it."

This growing dislike of democracy has brought him against the political institutions of his country. On February 8 he wrote:

"Instead of saying, 'Democracy is no good, so to hell with it,' this Republican organization goes wheedling for votes with promises of modified democracy."

He thinks Democrats are unspeakable. He refers to the "Marxian organization called Americans for Democratic Action." And he writes, "We have even more prominent Communist Republicans."

Pegler has his political heroes. He persistently boosts the cause and candidacy of Vivien Kellems, the Connecticut woman manufacturer who has been in the headlines for refusing to pay the Government withholding taxes for her employees.

GERALD L. K. SMITH A HERO

Another Pegler hero is Gerald L. K. Smith, the anti-Catholic, anti-Negro, anti-Semitic propagandist. Pegler, though a devout Roman Catholic himself, has said he would like to raise Smith to a dominant position in American broadcasting. Pegler at one time advocated revival of the Ku Klux Klan.

As a leader in the hate-Roosevelt cult, Pegler is regarded as a man of many talents, bringing both scorn and wit as sledges on the temple. He has termed Roosevelt a "culprit," "a ghastly betrayer," and "conniver." In scorn he wrote on March 17: "Some Democrats say it is terrible to say such things about a crook because the crook is dead." Examples of Pegler's humor are his titles for the dead President, "the late Mahatma" and "Emperor Moosejaw I." Another instance of the Pegler humor is his reference to Roosevelt when the President was dying after the trip to Yalta, "a feeble Fuehrer with one foot in the grave."

At Roosevelt's family home at Hyde Park, in a backyard garden, there is a grave with a plain headstone bearing the inscription: Franklin Delano Roosevelt, 1882-1945.

On April 22 of this year, 10 days after the fifth anniversary of Franklin Roosevelt's death, Pegler admitted in print that he looks forward to the day when someone will mark up that grave. In his column for that day Pegler wrote:

"In the 5 years since the death of Roosevelt, great progress has been made to discredit him, his wife and those of his progeny who have, with characteristic effrontery, continued to trim suckers in their old man's name, to exploit his grave as a pitchman ballyhoos an embalmed whale. * * * The day will come when patriots will profane the core of the Hyde Park honkatonk."

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the second of four articles on Westbrook Pegler.)

One of the major themes in any collection of recent Pegler columns is sex.

It is appropriate that Pegler during the 15 weeks that his column was studied, officiated at the marriage of his primary literary obsession, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and what may be his second, sex. He did this by the ingenious method of dealing with the sex life of the Roosevelts.

Pegler accomplished this nice combination by asserting that Franklin D. Roosevelt had a romantic attachment for another woman and, having described an allegedly unfaithful husband, went on to assert that his wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, had a romantic attachment for another man.

SEES "STAIN OF GUILT"

Of F. D. R.'s alleged extra-marital love interest, Pegler wrote on April 4: "The relationship was not platonic. The very fact that the widow and other beholden people * * * concealed her presence put the stain of guilt on the situation."

Pegler, who can see a stain of guilt faster than any man alive, refers to the presence in the cottage at Warm Springs, Ga., at the time of Roosevelt's death, of the late Mrs. Winthrop Rutherford, then aged 53. Pegler bases his expose on the mention of Mrs. Rutherford's presence at Warm Springs in a book by Grace Tully, Roosevelt's secretary.

Why Pegler assumes that there was an illicit connection is never made clear. Grace Tully refers to Mrs. Rutherford as "a saintly old lady." When Roosevelt died he was having his portrait painted. Mrs. Rutherford commissioned the painting and presumably was in Warm Springs to observe its progress.

Pegler began his F. D. R.-Rutherford affair in 1949, carried it on through the study period, and soon referred to it as established fact.

FOUND "FRIEND FOR ELEANOR"

Having consigned F. D. R. to sexual sin, Pegler then proceeded to find a romantic friend for Eleanor Roosevelt. For 3 days during the study period Pegler told millions of Americans in unmistakable innuendo that Mrs. Roosevelt had an extra-marital attachment for a former New York State policeman, Earl Miller, who had been a bodyguard for Roosevelt when F. D. R. was still Governor of New York and who became a friend of the family. At no time did Pegler say outright that Mrs. Roosevelt was unfaithful to her husband. But after nearly 3,000 words of innuendo, he concluded that he still wasn't able to see the meaning of his "evidence" of the Earl Miller-Eleanor Roosevelt affair. "I have wracked my brain to the bone," Pegler writes, possibly with an eye for libel, "but the answer eludes me, although sometimes I think it is almost within my grasp."

What is the basis for Pegler's theory? He made the startling discovery that a rock crystal vase that had belonged to the President's mother, Mrs. James Roosevelt, was given, after Mrs. James Roosevelt's death, to Earl Miller. As a conclusive piece of evidence, Pegler says, "Eleanor Roosevelt mentions Miller three times in her book. She says he gave her his horse, Dot, when they left Albany for Washington, and confirms the fact that 'when Franklin left Albany Earl Miller went into the department of correction and became personnel director.'" This was plain evidence—from Mrs. Roosevelt herself—to Pegler that Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Miller were up to some damnable business. When Miller and his second wife started divorce proceedings and, apparently, some friends of the Roosevelt family tried to patch things up, Pegler also saw a sinister clue to the "affair."

NAMED POLETTI

One of the people who Pegler said intervened was Charles Poletti, one-time lieutenant governor of New York, or as Pegler put it, "a former henchman of the Hillman-LaGuardia machine which worked in congenial partnership with the Communists, and a corps d'elite of uptown latinos and ghibonnes, meaning gorillas."

Thus, Pegler wound up Franklin Roosevelt and Eleanor Roosevelt in the traps of sin and, for good measure, tossed a former lieutenant governor of New York into a congenial partnership with Communists, had the presence of mind to wallop the corpses of Sidney Hillman and Fiorello LaGuardia, and got in a few licks at his hated "foreigners."

Pegler would not want to be accused of having a dirty mind or a petty one. He saw history in his speculations on the sex life of the Roosevelts. On March 8 he wrote:

"It was dramatic, historic news that Mussolini died with his girl friend. It was good American journalism to print pictures of them hung heads down like beeves. By what standards would it be wrong, then, to prove that Roosevelt's widow, the Secret Service, and the White House suppressed the fact that Roosevelt's old flame was with him when he collapsed, whereas his wife was hundreds of miles away, as usual?"

FINDS HER DISQUALIFIED FOR UN

At about the time that Pegler was airing his thoughts about the sex life of Franklin Roosevelt, the Journal-American, the New York outlet for Pegler's column, began a serialized version of Eleanor Roosevelt's memoirs, dealing with her husband's last days. Aside from the fact that Pegler had lived to see the day when a solid Hearst paper like the Journal-American would print Mrs. Roosevelt on page 1 and Westbrook Pegler on page 3, this series by Eleanor Roosevelt had tremendous significance. According to Pegler, it disqualified Mrs. Roosevelt as a representative of the United States to the United Nations.

The reasoning behind this assertion by Pegler was that Pegler had claimed that Mrs. Roosevelt's dead husband had had an affair with another woman. Pegler dared Mrs. Roosevelt to admit this story. Eleanor Roosevelt, as part of an old policy toward Pegler, did not even acknowledge the Pegler dare. Therefore, Mrs. Roosevelt should be kicked out of the United Nations. Explained Pegler on February 10:

"Accumulated proof of her intentional withholding of material information from writings sold to the public as truthful historical background renders Eleanor Roosevelt inappropriate to represent the United States of America in any parliament of the world. She gave the clients shortweight in denying them the truth about the scene at Warm Springs when her husband collapsed in the presence of a woman who had been for many years the third person in a triangle. She (Eleanor Roosevelt) should get out, be honored with eclat or, failing either of these painless escapes, kicked out for the good of the United States."

Reminded by the phrase, "withholding of material information from writings sold to the public as truthful," some gullible reader might wonder why Pegler did not at that instance tell the public to whom he sold this story that this other woman was present at a portrait painting for which she was paying.

TURNS ON OTHER ENEMIES

Having used sex to guarantee Franklin Roosevelt's residence in perdition and wielding it to oust Mrs. Roosevelt from the United Nations, Pegler then turned sex onto other enemies, such as Dean Acheson.

In the midst of the study period, the State Department released the information that 91 employees had been discharged for homosexualism on the basis that homosexuals are peculiarly vulnerable to blackmail and therefore poor security risks.

Pegler had used the homosexual theme before. A favorite device is to describe enemies as flouncing and pouting in plain reference to effeminacy even when the men described are unquestionably masculine. But the State Department's discharge of the 91 gave new impetus to Pegler.

With an intensity that must have surprised even hardened Pegler students, the old master dug up a casual reference in an interview on the radio with Mrs. Roosevelt. Said the gleeful Pegler on March 25:

"In the light of the disclosure of the 91, it is not cynicism to wonder whether the Empress Eleanor was being naive or imposing on the naïveté of the public when she said on the air that she always had lots of queer friends. She certainly is a woman of the world and, some of her associates considered, can hardly expect to be regarded as an ignoramus on such matters. Queer was right."

RETURNS TO REFERENCE

Though few would assume that Mrs. Roosevelt was using the vulgar term for homosexual when she talked about "queer friends" on her radio interview, this was a reference that Pegler ultimately returned to as an admission by Mrs. Roosevelt that she was involved in extra-marital romantic affairs.

As far as the State Department was concerned, Pegler was scandalized. He struck at the complacency of the Sate Department over the presence of homosexuals. He pointed out that this compared poorly with the vigilance of Adolf Hitler who shot his old friend, Captain Roehm, when Roehm was accused of homosexualism. That Hitler shot Roehm for strictly nonsexual reasons, and that many persons would not regard the firing of 91 men as complacency, did not deter Pegler.

Pegler reached his high point in two funny columns, one an open letter to Dean Acheson, the other a poem about the girls in the State Department. In these columns Pegler used all the printable vulgar terms for homosexual—and a few that most newspapers had previously regarded as unprintable. This adventure into the field of taste was presented as a magnificent comic gesture by Pegler, who two weeks later said in an outrage at some Supreme Court and other officials: "Vulgarity and bad manners, even bad morals, were preferred to honor, decorum, and propriety by the spiritually unwashed."

In column after column, Westbrook Pegler, champion of honor, decorum, and propriety, kept his mind glued to the subject of homosexualism. In no other place in the country, he said of the State Department, is there such a collection of homosexuals, "with the possible exception of the bevy known as Q Section in the Pentagon." This mysterious reference was transferred later on to "Q Section of Welfare Island and other cesspools of depravity."

NEVER CITED NATIONAL RATE

At no time did Pegler bother to tell his readers that the known rate for homosexualism in the general population is 4 percent for confirmed homosexuals, and as high as 50 percent for occasional homosexual outlets for older bachelors. Using the more conservative figure of 4 percent, the State Department with 5,000 permanent Washington employees, has a rate of less than 2 percent. Thus it has only half as many homosexuals as the general population and it can now be accused of excessive masculinity.

Perhaps the most revealing reaction to sex that Pegler made during the study period was his blast at a reference to the Kinsey report. In a book about the first Kinsey report, Morris L. Ernst and David Loth say that one reason that there is a wide difference between the laws regarding sex and the sexual practices of people in general is that laws are frequently made or influenced by those who know little about normal sex. "Celibates have been the most dogmatic expounders of the normal and the moral in sexual behavior," the authors wrote.

When Pegler read the Ernst-Loth statement about celibates, he exploded in print:

"Who, then, however, would Mr. Ernst prefer— prostitutes, homosexuals, and other perverts as arbiters of sexual behavior."

Pegler, who is often praised by admirers as a man who can sure use the English language, apparently assumed that celibate is the opposite of "prostitutes, homosexuals, and other perverts," and was not aware, possibly, that every normally married person is a noncelibate.

If Pegler had continued his reading of the book on the Kinsey report he would have found on page 48, on the seventh line, the following sentence:

"Lewdness, like beauty, is in the eye of the beholder."

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. This is the third of four articles on Westbrook Pegler)

"I abhor exaggeration in journalism."

This pronouncement was made by Westbrook Pegler in his newspaper column for January 19.

Thus instructed, a reporter combed Pegler's columns for 15 weeks, looking for practical demonstrations of this admirable concept.

One such demonstration was:

"The Department of Labor is a colossal fraud performing no useful service for the whole public, but, on the contrary, serving only the unions and the racketeers to the public injury."

It is to be regretted that Pegler did not document this unexaggerated statement, since many of the millions who read it may remember only that the Department of Labor as a part of its duties produces statistics on the number of people employed and unemployed in the country, keeps a file of all labor contracts to which management and labor both have access, issues a quarterly survey of industrial accidents and monthly data on building activity, conducts the United States Employment Service and a conciliation service to reduce strikes. And Pegler missed a chance to be valuable to the financial and industrial system of the Nation which gears its operations in part to the statistics of the "colossal fraud performing no useful service."

ANOTHER LESSON

Another lesson by Pegler in how to avoid exaggeration in journalism came as a result of an incident in President Truman's inaugural ceremonies. The incident was reported by the Associated Press on January 21 in a description of the parade that passed the President's stand. "But there was barely a smile on the Presidential lips when Gov. J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina rode past. Thurmond was the States' Rights Party candidate or President."

On February 24, presumably after waiting a month to let his feelings cool down to the point where he would commit none of the abhorrent exaggerations, Pegler wrote:

"This was beyond challenge the dirtiest piece of personal business done by any President in modern times, as cowardly as well, because the same affront as a private citizen to another's wife would have got him a damn good licking on the spot. The guttersnipe in this fellow is irrepressible, as he proved. A few of Truman's partisans, being naturally without honor, tried to lie away the incident, but a thousand witnesses had seen him stare with cold malice at the Thurmonds, with never a twitch of recognition."

His horror at exaggeration presumably was still at work when Pegler on March 10 described for his readers the wartime powers created by Roosevelt and espoused by the present administration. Those powers, he said, provided that "any newspaper or press association, any radio station, any great or little business could be seized by the Army, as Montgomery Ward was, on the ground that any Communist members of any union had been kicked out for sabotage by a foreman with a son dead on Guadalcanal."

MEANING NOT CLEAR

It is not clear here whether Pegler means that the Communist members of any union would be kicked out because a foreman with a son dead on Guadalcanal had committed sabotage or whether the Communists did the sabotage and the foreman with a son kicked them out. Neither is it clear under what NLRB provision the Government can seize a plant "on the ground that any Communist member of any union had been kicked out for sabotage by a foreman with a son dead on Guadalcanal." But what is of interest at this point is that if this explanation of the Montgomery Ward case by Pegler is not an exaggeration, then the newspapers of the Nation carried an erroneous story at the time. The version of the story told to the public then was that during the war 1,000 Ward workers went on strike at the Chicago plant of the firm. Because their production was vital to the war effort, the Government ordered them back with the agreement that the dispute would be arbitrated. The workers obeyed and went back, the issues were arbitrated, but then Sewell Avery, head of Ward's, refused to abide by the arbitration and his plant was seized.

On April 14, in another example of Pegler reserve, the column contained an attack on the Luce magazines, Time and Life, declaring: "Time is more harmonious with the Henry Wallace wing of the Democratic Party than with Republican principles." This could have confused those Pegler readers who remembered that during the campaign Time carried a cover of Wallace showing him as a Pied Piper leading his party, members of which were, by unmistakable implication, rats. Possibly Pegler saw an implication that escaped Time in portraying Wallace as a Pied Piper who, according to legend, was a public benefactor deliberately leading the pack to their doom. But Time's story of Wallace declared: "He has not been a man distinguished for moral courage * * *, a weak leader driven by ambition * * *." This was, said Pegler, a harmonious relationship.

STANDARDS HAVE CHANGED

Pegler's journalistic standards have changed over the years, according to people who have followed the volatile columnist for the last 17 years. In 1933 Pegler was a sports writer when Monte Bourjaily, a syndicate executive, persuaded Pegler, then one of the most colorful sports writers in the business, to turn his attention to world affairs.

For many years Pegler brought his strong language and militant skepticism to the general news. In many columns he also brought good reporting and persistent investigation. In the late thirties, with the help of a rival union, Pegler exposed Willie Bioff, the west coast racketeer who was running Hollywood unions. In 1940 Pegler won the Pulitzer Prize for a series of articles exposing the president of the Building Service Employees International Union, AFL. The then-president, George Scalise, fell before the factual reporting of Pegler and was sent to jail.

But somewhere along the line, Pegler who used to announce himself as a friend of labor and who even used to print admiring phrases about Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt became embittered both about American unions and American politics. By 1950, when this study was made, he devoted himself almost entirely to the free use of epithet to attack entire institutions. In this way, Pegler, who used to take pride in his ability to dig out facts like a good reporter, began to replace the hard facts with colorful figures of speech. But apparently he still regards his own figures of speech as factual reporting.

AMAZED AT LYNCHING FUSS

Twenty-seven days after Pegler announced, "I abhor exaggeration in journalism," he wrote a column in which he expressed amazement that there should be so much fuss about lynching down South. For every Negro lynched in the South, he said, "union murderers under the Truman party's political protection have killed 100 and mobbed 1,000 innocent citizens in wild insurrections across the Northern tier and in bloody California."

If this is a conservative ratio, then Pegler has unearthed a story warranting another Pulitzer prize. He refers to 100 union murders per lynching under the protection of "Truman party's political protection," meaning presumably the Democratic Party. Taking just the first year of that party's administration in the era of Pegler, 1933, one finds that there were 28 lynchings in the South. According to the Pegler formula, of 100 union murders for every lynching, this would mean that in 1933 union people murdered 2,800 citizens in the North and in "bloody California." But according to the "Unified Crime Reports" of the FBI, there were in 1933 only 1,761 murders and nonnegligent manslaughters in all the United States and its possessions.

So if union members murdered 2,800 persons in 1933 and only 1,761 murders were recorded by all the local police and the FBI, then a large number of citizens—1,039, to be exact—were murdered in cold blood but were never recorded by the police or the FBI. This is a startling figure and speaks ill of our law-detection forces. On the other hand, since this cannot be an exaggeration according to the solemn words of its author, this means that all the murders committed in 1933 were done by labor unions, leaving not a single stabbing, shooting, or strangulation done by scab—that is, nonunion—murderers.

(Four of the Nation's top columnists and commentators recently were checked over a 15-week period for accuracy in the news that they printed or broadcast. Articles already have been printed on Walter Winchell, Drew Pearson, and Fulton Lewis, Jr. This is the last of four articles on Westbrook Pegler.)

Out of the mass of Pegler writings collected for 14 weeks early this year there arose, among other things, a device that could be called the Pegler syllogism. An ordinary, old-fashioned syllogism goes something like this:

1. All lemons are sour.
2. This fruit is a lemon.
3. Therefore, it follows that this fruit must be sour.

NEW-TYPE SYLLOGISM

This type of logic has been in vogue for some time but on March 4 Pegler revealed his new-type syllogism with a blinding example. The text is presented untouched except for the insertion of numbers:

1. "Mr. Truman is demanding a law from Congress which is called an antilynching law."

2. "All good citizens oppose lynching."

3. "It follows that Mr. Truman is not a good citizen because he insists on excusing all lynchings of innocent victims by mobs of union goons."

4. "So, obviously, its advocates favor lynching by their own cohorts."

5. "The principle here is practically identical with that of the Nazis in their ferocious eradication of the town of Lidice in the war."

WHAT PEGLER "PROVES"

Thus by this excerpt—reproduced here without any omissions—the Pegler syllogism has proved that because President Truman has asked for an antilynching law he is endorsing the principle by which the Nazis wiped out an entire town during the war.

The Pegler syllogism, like any new invention, might be resisted at first, so the inventor goes on to explain:

"Some citizens of Lidice had killed a high Nazi. Therefore, the Nazis killed some, perhaps all, of the men and boys, deported the women and children, and razed the town. The degree of revenge was severe, but the principle was exactly the same as Truman's in the antilynching matter. If Selma, Ala., should have a lynching and it seemed to a Federal authority that the police and sheriff were remiss, then all Selma would have to pay. But if Flint, Mich., were to suffer another criminal insurrection under the auspices of the CIO, that would be no lynching."

LOGIC PUZZLING

How "all Selma would have to pay" under the antilynching law and where Flint, Mich., and "another criminal insurrection" came from is puzzling to a prisoner of the old-fashioned laws of logic.

But thus launched, the Pegler syllogism continued to grow into a major philosophy. Another time, the inventor said:

"If all the unions in the United States were to succeed totally, every worker in the country would be a member of some union and competition would die."

In the next paragraph, he then says, "Under total unionism they would come to the point where they would all be preying on one another and all of them on the rest of the population."

Again, a plodder trained in the old school would ask how "preying on one another" agrees with "competition would die."

Some idea of what Pegler regards as a "reasonable surmise" can be gained from Pegler's unhappy tangle with the Bullochs of Georgia. In his microscopic examination of the Roosevelt genealogy, Pegler turned up, he thought, a post-Civil War scoundrel named Rufus Brown Bullock, "one of the foulest rascals of a day when rascality was truly in flower." Pegler accused Mrs. Roosevelt of being descended from Rufus. Pegler's column inspired a howl of outrage, however, from Mrs. Roosevelt's real kin in Georgia, the Bullochs. They told the world that Rufus Bullock was a damyankee and no kin to the Bullochs or Mrs. Roosevelt.

A "REASONABLE" ERROR

This was a "reasonable" error, Pegler explained to his readers on March 23. It was also Mrs. Roosevelt's fault:

"In view of flagrant reticence in her works, notably concerning Mrs. Winthrop Rutherford and Sergeant Earl Miller, the New York State cop, I therefore was seduced into a reasonable surmise that the empress (Eleanor Roosevelt) was concealing something."

(He added: "* * * I make few mistakes and never lie.")

Not all of Pegler's logic is his own invention. A favorite is that primitive weapon, guilt by association, so admired by certain other columnists. In describing a psychiatrist who appeared in the Alger Hiss trial, Pegler reported "Binger is a crony of Dr. Gregory Zilboorg, who came from Russia after the Kerensky and Lenin revolutions." (The line of reasoning here is that the Lenin and Kerensky revolutions in Russia were Communist affairs. Dr. Zilboorg was in Russia at the time. Dr. Zilboorg is known to be friendly with Dr. Binger. Therefore, Dr. Binger is a dangerous character.)

Another time Pegler proved—by his standards—the "pro-Communist" character of Publisher Marshall Field by saying that at one time Field had a lawyer and this lawyer had a sister and this sister represented some Communists in court once.

NOTORIOUS LETTER TO ACHESON

In his notorious open letter to Dean Acheson, in which he used vulgar terms for homosexual, Pegler made his innuendos and then asked: "By the way, have you checked with Harvard lately on the courses which are offered for young men of distinction who have heard the call of the Wilde and are thinking of taking up careers in the Department of State? Is there a course in millinery there? What about flower arrangements? Fair Harvard must keep in step. I think I will write to the proper official just to check up. What is his title? Duchess?"

The reasoning behind this innuendo that Harvard University is an institution of homosexuals went something like this: "(1) The Loyalty Review Board in Washington said it released 91 homosexuals from Government service; (2) these 91 men came from the State Department; (3) the head of the State Department is Dean Acheson; (4) therefore, Dean Acheson must be a homosexual; (5) Dean Acheson is a Harvard man; (6) therefore, Harvard must be a homosexual institution.

Despite this magnificent stretch of guilt by association attained by Pegler, there is the disappointing fact that Acheson is not a Harvard man but a Yale man. Acheson got his law degree from Harvard but graduated from Yale and is a trustee of that institution. By turning his finger of guilt on Cambridge instead of New Haven, Pegler also missed a golden opportunity. You see, if he had remembered that Acheson was a Yale man and not a Harvard man, then Yale would become a suspicious university and that would make another enemy, Henry Luce, also a Yale man.

YET ANOTHER DEVICE

While readers are still gasping in admiration at Pegler's stunning manipulations of logic, he is apt to sweep them off their feet with yet another device—contradiction. On February 24, Pegler commented on the exclusive interview that Arthur Krock, New York Times columnist, got from President Truman.

"My own congratulations are special," said Pegler, "because I tried to put over the same deal a year ago and was turned down because, among other things, I had not promoted Truman in the campaign. Neither, for that matter, did Krock. * * *"

On January 10 at the top of his column he wrote with injured innocence:

"I still find myself referred to as a labor baiter by men who are demonstrably harsh and greedy enemies of labor. * * * I wince because I assume that some of the rank and file and even some of the people who are supposed to be intelligent will believe them."

Having thus set the rank and file apart from people who are supposed to be intelligent, Pegler, less than 800 words later and presumably still wincing because some uncharitable person might think him an enemy of labor, writes:

"I hope the foregoing, respectfully submitted, will not be construed as an admission that unionism in any of the forms that we have seen in this country, is fit for anything but to be blown to hell."

WEAPON NOT NEGLECTED

Pegler did not neglect this powerful weapon of logic. In January he attacked the Washington Post for an editorial which said that during the thirties there were widespread illusions about communism. Pegler is scornful of the statement. "How widespread were those illusions about communism?" he asked. "I never was a victim of them. Were you? The truth is that those illusions were not widespread at any time." But only 3 days later, on January 31, he said calmly, "It is possible that many influential men and women were victims of those widespread illusions about communism. It never fooled me."

It is possible that Pegler, who knows the power of guilt by association and contradiction, was purging himself in public. In the thirties Pegler had to miss an invitation from the Communist magazine New Masses to do an article but wrote pleasantly to them, "Hope there'll be a return date." In 1935 he gave an interview to the Daily Worker, and said he thought that the latest plans of the Communist Party for a farmer-labor movement was a good idea. Pegler himself has called Heywood Broun a Communist and Mrs. Roosevelt a pro-Communist. His best friend was once Heywood Broun, and at one time when he was still living in Connecticut Pegler went over to Krum Elbow to play croquet with Mrs. Roosevelt. (This guilty association of Pegler's cannot be excused merely by the fact that two of the most brutal columns ever written by Pegler denounced Broun as a Communist, while Broun, newly converted to Catholicism, lay dying.) And as later as 1940, Pegler called William Randolph Hearst (who was not Pegler's boss yet) a "never to be adequately damned demagogue and historic scoundrel."

1. An open collaborator with the Daily Worker. 2. A man who is saddened that he cannot also contribute to the New Masses. 3. A known intimate of a man he admits is a Communist, and a croquet chum of a woman he admits is a leading pro-Communist. 4. An attacker of the greatest anti-Communist of them all.

It is fascinating to ponder what Pegler would do if he ever went to work on a man with a background like that.

Intelligence As An Instrumentality of National Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by Col. Walter L. Furbershaw and reprinted in the June 1949 issue of Men and Events.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTELLIGENCE AS AN INSTRUMENTALITY OF NATIONAL SECURITY IN PEACE AND WAR

(By Col. Walter L. Furbershaw)

National security is today the most vital issue affecting the American people, and one of the most important instrumentalities to insure national security is an adequate and efficient intelligence service. At the outbreak of every war in American history the intelligence service has been the weakest link in the national defense chain.

The general mission of a national intelligence service is (1) to collect, evaluate and disseminate positive information of the enemy or potential enemy and (2) to counter and prevent agents of the enemy or potential enemy from securing information in regard to our military plans and activities. These functions are operative ones, and should and must be performed by personnel carefully selected and trained for the work.

The third function of the intelligence service is to deduce from the intelligence at hand the strategical or tactical intentions and capabilities of the enemy and to advise higher authority as to those deductions. This latter is a staff function.

Military and naval intelligence are not directly concerned with any counter-intelligence activities among the civilian population, except in occupied territory in time of war or with respect to civilian personnel under military or naval jurisdiction. Counter-intelligence activities among the civilian population in the zone of the interior are normally under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, operating through its Federal Bureau of Investigation.

REGULAR ARMY LACKS INTELLIGENCE PERSONNEL

An efficient intelligence service should be equipped to secure all possible information concerning the military, political, geographic, economic, scientific, psychologic, and sociologic situation in enemy or potential enemy countries. Unfortunately, our armed services have been unable to maintain or were unfavorably disposed toward the maintenance of even small cadres of efficient intelligence personnel until our country has been actively engaged in warfare.

The Regular Army of the United States has no intelligence branch, although there is such a branch in the Organized Reserves. Between the two world wars the Regular Army intelligence (G–2) officers were drawn from the infantry, artillery, or other arms of the service, detailed as members of the General Staff Corps, and assigned to military intelligence duties. After a short tour of intelligence duty, such officers were returned to service with their respective arms, and many of them lost what interest or adeptness they had in intelligence functions.

Officers sent abroad as military and naval attachés were not always selected because of their aptitude, but in many cases because of their ability to stand the financial strain of living up to the social demands made upon them in foreign capitals. Usually these attachés secured only such information as the authorities of the countries to which they were accredited felt disposed to give them or allowed them to obtain.

At the outbreak or imminence of hostilities, it has been necessary to recruit, train, and assign intelligence personnel under conditions that made it difficult to build an efficient intelligence organization.

PEACETIME INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

In the past very little provision was made for counter intelligence. There is a report to the effect that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, just a few months before the United States entered World War I, only $11,000 was appropriated for use by the military intelligence service on counter intelligence activities.

A considerably better showing was made before the outbreak of World War II, when a large number of military intelligence Reserve officers were called to active duty and, under the direction of intelligence-minded Regular officers, given intensive training in intelligence operations and techniques. This group of officers was the nucleus around which was built up an intelligence service which, after overcoming many obstacles, attained an efficiency comparable to that of our allies. This, however, came only after considerable loss of time and unnecessary expense.

Shortly after VJ-day the service, which by that time had become one of the best intelligence services, was allowed to disintegrate by the relief from active duty or discharge of trained and experienced personnel—this at a time when such a service was needed as urgently as it was during actual hostilities.

EVEN MOSES HAD AN INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

The collection of this military, political, geographic, economic, scientific, psychologic, and sociologic information should be a continuing process rather than a service to be activated only in times of international crisis, when the procurement of such information is difficult and costly.

Great Britain and France have maintained permanent national intelligence services over a period of several centuries. These services were headed by men of ability and long experience. Drawn from men in every field of endeavor, the operating forces were so situated throughout the world that the British and French homelands were at all times supplied wtih accurate information needed to protect their interests. At headquarters in London and Paris the information received was evaluated and then disseminated to the governmental departments interested.

In the past our national authorities never gave whole-hearted support to the organization of an effective intelligence system. They were influenced by the false concept that this country should not interest itself in the private affairs of other nations, and that to do so is unethical and beneath the dignity of the United States. That this concept is false and that we should have no qualms of national conscience in respect to an intelligence service is supported by Bible reference. Some 3,500 years ago, according to chapter 13, verses 1, 2, 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the Book of Numbers, Moses received a divine directive to collect and evaluate information concerning the land of Canaan. This directive was:

"1. And the Lord spake unto Moses saying:

"2. Send thou men that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel; of every tribe of their fathers shall you send a man, every man a ruler among them;

* * * * *

"17. And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan and said unto them, Get you up this way southward and go up into the mountain;

"18. And see the land what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many;

"19. And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents or in strongholds;

"20. And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be ye of good courage and bring of the fruit of the land."

A careful analysis of the orders to Moses shows that the information sought was geographic, psychologic, economic, military, and political—almost identical in type with the information now necessary to a proper evaluation of the war potential of an enemy or probable enemy country.

POOR INTELLIGENCE TECHNIQUE

In addition to our woeful lack of foresightedness in the collection of positive information, we have been equally culpable in handling what little information we had. This is particularly true with respect to the evaluation and dissemination of information, which is practically useless unless it is carefully evaluated and speedily placed in the hands of those who can and should make use of it.

Our experience at Pearl Harbor, where we failed to protect ourselves against attack, knowing full well that Japan had attacked China (in 1894) and Russia (in 1904) before a formal declaration of war; at the Battle of the Bulge (in December 1944), where failure to heed or faulty evaluation of intelligence reports of German strength and capabilities proved so costly to us; and several years later at the Pan-American Conference at Bogota, where careless valuation and lack of proper dissemination of intelligence proved so embarrassing to us, are but a few examples of poor intelligence technique. In each instance mentioned the unfortunate results were not the fault of the operative intelligence personnel in the field but that of personnel in higher echelons.

Another weakness in our intelligence system was the tendency at times of one armed service or executive department to discount information received from a coordinate arm or department. Whether this was due to interarmed service or interdepartmental jealousy or competition for credit, it is difficult to say.

ESPIONAGE AND INTRIGUE NOW RAMPANT

At no time in our history has espionage and intrigue made such attacks on our national security as during the last decade. Our failure to take proper and effective steps to uncover and prosecute those engaged in disloyal and subversive activities has, to a large degree, contributed to the dangerous international situation that now confronts us.

For years, Soviet Russia, through its own agents and its fifth column in this country, has been kept informed of our strength, intentions and capabilities. Through members of the Communist Party of the United States and its controlled satellite front organizations in high or strategic positions in Federal executive departments, the Soviet Union has had access to the most secret documents concerning our national policy and security.

Many of these office-holding agents of international communism also used their official status to beguile and influence their superiors to adopt measures that furthered the foreign policy of the Soviet Union and compromised and discredited that of the United States, the Constitution of which they had sworn to uphold and defend. Due to the diligence of the Intelligence services of the Armed Forces, very few of these disloyal or disaffected elements were able to infiltrate any of the active units of Army or Navy Intelligence, notwithstanding constant pressure of their friends to secure such assignments for them.

The public press of late has been filled with reports of the investigation by the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives, showing the extent of the Soviet conspiracy to obtain secret official information from our executive departments. No effective action in the way of prosecution of the individuals involved has been taken by the Federal authorities charged with such duty.

HOW CANADA REACTED TO SOVIET ESPIONAGE

The Canadian Government has blazed a trail that our Government would do well to follow. One Igor Gouzenko, a cipher clerk on the staff of the Military Attaché of the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa, revealed the existance in Canada of a network of Soviet espionage involving more than 20 officials and employees of the Canadian Government, one of them a member of the Canadian Parliament. A Royal Commission was appointed on February 5, 1945, to investigate the facts and make a report.

Under date of June 27, 1946, the Royal Commission submitted a comprehensive 700-page report revealing a Soviet espionage system the extent of which is almost beyond belief. The member of the Canadian Parliament and 10 other arrested officials and residents of Canada were convicted and the officials of the Soviet Embassy ordered deported to Russia.

The Premier of Canada personally saw to it that copies of the Royal Commission's report were laid before our top officials in Washington, as the evidence tended to establish that the conspiracy had contacts operating in the United States along much the same lines. Every American should read the report of the Royal Commission.

It is fair to assume that if the Soviet Union maintained such an elaborate system of espionage and official corruption in Canada it has a vaster and more dangerous espionage system in operation in our country, which Russia considers the greatest threat to its ideological and political objectives.

COMMUNIST INTRANSIGENCE

We should never forget that international Marxist-Stalinist communism, as represented by the Soviet Union, has never deviated one iota from what it considers as its main objective—world communism controlled and dominated by a ruthless conspiratorial cabal with headquarters in Moscow. This objective is to be attained by the violent overthrow of capitalism and free enterprise and all they stand for and their replacement by a dictatorial world Soviet regime, under which every vestige of individual freedom will be extirpated.

Bear always in mind that Soviet policy, national and international, is a policy of expediency under which moral principles are subordinated to what is politic or advantageous for facilitating the Soviet ends or objectives. An uncompromising policy of that kind brands those responsible for its execution as devoid of national and individual honor, as we understand the words, and without regard for the sanctity of treaties or the pledged word. "Peace feelers" from a nation so disposed are to be ignored unless they are accompanied by positive action attesting to their sincerity.

The Soviet Union operates on the assumption that all capitalist nations are antagonistic to Russia and its satellites and, like the Communist regime, are capable of and intend to make use of every deceitful practice that is standard operating procedure in the Kremlin. At times Soviet power will retreat or trim its sails and change its tack by making apparent concessions in an effort to overcome more than expected opposition by the capitalist world. Such maneuvers are tactical only and are used to soften up foreign sentiment by creating an illusion of a Soviet change to a policy of nonaggression and conciliation. Russia thus hopes to so delude the confused and irresolute among the nationals of the capitalist countries that they will act or bring pressure to lessen security and defensive measures.

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

So long as the Soviet Union maintains its present policy and ideology, the United States should not lessen in any degree its measures to provide for adequate defense and security. An efficient intelligence service is one of the most important of those measures.

Many intelligence officers had hoped that the National Security Act of 1947 (Unification Act), under which the Central Intelligence Agency was established, would provide the means of correcting many of the deficiencies in American intelligence operations. That act provides in general that the Central Intelligence Agency shall act on the national level, shall be concerned only with national security from the foreign aspect; shall coordinate and evaluate information received from other intelligence services, such as those of the Army, Navy, State, and other departments, and shall prepare estimates of the situation for higher authority at prescribed intervals.

It was intended to be a coordinating agency with operating functions only in the foreign field and not in fields now covered by any of the other agencies. There is, of course, bound to be some overlap, but this can be kept at a minimum to prevent duplication of effort and cross-purpose operation. It is to be expected that intelligence estimates sent to the Central Agency by the other agencies will be subconsciously colored by their respective service interests. Army, Navy, and Air Force intelligence officers naturally stress information that most concerns their particular services.

Any conflicts are to be ironed out and reconciled by the experts the Central Intelligence Agency is expected to assign to the important tasks of evaluating the information and preparing national estimates of the situation.

Since its organization but a few years ago, the Central Intelligence Agency has been headed by three different directors—one Air Force general and two admirals, of whom only one, Admiral Souers, had any experience as an intelligence officer.

NECESSARY ADJUSTMENTS IN CIA

From reports of surveys and comments of fair-minded critics, it is apparent that the Central Intelligence Agency will be able to accomplish its important mission only if and when organizational and functional adjustments are made and put into operation, and a clear-cut and strictly enforced delimitation agreement entered into among the CIA and the several other specialized intelligence services, similar in effect to the agreement among the two armed services and the Department of Justice during World War II.

Such an agreement, if enforced in good faith and in the national interest, would tend to discourage the activities of power-conscious empire-building individuals and cliques. It would make for closer and better relations among the personnel of all ranks in the several intelligence services, would eliminate petty official jealousy and competition for undue credit and would build up a needed esprit de corps that would be conducive toward, what all loyal Americans hope for, an active, aggressive, and efficient national intelligence service.

Such a service is possible if the Central Intelligence Agency, the Army, Navy, and Air intelligence services and the civilian intelligence services in the executive departments work in close harmony in their respective spheres of action with national security and defense as the one and only reason for their existence.

WE MUST ARM WITH CAREFULLY EVALUATED INFORMATION

No competent business or professional man enters into an important conference or deal without previous complete information concerning all of the elements that contribute to produce the results he desires.

Our country cannot plan for its security and defense and should not enter into any international conference or agreement without previous adequate and accurate intelligence reports or estimates of the situation with which it is confronted.

Armed with carefully evaluated information concerning all elements involved in an international controversy, representatives of the United States (assuming, of course, that such representatives are not tainted by sympathy with antagonistic foreign nations and subversive ideologies) could enter into negotiations without at any time giving consideration to the necessity or expediency of appeasing a potential enemy or entering into agreements or making concessions incompatible with our national principles and policy.

Past Mistakes Can Help Prevent Future Mistakes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, David Lawrence in a recent article points out some important mistakes in our national defense that must not be overlooked in future planning. The following are excerpts from the article, which I ask to be included for the purposes of the future and not for the purposes of recrimination or causing disunity and argument over what is in the past:

If, in addition to the three big aircraft carriers in the Pacific, six more were in operation off the coast of Korea—and we have available 17 large-sized and 60 smaller-sized carriers still in "mothballs"—there would conceivably be no loss of the port of Pohang today and no loss of the valuable airstrip behind it, thus leaving us only one airfield behind our lines in South Korea.

If, along with the light cruisers and destroyers, there was in Korean waters a division of four battleships—we have several in "mothballs"—there would not be a railroad operating within 12 miles inland on either coast and no substantial amount of supplies would be able to move down from North Korea, Russia, or Communist China. The big 16-inch shells of the battleships, firing from short distances off shore with unerring aim in all kinds of weather, can do more damage by steady bombardment than can be done by similar weight projectiles dropped indiscriminately from high altitude by the large bombers at infrequent intervals. If the battleship Missouri had only been stationed in the Far East, the news would be different today.

If there were nine big aircraft carriers off the Korean coasts with a total of approximately 900 planes aboard, there could be 24-hour bombing and strafing and air artillery support given to our ground troop movements. As it is, the enemy moves men and supplies at night and we do not have enough planes there with those flares giving a huge candlepower of illumination to carry on strafing and bombing around the clock.

If enough of the big aircraft carriers of the Navy were in Korean waters, the ground troops would not have to worry about protecting the only two airstrips they have had behind their lines. For planes dependent on ground bases alone must remain there for servicing part of the time and this leaves them open to attack by enemy artillery or planes. The aircraft carrier on the other hand moves its floating base off shore at will and is ready 24 hours a day to attack or defend itself because it gets a vast amount of antiaircraft protection from the cruisers and destroyers that surround it in what is known as the "carrier task force."

Some of the same misconceptions which resulted in mistaken policies before the Korean war are being perpetuated today in the news dispatches and official communiques. The work of all airmen is lumped together and the same stories are widely printed as heretofore about the weight of the total number of bombs dropped—as if this has anything to do with the effectiveness of the fire if targets are missed as they were repeatedly by high-flying bombers in the last war and as official reports and surveys testified.

Also, low-level dive-bombing of a strategic nature done by the aviators of the Naval Air Force flying from the broad decks of aircraft carriers. These flyers stay over the targets for hours at a time because they do not have to fly back long distances and they fly low enough to see what they are aiming at. They do not, moreover, kill noncombatants unless the latter happen to be right at the targets, and this is something of growing importance if the Korean population isn't to be turned against us because of the indiscriminate bombing from high altitudes.

Compton Post, No. 2089, VFW, Unanimously Votes Resolution Re Communist Party, Subversive Groups, Foreign Control Parasites, Etc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, for the information of yourself and for that of my other distinguished colleagues in this great legislative body, and for the immediate information of all concerned, I am pleased to call to your attention the following important resolution which was just received by me from the VFW Post, No. 2089, at Compton, Los Angeles County, Calif.

This dynamic, vigilant, patriotic group of veterans is one of the most important in my native State of California, and its leadership and membership is always on its toes in the interest of the security of our beloved Nation and in its national defense. The resolution follows:

Whereas Compton Post, No. 2089, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, is comprised solely of veterans who served our Government overseas and on foreign soil during the various wars and campaigns; and

Whereas these members are, from personal experience, aware of the extreme detriment to our Government and to all Americans collectively and individually, by the undermining and undercover activities of the Communist Party and their sympathetic supporters; and

Whereas these members having seen the results of unoppressed similar activities in other countries and the ultimate drastic results therefrom, are determined to insure action by our various legislative bodies to remove these hazards from our great country; and

Whereas to date the United States of America has not concluded peace negotiations since the cessation of hostilities from World War II and therefore we as a nation are, in fact, still in a state of war; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States of America justly provides rights, freedoms, and protection for its loyal citizens, it likewise provides punishments for treasonable acts of which the maximum during a state of war is punishment by death; and

Whereas the ultimate goal of the Communist Party members, rampant throughout our country today, is the overthrow of our Government by unlawful and forceful acts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Compton Post, No. 2089, in regular session assembled, this 24th day of July 1950, unanimously go on record to make the necessary demands upon our legislative representatives at any and all levels of Government to remove the shield of protection given these members of all subversive groups insofar as equal rights and freedoms are granted to loyal citizens and to enact whatever legislation as required, to interpret the dastardly acts and plotting of these foreign-controlled parasites for the eventual detriment and/or overthrow of our present form of government a traitorous acts; and be it further

Resolved, That punishment for convictions of any individual or individuals for treason under the aforementioned circumstances be effected quickly, firmly, and in its most severe form; and be it further

Resolved, That during the current international emergency all persons, known to be members of the Communist Party, or any other subversive party or group and/or their sympathizers be remanded to custody and deported or placed in a centralized location subjected to constant guard to insure against any possible sabatage to public and/or private property or well being of the citizens of this glorious country, and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be immediately forwarded to the fourth district commander, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States of America for endorsement and further forwarding to the State Department of California Veterans of Foreign Wars and on the national council of administration, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States for action on a national level, and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Los Angeles County Council, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and to the various local newspaper publications and the legislative representatives of our local districts after endorsement by the fourth district, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

G. A. FLOYD,
Commander.

Attest:

DALE H. LEWIS,
Adjutant.

Monday Quarterbacks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Monday Quarterbacks," which was published in the Boston Post on August 15, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONDAY QUARTERBACKS

The statement issued by the four Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is a strange document. Five years after the fact they now censure the Democratic administration for failure to realize what were Mr. Stalin's plans when the Second World War ended.

The Republican statement says: "The major tragedy of our time was the failure and refusal of American leadership in 1945 to recognize the true aims and methods of the rulers of Soviet Russia. To this failure can be traced the disintegration of our Armed Forces in 1945, which would not have occurred if the need for retaining adequate forces had been explained to the American people, and the senseless destruction of billions of dollars' worth of military equipment which the United States and its friends so desperately need today."

That is what the Republican leaders in the Senate say now. But, in the past 5 years what have they been saying? Until the fighting broke out in Korea, they were saying that they were wholeheartedly backing up the Democratic administration in its foreign policy. Governor Dewey, John Foster Dulles, the Republican expert on foreign affairs, and the able and sincere Senator VANDENBERG all pledged themselves to a bipartisan attitude on the foreign policy as outlined by the administration.

What did General Dwight D. Eisenhower say in Moscow 5 years ago? The General said: "I see nothing in the future that would prevent Russia and the United States from being the closest possible friends." This from the man whom the Republicans are trying to draft as their candidate for President.

Five years ago yesterday the war with Japan ended. Who among the Republican leaders at that time suggested that we keep the boys under arms and continue to spend more billions in preparation for another war? What chance would any such suggestion then have had as a resolution before Congress? The millions of veterans were clamoring to come home and were busily counting up their "points" to be sure they had the needed 85 which would qualify them for early release from the services. What government could stay in office who would refuse to let these millions of boys come home to their mothers, wives, and sweethearts, merely because of suspicion of Russia's motives for the future?

The Republican Senate leaders now say that the loss of freedom in Europe by the peoples of Poland, eastern Germany, the Baltic states, Albania, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and Bulgaria, and in Asia by Outer Mongolia, North Korea, and China can be laid to the blindness of the Democratic Administration at Yalta and Potsdam. But after a large part of this program of Communist domination of these peoples had been accomplished, when the Republicans had control of Congress in the years 1946-48, did these Republican leaders then clamor that our warships be taken out of mothballs, and that millions of new soldiers be mobilized to be ready for a further more direct attack?

That is not the way we heard it. Instead they were going along on a nonpartisan basis for the Marshall plan and the ECA, and commending practically every move the Administration proposed on foreign affairs.

Brief Statement by World War II Veteran

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I received the following comments from a distinguished veteran of World War II in my native State of California. He is a married man with a family—a diligent and tireless worker in industry and in civic work, and a veterans' leader. Coming from him I recognize it represents the considered thinking of a young citizen who is manifestly thinking about the destiny of our Nation and the security of the world from Communist aggression. I submit it for your consideration:

DOES CHARITY BEGIN AT HOME OR ABROAD?

(By Harold P. Camp, Veteran of World War II)

June 25, 1950, saw the beginning of another armed conflict involving the Armed Forces of our country. From whence come the men and women who comprise that same array of fighting power which we term the Armed Forces? I am sure that no one needs to look in the dictionary for the answer to that question. The answer is still fresh in the memory of every American citizen. It was our brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, nieces, nephews, cousins, fathers, sons, daughters; yes, and even our mothers, who made up that array of fighting strength and spirit needed to rid the world of aggression by the Germans and Japs. And yet, today we face aggression by another nation and its satellites—the Soviet Union.

Today's newspaper quotes as a news release the fact that the Armed Services Committee has referred to Congress its findings concerning the necessary provisions for enactment of legislation to provide family allowance for dependents of those in military service. My reaction, upon reading the amounts listed in the committee's report, was to throw the paper to the floor in disgust. I asked myself if perhaps I might have misread the article so I again picked up the paper and carefully reread the entire article word by word. Sure enough, the same congressional Representatives who are charged with the responsibility of supplying the Armed Forces with the necessary personnel and equipment to safeguard our Nation from aggression, have again, for the so-called sake of "economy," sold the man in the front lines short by refusing to properly provide for those dependents necessarily left without proper support. And why should this be? The man in service has no right to speak for himself, to choose where he is to go, to question orders, to come back home from overseas when he is needed by his dependents, nor the protection by any laws other than military law.

We, as a Nation, are proud of our ability to provide relief for the needy, assistance through the Red Cross for our citizens who have been involved in a major flood, tornado, fire, or other disastrous event, aid for the crippled, maimed or blind, through cancer, tuberculosis, and crippled children's societies. Our congressional Representatives have continued that same spirit of giving and assisting by enactment of legislation to aid foreign nations to the tune of several billions of dollars. Now, I ask you, where should "economy" begin and end? May I recall to your memory the untold billions of dollars' profit paid to corporations engaged in defense work during the last war? Economy. Ours is the greatest Nation in the world, and surely, if we are to practice economy, let us not do so by forcing the dependents of our men in service to do without.

Employment of the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, at a recent meeting of the President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week, and others who are greatly interested in the welfare of the physically handicapped people of this country, the Honorable Maurice J. Tobin, Secretary of Labor, gave a very interesting and informative address. I commend its reading by everyone.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY OF LABOR AT THE NATIONAL EMPLOY THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED WEEK MEETING

Admiral McIntire, members of the President's Committee, administrators of the State employment security agencies, members of the Governors' National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week Committees, and guests, let me say in welcoming all of you to this conference that I deeply appreciate this opportunity to meet the men and women who are on the firing line in our nationwide campaign to stimulate maximum employment of physically handicapped workers and disabled veterans.

I wish also to express my appreciation of the keen interest in this program which you are demonstrating by your presence here.

Once again we have before us the task of planning for the observance of another NEPH week scheduled for the period beginning October 1, next.

The conditions we face today are vastly different from those of a year ago. Then we were just emerging from the first sharp decline in employment that had occurred in a decade. Our assignment, accordingly, was to shape a program assuring to the handicapped their fair share of a shrinking supply of job openings.

Today employment is high and going higher. We meet in the grim shadow of a tense world situation. Our troops are fighting in Korea. To meet the growing demands for manpower and supplies, this Nation is speeding defense production and rapidly expanding its armed might.

Here, in the Department of Labor, we are throwing all the resources of every bureau and agency into the task of drawing up plans to meet the current civilian manpower situation, as it is affected by the President's program. The Bureau of Employment Security and the State employment security agencies which operate the Federal-State public employment office system are already working on these plans. They are also using all their facilities to help defense plants expand manpower to meet production goals under the President's program.

We in the Department are weighing our manpower resources, not only in the light of immediate future needs, but also with respect to any more serious future developments. In these studies we are giving thought to all potential sources of labor, including youth, minority groups, women, older workers, and the handicapped.

In these studies, we are giving the most careful consideration to possibilities of labor-force expansion which lie in the great reservoir of unused skills represented by unemployed handicapped workers. This is true for both those who are ready for jobs, but unemployed, and for those who can be made ready for jobs through vocational rehabilitation and training.

Our goal this year cannot be confined merely to obtaining job equality for the physically handicapped. It must be enlarged by a vigorous campaign to bring to the attention of employers, as dramatically as we can, the very real manpower asset we have in our handicapped population. As the demand for manpower expands, employment of handicapped workers must be maximized to the extent needed in defense production.

The great and real value of handicapped workers was strikingly demonstrated in World War II for the first time. As manpower shortages became more and more acute, greater and greater use was made of the handicapped. Handicapped job placements jumped from 27,700 in 1940 to 297,000 in 1945. Altogether, 877,000 handicapped workers were recruited and placed during the war. Those handicapped workers did an outstanding job. They proved they were dependable, safe, and productive.

Hundreds of thousands of employers learned through necessity the worth of handicapped workers. They carried this knowledge into their postwar operations. In the 5-year period after the war, local employment offices placed almost 1,000,000 handicapperd workers.

As most of you know, the United States Employment Service in 1940 launched a program which has become known as Selective Placement of the Physically Handicapped. It is a technique to make sure that handicapped men and women are properly placed in jobs they are equipped to do. It is based on the principle that handicapped workers, when employed in jobs utilizing their abilities, are as efficient and dependable as nonhandicapped workers. What happened during the war, as well as studies conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics after the war, has clinched the soundness of this principle.

Today we know that the physically handicapped are people with the same interests, abilities, knowledge and skills as others who are not handicapped. Those who are not employed should be employed. Those who are not trained should be trained. The handicapped should be given the right-of-way to take their place in the common effort to build up the strength of the Nation. When selective placement is properly applied in hiring handicapped workers the handicapped will always meet the test, whether in the shop, the office, the laboratory, or on the farm.

We must encourage every employer who does not now use handicapped workers to consider them for employment, as new manpower is required in our defense effort.

We must continue to fight for equal opportunity for the physically handicapped, not merely because it is their inalienable right as American citizens, but because they are an invaluable asset to our country.

I pledge the best efforts of the Department of Labor. I know the Nation can count on all of you, as well as on other participating organizations and individuals to carry on intelligently and vigorously.

Statement No. 1, Examining Congressman Poulson's Recent Extension of Remarks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, on August 17, in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page A5916, is an extension of remarks by Congressman NORRIS POULSON, of southern California, entitled "California Wants No Columbia River Water." To me that item is very revealing, and I find that I must raise a question about the accuracy of certain of his statements while agreeing with him in other respects. In order to keep the record straight, I must add some information on the subject treated to make the picture complete.

In the extension referred to, the gentleman from California [Mr. POULSON] groups his comments under seven heads, two of which will be treated here. Quoting the first sentence of the first numbered point he says, concerning the importation of Columbia River water:

> Neither the idea nor the plan was initiated by any one connected with the State of California.

Is he not overlooking something here? This notion of diverting Columbia River water did not originate within the last few days but started several years ago. He and I were both members of the Public Lands Committee in the Eightieth Congress at which time the Honorable Richard J. Welch, of California, was chairman. Now, Chairman Welch was a great student of the water problem in California and was much concerned about the unusual drought which prevailed in California in 1947. Records show that Chairman Welch introduced on June 12, 1947, House Resolution 244, a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Reclamation, to investigate the feasibility of bringing water from the Columbia River into California. Congressman Welch made a speech on the floor of the House on June 12, 1947, stressing water needs along the California coast all south of San Francisco Bay.

I distinctly remember that when a point was made in a Public Lands Committee meeting on July 1, 1947, as to a possible connection between this proposal and the central Arizona project bill that Chairman Welch stated he had introduced his bill on his own initiative and had not consulted with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] or anyone else. Certainly I had no advance notice of Chairman Welch's Columbia River proposal.

The transcripts of the Public Lands Committee meetings of June 23 and July 1, 1947, were not printed but are on file showing 2 days of committee discussion. Having just reread this whole file I find that this spokesman for southern California [Mr. POULSON] favored this idea of a study on June 23, 1947, when it first came up in committee.

The second point of Congressman POULSON's statement is as follows:

> Prosperous as California is, it could never afford to finance a project of such magnitude as the Columbia River diversion proposed by the Interior Department.

I agree with him in this statement. Certainly California alone is not prosperous or wealthy enough to carry through such a proposed project extending as it does through more than one State. Neither was California able to carry through, as it ought to be carried through, the great Central Valley project of California, lying wholly within the State. A great engineer, Colonel Marshall, planned the Central Valley development in California as a State project, but it was soon found that the Golden State itself could not carry through successfully such an undertaking. Therefore, California gladly turned its Central Valley project over to Uncle Sam, and now, after nearly 20 years, Uncle Sam has spent several hundred million dollars on the Central Valley project in California and it is not nearly complete, and will probably cost 10 times the amount already spent to complete it properly—and I want to add—all of this development has my sanction, although I am a taxpayer in another State.

Further referring to what California reclamation efforts may reasonably do, let me add that the development of the great California Imperial Valley subjugation was also started as a local California project. No irrigation district in America has had such a checkered career or so many ups and downs as has Imperial Valley before Californians realized that it was too big for local effort alone. Therefore, Uncle Sam was asked to complete the development as it is today. It, too, has cost many millions to date. Incidentally, the final work of completion by the Bureau of Reclamation—in general, but not in certain specific details—has my hearty approval, and I own no property in California. Yes, California is a great State, but some of her water problems are too large for her to handle alone. The Central Valley project in California is of national importance and should be fully developed by the Nation. The Imperial Valley project is of international importance and should be completed by no less an authority than the Nation.

These are my comments on only two of the seven points covered in Congressman POULSON's extension of August 17. All seven of his points are crowded with meaning to the whole cause of reclamation, and they deserve careful study. Permission granted, I shall analyze the other five in subsequent statements.

The Defense of Western Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech entitled "The Defense of Western Europe," delivered by our former colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky, Hon. John Sherman Cooper, on Saturday, August 19, 1950, at the reunion of the Third Army Association in New York City. Former Senator Cooper served with the Third Army during the last war, in all of its campaigns, being promoted from private to captain during his service. I believe that his experience gives the address deep interest.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEFENSE OF WESTERN EUROPE

It is a great honor to be asked to speak at the first reunion of the Third Army Association.

The Third United States Army is one of the legendary armies of history. A few days ago, I asked at the Library of Congress for a newspaper dated August 20, 1944. Its war bulletin of the 19th was a typical story of the Third Army. On the 19th of August, 6 years ago today, Third Army tanks were probing in the outskirts of Paris, yet unliberated; to the north, at Mantes, its Seventy-ninth Division was exploiting the first crossing of the Seine; while in the south its columns of armor and men were sweeping through Orleans in the movement that was to reach the Danube and penetrate six countries in 8 months.

Tonight we remember its famed divisions; the leaders Gaffey, Gay, Koch, Matthews, Maddox, Muller, and Campanole who guided its movements; the field commanders and the fighting men who struck terror everywhere in the hearts of the foes. It is significant that Generals Gay and Walker lead the fight in Korea today.

But, at last, the soul of this Army was its leader. I cannot fix in words his restless spirit. By every standard he was one of the great combat leaders of all time. But he was more than that. His toughness, fearlessness, and daring inspired and gave pride to his men. He was proud of them. On his visit home after the war, when he was received by his townspeople at Hamilton, Mass., he looked toward a group of his disabled men and said simply: "The great honor you do me belongs to the veterans of the Third Army. I salute them."

The best that we can say is that we are proud that we served under General Patton from the day the Third landed in Normandy, in its wild dash across Europe, until that day, deep in Germany, when we knew the war had ended. Tonight, we salute him.

I assume that Colonel Cheever and Colonel Pester asked me to speak to you this evening because I have recently participated in two meetings where the state of the defenses of western Europe have been considered. In May I attended, with the Secretary of State, Acheson, the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, composed of the Foreign Ministers of the 12 nations which last year signed the North Atlantic Treaty, pledged to the mutual defense of that area. A week ago, I returned from the first meeting of the Council of Deputies, in which the deputies of the Foreign Ministers sit permanently under the leadership of Mr. Charles Spofford, an American, and one charged with the responsibility of building the defenses of the North Atlantic area. I make it clear, however, that I do not speak tonight in any official capacity and that the views that I express are my own. I have prepared and written this speech myself.

Five years ago, when the war had ended, we hoped that peace had come. The American people and the Government have steadily addressed their efforts and resources toward peace. We have pledged ourselves in the United Nations to a policy of collective security and we have faithfully supported that pledge.

The decision of the President to commit our forces in Korea in support of the United Nations is the ultimate proof of our adherence to its purposes.

Soviet Russia undertook the same solemn obligations. As a permanent member of the Security Council, it assumed upon behalf of 59 nations an additional responsibility to prevent aggression and to maintain the peace.

I do not intend to review the events of the last 5 years. It is enough to say that since the signing of the Charter, Soviet Russia has pursued a course of aggression which has brought under its domination 10 of the 20 countries of Europe, the ancient community of China, and almost one-third of the people of the world.

Its course before Korea was one of indirection and subversion. In Korea, it is one of open aggression. This aggression must be defeated to confirm the future of the United Nations, to assure defenseless nations, and to make it clear that no aggressor can succeed against the moral judgment and the determination of the peoples of the world. It is of the greatest importance that the members of the United Nations send forces to Korea quickly for the relief of the military situation and for the historic purpose of establishing a solidarity which will deter other attacks.

Tonight I want to speak to you briefly and as clearly and forcibly as I can, about a single aspect of the threat of Soviet aggression. It is the threat to Europe—the area which you know. It is a threat which places western Europe, the United Kingdom, the United States, and all the countries of the North American Continent in mortal danger and in their greatest peril in history.

I believe a brief review of the European situation will set the stage for several proposals that I am going to advance for your consideration. Since the armistice in Europe, the Soviet Union has maintained a huge military force. This vast army has been overhauled and completely modernized. The estimates of its size vary. Three weeks ago I heard Mr. Shinwell, Minister of Defense of the United Kingdom, speak to the House of Commons. He stated, and was corroborated by Mr. Churchill, that British Intelligence believes that 2,800,000 Russians are under arms in 175 divisions, one-third of which are mechanized. Mr. Churchill estimated that 80 divisions might be readily at hand for a European offensive, and that a proportionate number of the Soviet's 40,000 tanks and 19,000 planes, along with other supporting arms, are also available.

Facing this massive force is a comparatively minute combination of American, British, French, Dutch, and Belgian troops amounting to slightly more than 12 divisions, serving without unified command.

The danger implicit in this disparity in armed strength is appalling. Under present conditions, the Soviet forces could overrun Europe at any time. If the present disparity is allowed to continue, the futility of opposing Soviet aims in western Europe will become more and more apparent to Europeans. The hopelessness of their position in the face of Soviet aggression will inevitably sap their determination to resist and Europe could in time fall by default.

This possibility of actual Soviet conquest or indirect absorption of Europe strikes at our own security.

Where would America stand if Europe should fall before an attack? The Ruhr, the Saar and the other great industrial centers of western Europe, the scientists, and the manpower of the west would be in the domain of the Kremlin. If Great Britain should then fall under the weight of rockets and atomic weapons, the American Continent would be isolated and surrounded by foes. We would be compelled to rearm at a war scale and stay armed. The economic strain of maintaining a state of seige would be severe and continuous. We would face progressively lower standards of living and a long night of trial and suffering.

Europe is a vital element in the American strategy of security. The defense of Europe is inseparable from the defense of the United States.

The United States has done much to assist the free nations of western Europe to build the means and the will to resist aggression. In part, the aim of the Marshall plan was to rebuild an economy that would provide the resources to defend against open aggression and at the same time to raise the standard of living, and the economic and social conditions of their peoples so that they would not fall before subversion.

The North Atlantic Treaty established a defensive alliance for that area. It announced that henceforth, an attack against one was an attack against all. The pact also laid the groundwork for an integrated defense of the North Altantic area and established the Atlantic Council to organize such a defense.

The Mutual Defense Assistance Program of the United States provides needed military equipment and assistance to members of the pact for the construction of their defenses.

Let me make clear that these measures do not mean that the United States has abandoned the idea of peace and collective security through the United Nations. Regional agreements such as the North Atlantic treaty are explicitly permitted by section 52 of the Charter. The right of self-defense is recognized in article 51 of the Charter. Our action has been made neecssary by the failure of Soviet Russia to cooperate in the maintenance of peace, and because it has itself breached the peace. Our action is proof that we observe the spirit as well as the form of the charter.

The bare-faced aggression of the North Korean forces, undoubtedly directed by Moscow, makes it clear that these efforts are insufficient to meet the danger. For the first time, in Korea, the Soviet resorted to direct military action. Obviously, if it will sponsor an armed attack in Korea, we must consider the possiblity of similar action upon a far more important objective—western Europe.

It is academic to speculate now why the Soviet has not employed its preponderance of strength to move in Europe before this time. Perhaps the superiority of the United States in atomic weapons was part of the reason. It may be that they have feared that their resources could not support or win a long war—a fear which is justified. Perhaps the Soviet knows that if it cannot trust in time of peace the people of its own country and its satellites, it could not trust them in war.

These speculations do not meet the issue. Recriminations over delays and the past do not meet the danger. It is a time for decision, and for action.

What is necessary to be done to deter a Russian attack, to make its failure so inevitable that any plans for it will be discarded, and at the worst, if it should come, to defend against it?

We have reached the time when a decision must be made whether or not Europe will be defended. This decision must be made by the countries of western Europe and by the United States.

First, the countries of western Europe must commit themselves to the very limit for their own defense, in terms of military production and of armed forces. We recognize their difficult economic conditions, and know the material and psychological wounds that two wars have brought them—wounds that we have not experienced—but their homelands are at stake and they must make the supreme effort to defend them. That effort is not being made at this time. After the United States had sent its troops to Korea under the United Nations' flag, had increased its military budget by $10,000,000,000, and doubled its Armed Forces, other members of the North Atlantic Treaty organization have made statements respecting the additional defense efforts that they will undertake.

They must be welcomed as encouraging in that they establish the principle of increased efforts. Nevertheless, measured by the present requirements for troops, weapons, and equipment for defense, I must say flatly and plainly that their action is inadequate and cautious. Emergencies call for emergency action, and decisions regarding survival cannot be made upon the basis of whether or not economic and social programs might be disturbed. As was stated in an article in the London Times during the recent meeting of the Council of Deputies in London, you cannot have arms without tears.

There is needed in Europe a great initiative in the spirit of the President's action in Korea, his speeding of our defenses, and in the spirit of the Schuman plan. The full program indispensable for defense must be launched. We must give unmistakable notice to the aggressor that western Europe, the United Kingdom, and the countries of the American Continent are determined to defend themselves.

The bold decision of France to activate 15 divisions is a sample of the spirit that is necessary. But, with the exception of France, there is little indication in the response of the other members of a determination to create the forces that are needed.

Our increased aid is urgently required. We authorized in 1949, $1,200,000,000 for arms to Europe and in 1950 an additional $1,300,000,000. Today a bill is before the Congress which would increase these amounts by $4,000,000,000. It should be passed by the Congress quickly. Today Europe is incapable of meeting aggression alone. The United States cannot defend Europe alone. But for a time it will be necessary for us to carry a large part of the burden of supply until military production in Europe gets under way. On a smaller scale our aid now must be compared to lend-lease, by which we helped sustain Europe in the early years of the last war. But, in this instance, there is an added factor; we sustain and defend ourselves; we act to deter war and not to make war.

But I point out, and this most forcibly, that even though Europe and the United Kingdom greately increase their efforts, and though our aid is enlarged, it will be ineffective unless three very definite steps are taken by the members of the North Atlantic Pact organization.

The first is that the defense staff should immediately complete and the member governments approve a defense plan for western Europe which will assign the tasks and missions of the members and specify the needed forces. Only when this is done will it be possible to measure the willingness of each country, including our own, to supply the men, the equipment, and the money that are needed. If the nations of western Europe, the United Kingdom, and ourselves will not make this effort it is better to know it now. Without such a plan and its acceptance, the aid that we furnish will be misdirected, and in part wasted. The entire effort may repeat the familiar too-little too-late pattern.

The second requirement is that there must be established a unified command—with authority and responsibility to implement and execute the defense plans, and to assume the command function if needed.

There are many other difficulties. Among them are the speeding up of military production in Europe, arrangements for the transfer of arms through trade barriers, and the provision of economic and financial arrangements to cushion the shift from consumer to military production. But if the basic decisions are made to defend Europe, to complete the plan for its defense, and to establish a unified command, these mechanisms can be worked out. These are some of the tasks of the new Council of Deputies, under the leadership of the American deputy, Mr. Charles Spofford. At its first meeting it gave hopeful evidence that it would act vigorously to solve these problems.

I have not named the problem of Germany, in the list of necessary actions. The steps that I have named must be started if there is to be established an integrated system of security, larger than any one nation, in which Germany can play its part.

It is inevitable and moral that Germany shall be given the opportunity to defend itself. I do not attempt to define the method, but it would seem reasonable that the European countries, including Germany, know the proper way. In Strasbourg, in the past few days, in the Council of Europe, their leaders have called for the establishment of a European army, of which Germany would be a part. It is a decision which must be made and quickly to protect against another Korea.

There are important decisions that the United States must make.

The first is—do we really intend to join in the defense of Europe? I know that it will be said that we have committed ourselves to mutual defense by the North Atlantic Pact. But there is a vast difference between the statement of a commitment made in the best of faith, and in providing the means to make the commitment effective. The Korean experience emphasizes the difficulty and time necessary to transport men and equipment after an assault has commenced. However good our intentions, it is doubtful that we would be able to transport men and equipment to Europe in time, once an assault has started. The people of Europe have suffered one occupation. They know that a Soviet occupation would stamp out the elements of resistance and thus civilization. Consequently their interest in a second liberation is slight. Their interests focus on an effective defense.

These considerations lead me to believe that there will be no effective preparation of the defense of Europe until the United States makes clear that it will join in the defense of Europe in the initial stages of assault, should it come. This means that the United States and Great Britain must commit men and equipment before such an assault begins, either in an occupied zone, or elsewhere in Europe. I do not propose that we should undertake single-handed to defend Europe, or that we should immediately dispose troops, but only under a completed plan and upon a reciprocal basis, as European countries increase their forces. It is essential that Great Britain should also participate in this expansion. This is the third step essential to the defense of Europe.

You may say to me that if we do these things, we will take great risks. You are correct. It is a risk but the alternative is a greater risk—the risk of our isolation on this continent and gradual strangulation.

Aside from the consideration of our own security, it is unbelievable that Europe will not be defended and protected. It is the center of our civilization. It forms with us, with our friends in South America, and with other peace-desiring nations in the world, the core around which the free peoples of the world must rally in the long struggle ahead.

Will these decisions provoke an attack? I do not know, and no one knows. I would prefer to believe that if the United States and the members of the North Atlantic Pact make it known to Soviet Russia, to the United Nations, and to the world, that these are defense efforts, and the measure of our determination to defend ourselves, it will be the best chance of peace. If Russia then attacks, it would be clear that she is willing to risk the moral condemnation, and the resistance and the dogged fight of free peoples throughout the world.

I emphasize that these decisions must be made quickly. They are not the responsibility of the executive branch alone, but of the Congress as well. The executive branch cannot move without the full support of Congress. We stand in utmost peril. Interparty recrimination will not meet this danger. It must be met by action.

Finally, whatever we do, we must have the support of the people. I know that they do not like half-measures. I have always believed that if they know the facts and the objectives, they will make the necessary sacrifices. Every fact not denied by security must be made available to them.

Tonight, on this first reunion of the Third Army, I would have liked to speak in a happier, reminiscent vein. But I know your spirit, your mettle, and your legend. It is the spirit of your commander.

It was reported in the press that a few days before he died, General Patton wired President Truman in answer to the President's message of encouragement, that he expected to return. He said in the message: "I have never failed in my duty to my country. I will not fail now."

There were many tributes which moved us at his death. Most of them spoke of the past. The one I like to remember is that of a cartoon in the Chicago Sun. It was a picture of a familiar figure wading out into waters stretching limitlessly before him. He was moving away, knee-deep in the waters; but the shining helmet, the two pistols, and the erect figure were those of General Patton. It was unmistakable, that he would never turn back, and that he was looking forward. The only caption was: "Toward New Horizons."

In closing, I would like to make it clear that I do not consider the proposals I have made to constitute a rounded and complete policy. They are obviously not a substitute for our continued efforts within and without the United Nations to find some basis for a true peace. That peace can never be one of surrender or appeasement.

Neither do I consider the program one which standing alone can win the hearts and minds of neutral and undeveloped peoples of the world. It is a program for security and for survival, without which no larger program or policy will have the opportunity of accomplishment.

It seems certain that a new program and policy must embrace concepts larger than the aims of one nation. It must join the resources, the skills, the spirit of free nations, and perhaps free nations organically, in union in which democratic spirit and power can be reborn.

In this aim, we can move "Toward New Horizons."

The Anti-Communist Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Anti-Communist Bills," published in the New York Times of August 22, 1950. I hope every Member of the United States Senate will read this important editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ANTI-COMMUNIST BILLS

The Senate now has before it three distinct and rival measures dealing with subversive activities of Communists and their sympathizers. These are: the Mundt-Ferguson bill (S. 2311), the McCarran omnibus bill (S. 4037), and the administration bill (S. 4061). The first two differ fundamentally from the third in that the former impose general sanctions against Communists and Communist-fronters, while the latter, correcting some specific defects of existing law, reflects the view that sweeping legislation would be unnecessary, ineffective, and dangerous. We are inclined to think that, on the whole, the administration viewpoint is the correct one at the present time. We believe that close scrutiny of the Mundt-Ferguson and McCarran bills will show why this is so.

These measures have as one of their two principal joint features a provision making it a crime to conspire to perform any act that would "substantially contribute" to formation in the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship under foreign control. This language is so vague that it seems to us it could be used to impose restraints on freedom such as the American people have not known in 150 years. In any case it would seem advisable before passing legislation of this type at least to await the final decision of the Supreme Court on the Smith Act, which prohibits conspiracy to advocate the forcible overthrow of the Government, and which has already been used to convict 11 leaders of the Communist Party.

The other principal joint feature of the Mundt-Ferguson and McCarran bills is the registration requirement they would impose on all Communists and on Communist-front organizations. The danger here is that the registration provisions might be used to destroy incipient political parties or even existing organizations advocating unpopular causes which may or may not be on the Communist fringe. This in our opinion approaches too closely to a possible regimentation of the American political structure along more or less orthodox party lines.

The primary objective of this legislation, and one with which we emphatically agree, is to render the Communists harmless, to destroy whatever potentialities they might have of forcibly overthrowing the American Government. But would these registration provisions accomplish that purpose? Those Communists and Communist sympathizers who would register are already known to the authorities and those who are not would doubtless remain underground. It is quite possible, in fact, that the whole party would be driven underground by this legislation, in which case it might become considerably more dangerous than it is at present.

In addition to the provisions already discussed, the McCarran bill contains in entirety a drastic and senseless immigration measure that has already passed the Senate (S. 1832), but which, as we have said before, is fundamentally antidemocratic. It contains other sections of lesser importance, some of which are, in fact, included in the administration bill. These involve a tightening of espionage, registration, military security, and deportation laws.

In considering all of this anti-Communist legislation it must be remembered that the primary Communist danger to the United States comes from an imperialist aggressive world power—Soviet Russia. A secondary danger comes from agents of that power who may be found principally, but by no means exclusively, within the American Communist Party and its controlled organizations. There is virtually no danger from the Communists as a domestic political party. In what Justice Holmes has called the competition of the market, the Communists have been able to win virtually no office of national importance. It is in the area of espionage, sabotage, and subversion that we have to fear the Communists inside this country. But it is precisely in these fields that we have ample legislation (subject to minor improvement) such as the treason, espionage, sabotage, naturalization, and registration laws, as well as the loyalty program for Government employees, and various administrative regulations to boot.

Is it wise, then, to adopt legislation which is couched in language so broad that it could seriously infringe upon individual liberty, which could set a precedent for interference with the traditional freedom of political parties or political organization, which as a practical matter might defeat its own purpose, and which at the present time is not necessary for the defense of our institutions? The freedoms of the American political system have cost too much in centuries of blood, sweat, and tears to be discarded, or even endangered, just because we want to take action against a contemptible and puny band of misguided zealots within our borders. When and if they become a threat to public order, then will be the time to move against them. Meanwhile, we urge the American people not to strike out in blind fear or fury, thereby undermining, as President Truman has said, "the very internal security they seek to protect." To do so might give us an emotional satisfaction. But there would not be one Communist less in the country.

We Are Still Arming Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "We Are Still Arming Russia," published in the Joplin (Mo.) Globe of August 19.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE ARE STILL ARMING RUSSIA

Last week an editorial in this column, titled "Vital Goods to Russia," told how Representative LAWRENCE SMITH of Wisconsin had presented figures in the lower House of Congress showing that western European countries in 1949 sold more than a billion dollars worth of goods to Russia, including iron, steel, machine tools, and machinery. These sales were made to the Soviet by nations which had received much of the material in question from the United States, under the Marshall plan—and could be and would be used against us if we ever should get into a war with Russia.

It seems that credit for first bringing these figures to the attention of Congress and the American people should in reality have been given to Senator JAMES P. KEM, of Missouri, rather than to Mr. SMITH. At least 2 weeks before Representative SMITH'S speech in the House, Senator KEM brought the figures to the attention of the Senate in support of his proposal to reduce the amount of the appropriation for the Economic Cooperation Administration. Following that address the Washington Times-Herald made this editorial comment, under the heading: "We are still arming Russia":

"Marshall-plan countries are still shipping American materials into Russia and her satellite countries. Senator KEM, Republican, of Missouri, told the Senate that he has been informed by Commerce Department officials that Britain, for example, shipped approximately $1,000,000 in machine tools to Russia in the first 4 months of this year. This is 10 times the amount sent to Russia by Britain in the first 4 months of 1949. Belgium and Italy have also followed Britain's lead and sent iron and steel into Russia.

"Therefore KEM yesterday proposed a substantial cut in ECA funds. During debate on the multi-billion-dollar appropriation bill, he urged his colleagues to save the country $718,000,000 by limiting ECA appropriations in the bill to $1,950,000,000 and eliminating $276,000,000 carried over from last year's appropriation.

"KEM, who has consistently voted for all appropriations for our Military Establishments, points out that the slash he proposes would affect only the economic aid to western Europe. It would not touch appropriations for Korea or the military-aid program.

"In support of his proposal also, he argues that due to the Korean war this country will soon suffer a severe strain on its resources since it will bear the brunt of the fighting. But in the face of the shortages in this country ECA plans to give away more than $200,000,000 in industrial materials next year to Marshall-aid countries.

"We agree absolutely with the Missouri Senator. It is utter foolishness for us to give away critical material at a time when we are winding up to a point where we will not have enough to meet our own demands. But we believe KEM'S revelation that Marshall-plan countries are passing along the material we give them to Russia and her satellites is a much stronger argument against the administration's free-handed give aways.

"As KEM also pointed out, it is entirely possible that these materials have been used to make the guns and tanks that are now killing Americans in Korea."

While most of us are convinced the United States must continue to help western European nations, mighty few will refuse to condemn giving them our essential materials that are in short supply and, particularly, permitting our western European allies who receive them to pass them on to Russia for possible if not probable use against us in some future war. Surely, such practice is not merely foolish. It is asinine almost to the point of criminality.

Registration and Control of Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, yesterday, when it appeared that we were to vote on the so-called Mundt-Ferguson bill as an amendment to the civilian production control bill, the national commander of AMVETS, Mr. Harold Russell, gave me a letter to read to the Senate. Since it was arranged to vote on the Communist-control measure which was introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Russell's letter printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II,
Washington, D. C., August 21, 1950.

Hon. KARL E. MUNDT,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MUNDT: I have been informed of the intention of the United States Senate to consider on August 21, 1950, the amendment to the Maybank civilian-control bill by attaching to it the provisions of S. 2311, the Communist registration and control bill, and, therefore, wish to advise you of the strong support offered by AMVETS (American Veterans of World War II), the only congressionally chartered World War II veterans' organization, to the provisions of the bill S. 2311.

AMVETS, at its 1949 national convention, adopted a resolution urging the registration of all Communists, Communist-front organizations, and all other peoples or groups advocating the overthrow of the United States by force or subversion. A study of the Mundt-Ferguson bill by AMVETS indicates that it substantially corresponds with the above-mentioned mandate of our organization and further provides the necessary mechanical features of due process in equitably carrying out said bill's intention.

It is claimed that passage of the Mundt-Ferguson bill would compel said Communist and Communist-front organizations to go underground, making it more difficult to detect their operation, but a review of the last few years' history proves that permitting the Communists' conspiracy to operate aboveground has not facilitated our detection or defense of its subversive tendency. With the actual contact between the American forces and Communist forces in Korea, AMVETS believe that new and more stringent techniques should be used to control the spread of communism. It is our conviction that the war to combat communism should commence at home within our own continental limits and that a projection of our fighting resources outside the country without adequate vigilance at home might well dissipate the energy so essential to maintain our American way of life.

I would appreciate your cooperation in making the sentiments of AMVETS known to your colleagues of the United States Senate.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD RUSSELL,
National Commander.

Merger Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, an editorial in this morning's Washington Post with reference to H. R. 2734, generally known as the antimonopoly bill, sets forth the purpose of, and the sound reasoning behind, the proposed legislation most clearly and concisely.

Now on the Senate Calendar, H. R. 2734 will, I hope, be brought to the Senate floor for consideration and decision shortly. In the conviction that today's editorial will help to clarify the issues involved, I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MERGER CONTROL

Under the Clayton Act a company is prohibited from acquiring the stock of another company, if the acquisition would substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly; but the prohibition does not extend to outright purchases of a company's physical assets. For a quarter of a century the Federal Trade Commission has been vainly urging Congress to plug this loophole in the law which has hampered its efforts to check the growing concentration of economic power via the merger route. A year ago the House passed such a loophole-plugging amendment to the Clayton Act; last May the Senate Judiciary Committee approved the House bill; and a few days ago Senator LUCAS, speaking for the Democratic Policy Committee, informed the Senate that there is a possibility of considering the bill at this session.

In recent years the outstanding characteristic of the merger movement has been the buying out of small companies by large concerns. Over a 7-year period, more than 70 percent of the firms acquired have been taken over by corporations with assets of more than $5,000,000, while at least 93 percent of the firms absorbed had assets of less than a million dollars. To be sure, mergers often result in gains in efficiency, and not all of them involve threats to free competitive enterprise. However, the current trend emphasizes the need for strengthening the antitrust laws to enable the FTC to arrest a cumulative process of acquisition that in many cases gives large and rapidly expanding corporations undue competitive advantages.

The bill passed by the House does not prevent all mergers, but only those that fail to meet the prescribed tests of legality. As a matter of fact, it is less restrictive than the present law in case of mergers effected by sales of stock. There is nothing in the legislation that would impede production for defense purposes, since the bill is not retroactive. Furthermore, it would not prevent a company from purchasing the assets of a bankrupt corporation or one that is about to fail. Nor would it prohibit small companies from merging in order to compete more effectively with large concerns. It applies only to those types of mergers and acquisitions—vertical, horizontal, and conglomerate—the effect of which may be substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly.

The discretionary power that the proposed legislation would give the FTC to deal with mergers brought about by acquisition of assets as well as stock purchases is vaguely defined. But as the Senate Judiciary Committee states: "A requirement of certainty and actuality of injury to competition is incompatible with any effort to supplement the Sherman Act by reaching incipient restraints." Since it is the purpose of the bill to prevent restraints of trade that might lead to suppression of competition, it is neither practicable nor desirable for Congress to lay down hard and fast rules by which to determine when intervention is necessary.

The Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial regarding the war in Korea, written by Joseph E. Ray, editor of the Blackfoot Bulletin, of Blackfoot, Idaho.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Blackfoot (Idaho) Bulletin of August 14, 1950]

WHAT D'YA KNOW, JOE

Well, Stalin, how goes the Korean war?

Over here in Blackfoot all we know is what we read in the Daily Bulletin. It says there have been about a thousand Americans killed so far in the world's newest war and several thousand wounded and missing.

When you crawl into bed at night do you go right to sleep or do you like to savor the peepul's triumphs a little? How does it feel to have the world by the tail, anyway?

How does it seem to have miserable little creatures who pass as men in the sight of God mouth your evil designs in the capitals of the world? Who roll over, sit up, or play dead when you snap your fingers in the Kremlin 10,000 miles away. Does it give you a kick to fire off a cable to Malik at Lake Success and order him to further obstruct and harass and delay and scold and ridicule and make a mockery of the efforts of decent men to shape some kind of a peace in this world?

How does it seem to hold the fate of millions in your grasping hands, already sticky with the blood of so many innocent people? How does a dictator operate, anyway? Do you have a desk pad on which are noted purges to be launched, revolutions to be incited in far-off places? Or does the puppet Molotov remind you of these matters?

How does it feel to be an arch traitor to the cause of humanity, posing six scant years ago as an ally and a comrade in the common fight against the Nazis and now proving to be a viler menace?

How goes the sly world revolution, anyway? Are we capitalist boobs still falling foolishly for your clever ruses, being drawn into a skirmish here and a skirmish there? You are a clever one, Joe. You have achieved immortality—of a sort. The world spawns many like you, but most get their heads stepped on before they do much damage.

We'll take care of you, too, in time, unless you mend your ways. But here again we indulge in the undying hope of the little men who have to fight the wars. Another weakness of ours, eh, Joe? Fools we are to hope and pray and trust in God. Fools to think you, Stalin, might miraculously become a decent, peace-loving citizen. But even fools weary of treachery and rise up in righteous fury to destroy the tyrant. Hark well the lessons of history, Joe.

Outstanding Religious Books of the Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was glad to note the selections of the Religious Books Round Table of the American Library Association for this year. Among the 50 top religious books of all faiths selected by an outstanding committee of leading American representatives of the great faiths of our country, were two books issued by the Bruce Publishing Co., of Milwaukee.

We of Wisconsin are indeed proud of this outstanding publishing company whose very name has become a hallmark of quality and public service—a great center for spiritual literature and for educational leadership.

We are proud of America's religious press, which symbolizes the fact that man does not live by bread alone. I am glad, therefore, to call attention to the outstanding religious books of the year. I feel that perhaps in doing so I may help by that small bit at least to focus the attention of our people on the need for consulting the great religious volumes published by companies such as the Bruce Publishing Co. of Milwaukee.

I ask unanimous consent that an article on this theme published in the Saturday, August 19, Milwaukee Journal, be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO OF BRUCE CO. BOOKS CLASSED AS OUTSTANDING—WIN PLACES AMONG 50 OF FOREMOST VOLUMES IN RELIGIOUS FIELD, PICKED BY LIBRARY GROUP

Two books issued by the Bruce Publishing Co., Milwaukee book firm, are among the 50 outstanding religious books of the year selected this month by the Religious Books Round Table of the American Library Association. They are: St. Ignatius of Loyola, a biographical study by Paul Dudon, S. J., a Belgian scholar, and translated by William Young, S. J.; and The Catholic Reformation, by Pierre Janelle, professor in the arts faculty at Clermont-Ferrand University, France. Both books deal with approximately the same period, the late fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries, according to Paul Gratke, chief of the education, philosophy, and religion department of the Milwaukee public library. Gratke was chairman o. the selection committee, which chose the 50 from books published in the United States from May 1, 1949, until last May.

"Together," he said, "the books bring a scholarly analysis of an era in Roman Catholic religious history."

PART OF CULTURE SERIES

Both books are part of the science and culture series issued by the publishing firm. The general editor of this series is Father Joseph Husslein, S. J., Milwaukee born Jesuit who is now professor of social work at St. Louis University.

Other members of the selection committee for the Religious Books Roundtable are: Dr. Henry Sloan Coffin, president emeritus of Union Theological Seminary, New York City; Msgr. Harry C. Koenig, librarian of St. Mary of the Lake Seminary, Mundelein, Ill; Rabbi Jonah Bondi Wise, of Central Synagogue, New York City; Dr. Edwin Lewis, professor of systematic theology at Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J., and Dr. David Eaton Trueblood, professor of philosophy at Earlham College, Richmond, Ind.

The books were selected after careful study, Gratke declared.

"The committee," he said, "has made no attempt to evaluate any religion or religious group or to interpret the merits of religious points of view or respective doctrines."

BASIS OF SELECTION

The selection was based on the criteria of objective scholarship, original thinking, stimulating analyses of religious leaders and movements, inspirational witness to religious conviction and clarifying editorship in presenting an established work.

For the first time in the years the selection has been made, a book on Mohammedanism is included. It is The Commentary on the Creed of Islam by Mas'udibn'-Umar, translated by Earl Edgar Elder. It is a compendium of Islamic theology. Four books from the Upanishads, the principal literature of Hinduism, edited by Nikhilananda, also are included in the list.

Two books were unanimously chosen by all committee members for inclusion in the list, Gratke said. They are, The Prophetic Faith by Martin Buber, professor of Old Testament theology at Hebrew University, Jerusalem, and The Jews, by Louis Finkelstein. The latter is a symposium on the culture, history, religion, and nationalism of the Jews.

LIST IS GIVEN

Following is the list of the 50 best (excluding those mentioned above):

Baab, Otto Justice, The Theology of the Old Testament; Bett, Henry, Reality of the Religious Life; Blau, Joseph Leon, Cornerstones of Religious Freedom in America; Brunner, Emil, Christian Doctrine of God, Dogmatics, volume I; Butterfield, Herbert, Christianity and History; Church, Leslie, The Early Methodist People.

Clark, Elmer Talmadge, The Small Sects in America; Dawson, Christopher, Religion and the Rise of Western Culture; Dibelius, Martin, Jesus; Ferre, Nels, Christianity and Society; Flight John, The Drama of Ancient Israel; Fosdick, Harry Emerson, The Man From Nazareth; Gilson, Etienne, Dante, the Philosopher; Goodspeed, Edgar Johnson, The Apostolic Fathers.

Hamilton, Edith, Spokesmen for God; Hersey, John, The Wall; Inge, William Ralph, The End of an Age and Other Essays; Kayser, Rudolf, The Life and Times of Jehudah Halevi; Kepler, Thomas Samuel, Contemporary Thinking About Paul; Knox, John, Chapters in the Life of Paul.

OTHERS ON LIST

Kramer, Herbert George, Crucified With Christ; Lofts, Norah, Women in the Old Testament; Male, Emile, Religious Art; Marshall, Peter, Mr. Jones Meet the Master; Martensen, Hans, Jacob Boehme; Moe, Olaf, The Apostle Paul; Morgenstern, Julien, As a Mighty Stream; Nixon, Justin Wroe, Responsible Christianity; Norris, Herbert, Church Vestments; Oursler, Fulton and Will, Father Flanagan of Boys' Town.

Overstreet, Harry Allen, The Mature Mind; Pegis, Anton Charles, The Wisdom of Catholicism; Pfeiffer, Robert Henry, History of New Testament Times; Pope, Hugh, St. Augustine of Hippo; Pratt, James Bissett, Eternal Values in Religion; Roberts, David, Psychotherapy and a Christian View of Man; Robertson, Archie, That Old-Time Religion; Sayers, Dorothy Leigh, The Man Born To Be King; Sheean, Vincent, Lead, Kindly Light; Steere, Douglas, Time To Spare; Talbot, Francis Xavier, Saint Among the Hurons; Aquinas, Thomas, Of God and His Creatures, translated by Joseph Rickaby, S. J; Trapp, Maria, The Story of the Trapp Family Singers; Weizsacker, Carl Frederick, The History of Nature.

Special mention was given to several series of books now in the process of production or translation by various publishers: Ancient Christian Writers, the works of the apostolic fathers, published by Newman; the Yale Judaica Series, by the Yale University Press; the Works of John Calvin, by Eerdmans; the Works of John Henry Newman, published by Longmans. An English Bible, designed by Bruce Rogers and put out by the World Publishing Co., was described as the "outstanding printing achievement of the year."

Broadcast in Honor of 55 Members of the Japanese Diet Visiting the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the manuscript of a broadcast entitled "The Good Road," which originated with the Columbia Broadcasting System on August 6, 1950, in Los Angeles, Calif. The broadcast was monitored by Chancelor von Kleinsmid, of the University of Southern California; and it was in honor of 55 members of the Japanese Diet and other distinguished leaders of government, industry, labor, and finance who were visiting in the United States.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. RUFUS VON KLEINSMID, chancelor of the University of Southern California. Upon this occasion it is a great honor to entertain in this city of Los Angeles the delegation, 55 strong, which comes to us directly from the world conference at Caux, in behalf of the principles of the Moral Re-Armament movement. It is a privilege to introduce to you as the first speaker the mayor of the city of Los Angeles. Every great city should have a great mayor, and Los Angeles fulfills those specifications.

Mayor FLETCHER BOWRON, mayor of Los Angeles. As chief executive of the city of Los Angeles, it is a privilege to welcome these distinguished Japanese visitors who are our guests here this evening. They are the chosen democratic leaders of their country. It is especially significant that among them are the mayors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and that they are with us as messengers of good will and friendship on the fifth anniversary of the dropping of the first atom bomb.

Their presence here this evening is evidence of a power which can turn enemies into friends, and bring unity in place of division. They come at a time when their country has been thrust into the forefront of the world-wide struggle for freedom and democracy.

Recent events in Korea have shown the lengths to which a destructive ideology is prepared to go in its bid to dominate the world. The aggressors who strike for communism have compelled us again to rearm physically to meet the challenge. With even greater importance for the future of civilization and freedom we are rearming morally to meet the ideological challenge which confronts the free nations of the world. It is all important to find the fighting democratic faith with which to arm the millions in those countries whose protection destiny has committed to our hands. It is to find such a faith for their own country that these chosen leaders have traveled across the world and almost back again.

But it is not only these front-line countries which need a fighting faith. We need it mightily right here at home among our own American people. The burst of buying and hoarding which followed the outbreak of fighting in Korea has shown that selfish materialism is not absent from the hearts of Americans. Only a faith based on absolute moral standards and lived out in the daily life of every citizen can give us as a Nation the strength and the right to lead the world in its struggle for freedom.

That is why it is a special privilege to greet you in this building, the world headquarters for Moral Re-Armament. We are proud to have it known throughout our Nation and in every other nation that Los Angeles is the world headquarters of Moral Re-Armament.

I believe that the positive dynamic program which it represents is serving both to strengthen the life of our own community and to combat the insidious influences of destructive ideologies among the peoples of various nationalities throughout the world It is a program which can unite east and west in the common struggle for a free and peaceful world.

Dr. RUFUS VON KLEINSMID. Great States should have great governors, and California has one. Governor Earl Warren would gladly have been here in person tonight but for the press of important business of state. He has, however, recorded his message to us and we shall now be privileged to listen to him, and I present Governor Warren.

Gov. EARL WARREN, Governor of the State of California. Mayor Bowron, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen. As Governor of California I join the citizens of Los Angeles in welcoming these distinguished Japanese visitors to our State. The friendly visit they are making to our country and the cordial welcome they have received throughout our land are striking examples of what can happen when people's minds and objectives are turned to peace. I am sure their visit to California will be as heartily received. Exactly 5 years ago our country and Japan were engaged in mortal combat, but when the war ended, both nations devoted themselves to peace. The democratic concept of humanity as applied by America was the inspiration for a new and understanding leadership in Japan. Under this new leadership there has been promoted a cooperative spirit which again makes us friends. It is bringing us closer to the day when we can wipe out entirely the nightmare of the past and complete the building of a world at peace, based on morality, justice, and brotherhood. Gentlemen, I trust your visit to California will be an enjoyable one.

Dr. RUFUS VON KLEINSMID. Our very effective and progressive press has given wide notice of the visit to our city of this distinguished delegation. It should not have been our privilege to have met so many Japanese ladies and gentlemen except for the visit to Japan (among others) of Mr. Kenaston Twitchell. You know him as Ken Twitchell. He is no stranger to Los Angeles. We welcome his return enthusiastically, and I present him to you.

Mr. H. K. TWITCHELL. Here with us tonight are representatives of the life of modern Japan. There are members of the Japanese Diet officially appointed by their parties to come on this trip. There are governors of seven of the most important prefectures, mayors of the cities of Kobe and Nagano, as well as Hiroshima and Nagasaki. There are leaders of industry and labor unions. These representatives of Japan flew across Asia to Europe to the Moral Re-Armament Assembly at Caux, Switzerland, now proceeding under the leadership of Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman. Our first speaker from the delegation is Mrs. Yukika Sohma. Many of you will remember the visit a few weeks ago of the elder statesman of Japan, Yukio Osaki, 92-year-old member of the Diet since its first session in 1890, and the man who gave the cherry trees to Washington when he was mayor of Tokyo in 1905. Mrs. Sohma, who is here with her husband, is the mother of four children, and like her father is a fighter for the new Japan.

Mrs. YUKIKA SOHMA. This Japanese delegation consists of leaders from all social phases of the nation I feel that the significance of this delegation is that it left Japan primarily to find the ideology for democracy—the ideology based on moral standards which we have come to feel is essential in working out a real democracy. At Caux we met representative leaders of 47 countries. It was a conference of answers, of results—results that only need multiplication to bring a solid cure to world affairs. There we saw a family of nations actually at work where differences of race, class, point of view were superseded by a greater uniting ideology. There we have seen and experienced reconciliation of hearts which can and is affecting the nations. We saw human nature change. We saw French and Germans lose their hatred for each other, which is so essential to the working out of the Schuman plan.

We saw management and labor unite in a common battle for a world of abundance where everybody cares enough and everybody shares enough and therefore everybody has enough. We saw men trained for 25 years in the leadership of the Communist Party find a greater ideology than communism, and begin to fight with a greater passion for the life of the free world. We saw good but passive men become revolutionary fighters for the remaking of the world under the guidance of God. Military leaders told us they had discovered at Caux the secret of morale and ideological training for the new armies of western Europe. We saw the four standards of moral rearmament—absolute honesty, purity, unselfishness, and love—become the cornerstones of a new world order. We saw that with this new spirit Japan can be reborn and become a nation loved by the rest of the world. We saw and experienced that human nature is the same whether it be in the east or in the west, and that change for everyone—not just for the other person nor just for myself—but for everyone—worked on a personal as well as national and international level.

We saw that if we sincerely desire to bring unity where disunity prevails, love where hatred prevails, justice where injustice prevails, we must pay the price in our own lives. We saw the fundamental truths of democracy interpreted to meet the needs of today by each person taking the responsibility for the whole. It is only when each person begins to live the standards which everyone wants the other person or the leaders of nations to live, are we helping to achieve the ideal state of peace in the world.

I feel that this program is bringing to the world the heart of the American heritage and democracy's inspired ideology. The world is looking to America's leadership. They do not look to America only for material aid, but also for spiritual leadership with the greatest confidence that in her heritage she has the answers to bring unity to the now divided world.

May I say one word on behalf of the women of Japan. * * * Under the new constitution we have been given freedom and equality, but very many of us have been trained to serve in the homes for many centuries and have not been able to find the right way in which to utilize this freedom and equality that have been given us. As women we naturally pray for the establishment of real peace. But often we do not see how we can help to do this, because we feel that we are hopelessly inefficient; but here we have found that there is a way, even in our homes or wherever we are. We have found that peace is not just an idea we talk about, but it is something we can achieve when people become different.

We are so grateful to you for bringing Moral Re-Armament to Japan. It is interpreting your greatest American heritage in making democracy work in a way that anybody in Japan can understand. We women of Japan wish to bring this spirit to Japan and through her change to the world. Because we believe this is the only expression of restitution for her past wrongs and with this ideology we can build a new world.

Mr. TWITCHELL. Some months ago Basil Entwistle and I stood on the T bridge in Hiroshima which was the pin-point target of the atom bomb. We looked out upon the scene of devastation unprecedented in the history of man. Three men are here with us tonight who have worked for the reconstruction of Hiroshima. Governor Kusunose of the Hiroshima Prefecture; Speaker Selichi Kawamoto of the city council; and Shinso Hamai, mayor of Hiroshima City. Mr. Hamai.

Mr. HAMAI. On behalf of the citizens of Hiroshima I wish to take this opportunity to express our heartfelt gratitude for the sympathy and the material and moral support that have been extended to us by you of America ever since the destruction of our city. This day commemorates that fateful day. It is uniquely significant that I can commemorate this day with you people in the United States exactly 5 years later. I can still remember that day with stark reality. It was like a nightmare. This nightmare has continued in my mind for the past 5 years and will probably continue for many years to come. Not only were more than 100,000 lives snuffed out but also the lucky survivors are facing almost insurmountable difficulties daily. Even at the present speed of reconstruction it will probably take more than 30 years to complete our rehabilitation. This is a sample of what atomic warfare might be.

But we people of Hiroshima hold no bitterness toward anyone, because we have realized that this is a tragedy naturally to be expected from war. The only thing we ask of the world is that everybody becomes strongly aware of what happened in Hiroshima, how it happened, and why it happened, and to exert every effort to see to it that it will not have to happen again in any other place.

Of course, it is not for me to say whether the atom bomb should be used or not. That is for others to decide, and I have the utmost confidence in the decision of the United States. But I am sure that the only way that we can keep this from happening again is to attain conditions where war will not take place.

I know that there are many complicated problems that must be solved before we can finally attain a world truly at peace. But I am also sure that unless each and every one of us devote ourselves day by day to solving these problems, no matter how complicated and difficult they may be, peace will never come. And our efforts to this end must not be based on the philosophy of hatred, bitterness, or conflict, but must be guided in the direction of cooperation and unity crystallized by sincerity and the spirit of brotherhood. We need to remove the boundary lines we have willfully drawn in our hearts—the lines of race, nationality, and class. Those lines are the result of hallucinations of mind, and they can be removed by a change of heart. Division and strife only aggravate bitterness and lead eventually to war and the suicide of the human race. We learned this painfully and clearly in our experience 5 years ago.

A no more serious, no more urgent problem exists today than the critical need at this moment for each one of us to live through together these days of crisis divested of all human barriers.

Dr. Frank N. D Buchman, whom I met at the World Moral Re-Armament Assembly at Caux, Switzerland, has said, "Peace is people becoming different." This hits the nail on the head. I, for one, intend to start this effort from Hiroshima. The one dream and hope left to the surviving citizens of Hiroshima is to reestablish the city as a pattern of peace, both in humans and in things, regardless of how difficult a struggle the road may be.

At the same time we are looking to America for guidance in this direction. For America is not just one nation in a group of nations in the world. America is the father and big brother of all democratic countries and the repository of the world's hopes. If America shows true moral leadership with a great transcending love, the world will follow.

Mr. TWITCHELL. After Caux the Japanese delegation visited the countries of western Europe. Members of the delegation were received in special audience by the Pope. They met with Chancelor Adenauer of the West German Republic and were told by him that MRA has become a household word in Germany today, that men are learning the great truth that each one of us must begin with ourselves. They flew to Berlin. They conferred with members of the cabinet in Bonn and were received by United States High Commissioner McCloy. In France and Britain they met national leaders and heard of the fight for reconstruction and unity springing from the efforts of the free nations to come closer together and from the renaissance that is born at Caux.

In America Ambassador Warren Austin welcomed them to the United Nations and expressed the hope that Japan might soon again take her place in the world family.

Historic days were awaiting them in Washington. Both Senate and House adjourned to welcome the members of the Japanese Diet onto the floor of their respective assemblies. In the House of Representatives, the delegates were reminded by the majority leader that it was the first time in history that a foreign delegation was to be received in this way. In both House and Senate prolonged applause greeted the remarks of their spokesmen.

We will now hear from Mr. Chojiro Kuriyama, an official representative of the Prime Minister's Liberal Party which holds the controlling majority of seats in the Diet. Mr. Kuriyama.

Mr. KURIYAMA. I would like to express deepest gratitude for the warm welcome and courtesy with which the American Government and people have surrounded us during our unforgettable visit in this country. I would also like to say a special word of thanks to our hosts of Moral Re-Armament who have made us so completely at home in every country we have visited. We have traveled through Europe and America in the true MRA spirit, "the whole world is my neighbor."

May I say that it is our sincere regret that Japan has broken an almost century-old friendship between our two countries. In spite of this big mistake on our part, the magnanimous forgiveness and generosity of this country have not only allowed Japan to survive, but are helping her recovery. By so doing, she is practicing Christianity in international relations. In recent days our delegation has had an opportunity to study the true heritage of great America. We know that the leadership of America is rooted in Christianity. It will be a great source of happiness to the people of Japan if we can rebuild and reconstruct our nation on the same principles that you in America, together with George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and other leaders, have followed.

We are this time on an ideological mission. Just before we left Tokyo for this trip, our Prime Minister, Mr. Yoshida, expressed his hope that as the first Japanese industrial mission of 1870 brought back to Japan the industrial techniques of the west, so our present mission can bring back to our country the positive ideology which will answer communism. We found this answer clearly exemplified at the world assembly in Caux, Switzerland.

There we met that great American, Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, the pioneer of this uniting ideology which is bringing hope to millions in Europe and the Far East. We want to thank America for what she has given to the world through Dr. Buchman.

In our discussions with cabinet ministers of France, Italy, Germany, and Britain, we found it very encouraging that they are all fully aware that peace is much more than the mere ending of armed conflict; that to build peace we need the same passion and force to unite with people and other nations as we need to fight against them when we make war; that love for democracy can be a passion; that moral rearmament can be a force.

Now lawless aggression in Korea is again involving America in terrible sacrifices. We Japanese wholeheartedly support the action taken by the United Nations, and if you will permit us to do so, we pay highest respect to your President, Mr. Truman, in this matter.

But the Korean war is also a symptom of a world-wide ideological struggle. Ideological action throughout the free world must parallel the military action which America has so courageously undertaken. It is here perhaps that we Japanese can make our most effective contribution.

Throughout non-Communist Asia today there is an ideological vacuum which weakens our people within and encourages aggression without. The Soviet advances in the Orient because she aims first of all to fill that vacuum. The Soviet Government understands the art of ideological war. It fights for the minds of men. We appeal to the governments and peoples of the west to do the same.

The millions in the Far East must be presented with a philosophy and way of life so appealing that totalitarianism of right or left will not attract them. We look especially to America, which has given and is giving so generously in economic and military aid, to give us also the ideology which can liberate our minds and hearts, and make us strong and free.

Mr. TWITCHELL. It is something more than military action that is called for in the Far East. We can win back the territory that has been taken by aggression. But can we win the minds and hearts of the people who live there to the kind of democracy that lasts? Can we give them an ideology for democracy that calls out more daring and sacrifice and passion than communism? This is an ideological age, and the conflict of ideologies challenges us in America to rethink our own basic faith. Above all this hour of decision challenges us to fight for the regeneration of our own inner life as a nation, so that we match material rearmament with moral rearmament, fight for straight living under the guidance of God.

Does Crime Pay?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in America every child is taught that crime does not pay. It is part of our democratic and humane beliefs and way of life that we do not sanction violation of legal, ethical, and moral codes of human behavior. That is why, in this country, we punish those who violate the moral attributes of mankind.

Thousands of monstrous crimes were committed by Germans only a few years ago. Most of them are still unpunished. The Germans violated the laws of humanity. They burned, looted, and mutilated a whole continent for 5 years. They violated the dignity of man. They enslaved and degraded the very notion of humanity. They flaunted all tenets of international law.

Five years ago the democracies announced to the world that the criminals who violated the norms of civilization will be held accountable to civilization. An international tribunal was established to pass judgment upon those who committed crimes against humanity. The International Tribunal decided to reestablish the principles of international justice.

What was the nature of these crimes? Let me cite one instance from the official report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services, October 13, 1949, titled "Malmedy Massacre Investigation":

> The atrocities which were committed at 12 places throughout Belgium, consisted, according to different witnesses, of the killing of approximately 350 unarmed American prisoners of war after they had surrendered, and 100 Belgian civilians. It was one of the few cases where substantial numbers of Americans were murdered en masse.

What happened to those who perpetrated these unspeakable crimes? Seventy-three German members of the SS organization were found guilty, and 43 were given the death penalty by an American military tribunal. Among those convicted were three German generals, one an outstanding SS general, as well as officers of lesser rank who were combat leaders. However, no sooner had the verdicts been announced than pro-German organizations in this country, headed by the National Council for the Prevention of War, began their nefarious work to frustrate justice. Senator Baldwin's report dwells at length about the activities of this organization and says:

> The subcommittee, through outside investigation, has determined that the National Council for the Prevention of War and other organizations have maintained a constant correspondence with certain people in Germany and other persons interested in these cases. Through these efforts, most of the allegations made in this case have become accepted as fact and our prestige in Germany thereby adversely affected. * * * The subcommittee is convinced that the activities of this organization in this matter, which go far beyond the Malmedy case, have been most damaging to the national interest of our country and to the cause of peace.

The Baldwin subcommittee therefore recommended that this pro-German organization be investigated.

Mr. Speaker, not only has this recommendation not been carried out, but instead, thanks largely to the activities of the National Council for the Prevention of War, the Germans succeeded in having 37 death sentences commuted. In addition, numerous attempts have been made by these un-American elements to discredit the whole principle of war crimes trials by making false charges as to the bona fide character of the Malmedy trials. As a result, the findings of the Baldwin subcommittee, which upheld the essential guilt of the German war criminals and concluded that these attacks against the Malmedy trials were unfair and unwarranted, have not been acted upon.

Prior to the publication of the subcommittee's report, General Clay commuted the death sentences of 37 of the 43 who had originally been condemned.

The six remaining criminals did not receive such commutations. Yet their sentences, up to this very moment, have not been carried out. Five and a half years have passed since the fateful event of the Malmedy Massacre; 13 investigations have been made regarding this case, and, in spite of the fact that these investigations recognized the guilt of these war criminals, the vast majority of them have escaped just punishment.

Outraged at the failure to enforce the verdicts of the American Military Tribunal, numerous patriotic organizations, including war veterans, have petitioned High Commissioner McCloy to uphold the authority of our courts. These pleas fall, it appears, upon deaf ears. On January 5, 1950, the General Counsel of the High Commissioner's Office stated that—

> Investigation, trial, review, and subsequent action in this case (Malmedy) have been, and continue to be, within the sole jurisdiction of the United States Army.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is not the case. The President's Executive Order No. 10062, dated June 6, 1949, explicitly says that—

> The United States High Commissioner for Germany, hereinafter referred to as the High Commissioner, shall be the supreme United States authority for Germany.

Under the same Executive order, the United States High Commissioner for Germany was designated also as "the United States Military Governor with all the powers thereby including those vested in the United States Military Government over all international agreements." Moreover, the charter for the Allied High Commission for Germany, published in the State Department Bulletin July 11, 1948, stipulates that the individual responsibilities of the High Commissioners, included—

(a) the disposition of war criminals;
(b) administration of justice in cases falling within the jurisdiction of allied courts;
(c) control of the care and treatment in German prisons of persons judged before or sentenced by the courts or tribunals of the occupation authorities over the carrying out of sentences imposed on them and over questions of amnesty, pardon, or release, in relation to them.

Mr. Speaker, if this language makes any sense at all, it means that the powers of the High Commissioner are clear and explicit as to his responsibilities with regard to the German war crimes cases, including the Malmedy case, and the carrying out of the sentences thereof. As a matter of fact, Mr. McCloy has used these very same powers when he granted a parole to George Von Schnitzler—a major war criminal.

How long must justice wait? Why didn't Mr. McCloy carry out the sentences as he was pledged to do under the authority granted to him? How long will Mr. McCloy continue to flaunt the will of the American people and the United States Congress?

The Malmedy massacre case is bad enough. But take the case of General of the SS Otto Ohlendorf. On April 10, 1948, Ohlendorf, who confessed to the murder of 90,000 men, women, and children, and 13 of his codefendants in the Einsatzgruppen case, were sentenced to be hanged.

I now quote from the final report to the Secretary of the Army by Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor, August 1949, page 180:

The Einsatzgruppen were special units of the SS that accompanied the German army with the special mission of ensuring political security in the occupied areas. As conceived and executed by the SS, this mission involved the immediate and outright slaughter of all Jews in the occupied areas. It was established that approximately one million Jews and others were liquidated in Russia by the Einsatzgruppen. The 24 defendants and their trial was, not unnaturally, widely publicized as "the biggest murder trial in history."

On November 3, 1947, sentences were passed down in the so-called Oswald Pohl case. Pohl and three other defendants were sentenced to hanging for crimes committed against inmates of concentration camps. So far, not one single sentence was carried out.

This miscarriage of justice was duly recognized in the Congress of the United States. A Senate subcommittee, under the chairmanship of Senator CLYDE HOEY, investigated all matters connected with these trials. On January 27, 1950, Senator CLYDE HOEY told the New York Post that he saw no justification for further delay in the implementation of the sentences in the Pohl and Ohlendorf cases.

Here is his own language:

The staff of my committee has given me its report on the Nuremberg trials of these 16 men There were no irregularities, as the report demonstrates. The defendants had all their legal rights.

Consequently, Senator HOEY informed the Post that he did not think there was any justification "to interfere in this case and to ask any delay in these executions."

Following this statement, several American organizations again petitioned High Commissioner McCloy to carry out the long delayed sentences. Months went by without an answer. Recently, Mr. McCloy announced that the delay in the Pohl and Ohlendorf cases is due to the petition for habeas corpus by certain of these defendants in United States courts. Mr. McCloy also mentioned that—

Representatives of committees acting under the authority of Congress or the Department of the Army * * * have indicated that in certain instances the exercise of clemency might be warranted.

I might add that the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled against Federal Court jurisdiction in these matters.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that Congress be informed who these mysterious interceders are. Were these committees legally constituted? If so, may I ask by whom and under what authority? Or could it be that the un-American organizations which did so much harm in the Malmedy massacre case, as conclusively proved by the Baldwin subcommittee, are behind the moves to frustrate American justice? Certainly it could not be the Baldwin committee that asked for clemency since it did not include in its final report any suggestion that clemency might be warranted. Furthermore, Senator HOEY admitted that he saw no justification in the delay of the carrying out of the sentences imposed on the war criminals. Or could it be that we have come to such a pass where personal opinions of some anonymous representatives can nullify the verdicts of the legally constituted courts?

Take a look at the case of Von Weiszaecker. The Tribunal found him guilty of participating in the unlawful invasion and occupation of Bohemia and Moravia and of complicity in the deportation of Jews from several European countries to enslavement and extermination in concentration camps such as Auschwitz. On April 14, 1949, Weiszaecker and 14 other criminals were sentenced to prison terms from 4 to 25 years. On April 3, 1950, Mr. McCloy stated that the case is being reviewed. Is McCloy now going to let that criminal go scot free?

Take the case of Emil Puhl, who was a director of Hitler's Reichsbank. In cooperation with the Reichsbank, Puhl turned into cash the gold teeth and jewelry from slaughtered concentration camp inmates and gas-chamber victims. For this, he was convicted of atrocities against civilian populations. Emil Puhl was paroled by Mr. McCloy some 6 months ago.

On June 23, 1950, General Handy granted clemency to six German war criminals who had been convicted of crimes against the Allies in China during the war. These 6 belong to a group of 21 Germans convicted by the United States Military Commissioner in China in January 1947 for having engaged in intelligence activities in that country against the United States, after Germany's surrender. Yet General Handy saw fit to grant clemency to six of these war criminals.

In a dispatch the AP reported from Frankfurt that—

Sentences of three Germans convicted as war criminals for atrocities committed at Dachau concentration camp were reduced by the United States Army today (June 26).

One of these criminals had his sentence reduced from life imprisonment to 15 years, another from 60 years to 10, and the third from 50 years to 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is time that this miscarriage of justice stop, for it is not a question of being hard or soft with the German criminals. It is a question of justice, morality, and the protection of America's prestige at home and abroad. Failure to carry out justice against the convicted war criminals damages the moral as well as the international prestige of the United States. I sincerely believe that in view of the findings of the congressional committees, the American people and the millions of GI's throughout the United States, are entitled to expect that the high commissioner shall carry out forthwith the just verdicts rendered by the American and international tribunals. Further delay would not only be playing into the hands of the unregenerate Nazi forces in Germany, but would also be breaking faith with the sacred memory of our fallen heroes in the Battle of the Bulge.

Mr. Speaker, I would be the last person on earth to deny leniency to a person who deserves it. But granting leniency to the above-mentioned war criminals will only please nationalistic and unregenerate elements in Germany. It will also have a demoralizing effect on our most reliable friends in Europe and will play into the hands of extremist propaganda which alleges that American policy in Europe is designed to favor the enemies of civilization at the expense of those who fought for it. Should we fail in our duty, the inevitable result will be that the Germans will come to the conclusion that crime does pay.

I therefore call upon Congress to express its firm determination to see to it that Commissioner McCloy shall not nullify the sentences imposed upon the German war criminals but execute them in accordance with the verdict of the courts.

In conclusion, I should like to insert a short but provocative statement published by the Society for the Prevention of World War III, 515 Madison Avenue, New York City, in the summer issue of its magazine, Prevent World War III, entitled "Does Crime Pay?":

DOES CRIME PAY?

In his opening address before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg concerning German crimes against peace, Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson noted: "The refuge of the defendants can be only their hope that international law will lag so far behind the moral sense of mankind that conduct which is crime in the moral sense must be regarded as innocent in law."

Despite Justice Jackson's misgivings, international law managed to keep up with the moral sense of mankind and a set of juridical principles infused with a profound moral purpose was established. But this grand edifice of justice is crumbling under the disintegrating and pernicious influence of policy. Policy remains as it was—untouched by the elementary standards which must be the binding force of the fabric we call civilization.

International law condemned German crimes against humanity.

International law condemned the burnings, the lootings, and the destruction of a whole continent by a people whose raison d'être was the cult of conquest.

International law upheld the rights and dignity of man against violence, mass enslavement, and degradation.

International law announced to the world that criminals who violate the norms of civilization will and must be held accountable to civilization

But policy continues as in the past to condone the crimes which have been condemned by international law.

Policy coddles, frees, and protects the worst German criminals.

Policy dumps billions of the taxpayers' money into Germany while it refuses to adequately compensate the peoples overrun by the German invader.

Policy returns Germany's war arsenal, the Ruhr, to its former masters, who made and supported Hitler.

Policy permits the Germans to impose their schemes on the free world and rehabilitates the former enemy at the expense of the security and economic well-being of its victims.

Policy places the Germans on a special pedestal paving the way for the revival of German economic mastery over Europe and with it the disruption of international trade and commerce.

What must the Germans think of international law which condemns crime condoned by policy?

What good can be expected from policy which is intrinsically evil?

It is only natural that most Germans should regard the developments of the past 5 years as proof that the great crusade for justice and freedom was an Allied fraud.

Can the Germans doubt that policy ultimately rewards crime?

Proposed Arming of Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial dealing with the arming of Germany, written by R. S. Tofflemire, editor of the Twin Falls Times-News of Twin Falls, Idaho, and published in that newspaper.

There being no objection the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAN'T AFFORD TO BE ASLEEP

Germany is the Korea of Europe, divided in control between east and west. And Europeans, watching Korea, wonder about Germany's fate should Russia decide to strike there.

Time was when Europe took great assurance from the 150,000 American soldiers in west Germany. No one believed such a force could stand off an attacking Russian army, but it was felt America would swing in quickly with tremendous power if her troops were fired upon.

United States withdrawals in the Far East altered the outlook sharply. In revealing America's unpreparedness for even a little war, they have shaken the faith of all Europeans who are depending on us in event Moscow marches.

Germany of course is the richest prize Russia could possibly grab outside of the United States. With the industrial Ruhr in the Soviet fist, she would soon be master of all Europe.

The United States and the west can't allow this to happen. But it's doubtful we're doing enough to prevent it.

Present United States mobilization plans certainly go beyond anticipated needs of the Korean war. It is clear American purpose to create a sizable armed force able to move into new trouble spots when and if the Soviet Union strikes again.

But most official thinking, assumes Moscow won't do anything for a while at least that would involve her own soldiers. The belief is Soviet satellites, like the North Koreans, would be asked to do the dirty work.

Yet this kind of reasoning could be as foolish as our notion that the South Koreans, equipped only for internal police action, could beat off a well-armed North Korean force. The seasoned statesmen of Europe are looking beyond the satellites to Russia herself; we ought to be doing the same.

President Truman's proposal to seek vastly bigger funds for arming western Europe is a vital step toward real defense against the might of Russia proper. But it's only a starter.

Another move that must be considered promptly is whether to include west German forces in an over-all European defense plan. Right now we're stalling on this. Soviet-controlled east Germany has a 100,000-man police force that is an army in all but name; meantime, our occupation officials talk of possibly permitting a special force up to 12,000.

We can't ride along on the glib assumption Russia has no early designs on Germany, and then quickly whip a German force into shape if she does act. Soviet action there certainly would mean Russian troops as well as east German police.

A Russian move in Germany would undoubtedly bring America's strategic air force into action, with the atom bomb its biggest threat. But we couldn't drop the bomb on the cities of western Europe, including west Germany. For there live the peoples whose help we need, whom we are trying to keep on the side of freedom.

Only great military manpower thrown against the Russians could save these lands from being swiftly overrun. There is no excuse for delaying the critical decisions as to where we shall get that manpower.

If we really want German forces included, the time to settle the point is now. If we don't then we should get on to other arrangements. A sound defense plan for Europe, one good enough to give the Russians pause, is the greatest military challenge now facing the free countries of the west.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, for pure political reasons the Republicans are using statements which are obviously not borne out by facts. Not only that, but they willfully misstate facts and the truth when they charged President Roosevelt with being responsible for a Second World War and now President Truman as being responsible for conditions that confront us presently in Korea and other parts of the world.

I for one have maintained that it was not the wisest policy for President Truman to follow when, under the pretense of nonpartisan cooperation, he requested the advice and counsel of Mr. Herbert Hoover, Mr. John F. Dulles, and other leaders from the Republican Party.

I read an excellent editorial in the Chicago Sun-Times under date of August 18, 1950, which explains this situation in greater detail. Of course, the explanation is perhaps not as direct as I would prefer it to be, however, for the information of the American people I shall ask unanimous consent to insert the editorial in the Congressional RECORD. It shows the extents to which the Republicans will go and how short their memories are when they feel that they can gain a little advantage.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of the attacks that were made by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge against the League of Nations, notwithstanding that up to that time his party agreed with President Wilson for such a body. The only objection that the Senator had was that Great Britain would have four votes in that body. Not having any genuine issue with which to go before the American people, the Republicans used the League of Nations as their issue. That was one of the greatest mistakes in the history of the world, for nearly every student of international law and history will agree that had we entered the League of Nations the Second World War would and could have been averted and the loss of millions of lives and the destruction of billions of dollars worth of property would have been saved; perhaps, too, the danger which confronts us today would not be with us.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Republicans, giving lip service to the United Nations, are giving comfort to the profiteers and the professional brass hats who are the beneficiaries of war regardless of the cost in terms of life and property. Today, these same groups are trying to destroy the United Nations instead of strengthening it. The article afore-mentioned follows:

GOP AND UNITED NATIONS

Five top-flight Republicans in the United States Senate say they won't sleep peacefully "until the free nations of the world, each contributing its fair share, realistically join together through the United Nations to establish peace in a free world."

The five Republicans are members of the key Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and they have the general agreement of the Senator from Michigan.

Clearly, the situation these key Republicans require for peaceful slumber is precisely what the Truman administration is seeking. The American people support such a program, so these Republicans "wholeheartedly pledge unpartisan cooperation" to accomplish it.

Other Republicans lie awake nights fearing any program that is accomplished through the United Nations will endanger our sovereignty, but the five Republican Senators are for it.

But on what basis? "On the basis," they say, "of honest recognition of past errors."

That is their way of saying that Democrats are responsible for all past mistakes, for they say the Democrats "failed to understand Soviet Russia" and from this failure our present critical problems flow.

The loss of eastern Europe and China, the partition of Germany, the Berlin corridor, the enslavement of Poles, Balts, Albanians, Czechoslovaks, Rumanians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Outer Mongolia, and North Korea—all were produced—the Republicans say—by Democratic blindness. All are "the disastrous consequences of Yalta and Potsdam," where, the Republicans say, two stupid, blind Democratic Presidents represented America.

Accept this honest recognition of the past, say the five GOP Senators, and we will cooperate to save the future. Naturally, in this time of crisis, there is no room for politics. So the Democrats, if they are patriots, shouldn't dispute the Republicans' "honest" history, the Republicans insist

The Democrats no doubt will recall that at Yalta the Red Army was deep in the job of liberating eastern Europe, where it was in full occupation by the time of Potsdam. Are the GOP Senators suggesting that the country would have supported a war against the Russians in 1945?

If so, would they have taken the Nazis as our allies?

The Democrats also will refuse to take the full blame of our rapid demobilization in 1945. Were the Republicans in 1945 urging American wives and mothers to insist that their men remain in service? Were they telling our men they must stay in uniform to liberate eastern Europe and save Outer Mongolia?

And at Yalta, would the Republicans have spurned Russian aid against Japan and turned a cold shoulder to Stalin's hard bargain? What of the hundred thousand American lives Generals Marshall and MacArthur said would be saved by prompt Soviet action against Japan?

The atom bomb, remember, was still a theory at the time of the Yalta Conference early in February 1945. Military men were not sure it would work until the first one was exploded in New Mexico on July 16, 1945.

Democrats also are charged with responsibility for the veto in the UN. There were outstanding Republicans who insisted on a strong veto to preserve our sovereignty. Were they only kidding?

The Democrats also are charged with having "betrayed China * * * suddenly in 1945." Any connection to the demoralization within Nationalist China is coincidental. The Democrats did it all alone—through their "failure and refusal * * * to recognize the true aims and methods of * * * Russia."

From all of this we are asked to believe that Republicans, on the other hand, always knew the answer to the Soviet riddle within an enigma. Only their modesty kept them from telling their countrymen the solution. An "honest recognition" of Democratic errors and Republican wisdom, suggest the GOP Senators, will save the country and the world in November.

So we see that in mid-August the 1950 campaign for control of Congress is under way. Senator WILEY is from Wisconsin, Senator HICKENLOOPER is from Iowa, Senator VANDENBERG is from Michigan. These GOP statesmen are from the Midwest. In spite of all the talk that the Midwest is cold on the United Nations, these three midwesterners are revealing an old Republican habit.

They are saying they can take Franklin Roosevelt's UN and do better with it than Mr. Truman and the Democrats.

What do you think? You'll have a chance to tell what you think on election day, November 7.

Economy in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, typical of the letters I have been receiving since the vote on the bill to restore the postal service is one I received this morning from Mr. W. H. Logan, of Orlando, Fla. He says:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have just completed reading an editorial in today's Orlando Sentinel quoting extracts from your statement in reference to your opposition to the bill for restoring twice-a-day mail deliveries, etc. It pleased me very much. It was a commendable and courageous stand to take.

You ask: "Have the people at home changed in these few weeks? Have they decided now that they do not want economy?" In my opinion the people at home have not changed. In my opinion the passing of this economy measure to reduce expenses in our Post Office Department was one of the most heartening things Congress has done in recent months. They felt that, at long last, the people's Representatives in Washington were starting to give the people at home a break. It was a bit of sunshine in an otherwise rather murky sky. They became hopeful of the future of our country. In a small measure they were regaining faith in the men and women in Washington representing them. The folks in Washington must not let the people at home entirely lose their hope for the future of their country or their faith in the men elected to represent them. When the House voted to restore city mail service to twice a day and wipe out other post office economies—they recognized this action for exactly what it was, "political hokum." Once again the people at home had been sold out. Causes for economies have not diminished. With the unparalleled crisis facing our country causes for governmental economies have increased tremendously. The people at home are confused, fearful, and growing bitter. It is difficult for them to understand how any man in public office can place loyalty to party ahead of loyalty to country. It is difficult for them to understand just how such men can place political expediency first and let the duty they owe their Government (the people at home) follow as best it can. I have heard not a single complaint from any individual because we now have but one mail delivery a day. For that matter we very seldom got but one delivery when we were supposed to have two.

I think you are doing a tremendously important thing in taking the people back home into your confidence in explaining your stand on the various issues coming before the House for your consideration. I hope you will continue to do so.

Yours sincerely,

W. H. LOGAN.

Mr. Speaker, when are we going to wake up to the fact that the people at home really mean what they say when they ask for economy?

Story of the Stockholm Petition—A Communist Device To Turn Opinion Against the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, following my brief remarks on this subject, I am pleased to submit for reading and consideration by Members of Congress the text of a report as it appeared in the New York Times Sunday, August 13, 1950.

May I say that, since it is generally agreed and understood that guns and powder by themselves will not win enduring world peace, and since it is well known that a powerful portion of the program of Soviet Russia, in its vigorous attempt to capture the minds and hearts of the people of the world, is by the propaganda route, it would appear as clear as crystal that the United States should immediately, vigilantly, and vigorously counter such false propaganda with the truth about the happiness, the health, the security, the opportunities, the privileges, the freedoms, the advancements—and all other blessings which are available to the people of our great Nation, as contrasted to those who live under the heel of totalitarianism, whether in Soviet Russia or her satellites or the thinking and action of any aggressor nation, by whatever name it is called.

These days the papers and magazines, as well as some Members of Congress, speak out loudly for more support of the Voice of America. While I have voted for that from the beginning, I am not unmindful of the previous lack of wisdom on the part of some Members who previously opposed the expenditures of moneys to broadcast or disseminate from the Voice of America or to disseminate adequately the ideas of the American way of life. Ignorance never begets substantial progress. And progress cannot be had unless there is accurate and unbiased information freely available. This applies to masses of people as well as to individuals.

In the presence of the Korean war it is amply demonstrated that we of America must not only say we are proud of our own great Nation and the difference of living in America as contrasted with living in an aggressor state, we must live our democracy and we must be willing to spend money to give other peoples an opportunity to know what we have here in America. And time is running on—time is of the essence for America to wake up.

J. Edgar Hoover recently wrote that—

The orbit of Communist control has extended from one-seventh of the world's population in 1917 to one-third of the world's population at the present time. The intensification of communism and underground activity in the United States has increased proportionately. We must not forget that the United States and our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere stand as the last bulwark against Communist domination.

And he also said:

To continue, the Communist Party is not a bona fide political party. It is a highly organized, militant, and disciplined conspiratorial group following the whims and dictates of international communism. That was proved in the New York case which recently concluded with the conviction of 11 members of the executive board of the Communist Party.

Mr. Speaker, the present economic world is engaged in an immediate and intense struggle for existence between two diametrically opposed political systems. Ours is the American way of life or the freedom system, as I like to call it. The other is the Communist way. It is the Communist doctrine which preaches and practices dictatorship and aggressive control of all peoples and all property.

We who are born and raised and have prospered and have had magnificent opportunities under the American way, in my judgment, have not yet measured up to the opportunity which is ours to vigorously and patriotically uphold and sustain this way. I am sure you will agree with me.

On the other hand, the propaganda and the powder spread all over the world by Communist Russia and her satellites should shock us into a common purpose and accord of effectively countering aggressive communism with an aggressive Americanism.

I heard John Foster Dulles here in Washington a few months ago say that if the free world fails to rally to the support of one of its stricken members—referring to Korea—then, one by one, others would be struck down. Concurring with this great American, who has again been recently appointed by President Truman to represent the United States in the heavy obligation and responsibility at the United Nations Conference, I point out that, in this intimate world in which we live, the freedom and liberties and happiness and health of the peoples of one nation involve the same freedom, liberties, happiness, and health of the other nations of the world.

And, in asking for ways and means by which our Federal Bureau of Investigation, under the able direction of J. Edgar Hoover, felt the people of America could best coordinate and cooperate to combat subversive espionage, sabotage, and aggressive communism, I received the following as a statement by J. Edgar Hoover:

The internal security of the United States can be assured with the cooperation, aid, and assistance of every law-abiding person in our Nation. The President of the United States in restating the responsibilities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has called upon all law-enforcement officers, patriotic organizations, and individuals to report information pertaining to espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities to the FBI. Plans have already been made and are in operation whereby the law-enforcement agencies of the Nation are working in close cooperation with the FBI.

The following suggestions are being made to assist patriotic organizations and individuals in complying with the President's request:

1. The FBI is as near to you as your telephone. The first page of every telephone book in the country lists the nearest office of the FBI. You can communicate with the FBI by telephone, letter, or call at our nearest office.

2. Feel free to furnish all facts in your possession. Many times a small bit of information might furnish the data we are seeking. If you have any information on sabotage, espionage, or subversive activities, contact the FBI.

3. The FBI is interested in receiving facts; we are not interested in what a person thinks but in what he does which undermines our internal security. Avoid reporting malicious gossip or idle rumors.

4. Do not circulate rumors about subversive activities, or draw conclusions from information you furnish the FBI. The data you possess might be incomplete or only partially accurate. By drawing conclusions based on insufficient evidence, grave injustices might result to innocent persons.

5. Once you have reported your information to the FBI do not endeavor to make private investigations. This can best be done by trained investigators who have access to data acquired over the years on individuals engaged in subversive activities. Hysteria, witchhunts, and vigilantes weaken internal security. Investigations involving internal security require care and painstaking effort. We all can contribute to our internal security by protecting the innocent as well as by identifying the enemies within our midst. In cases involving espionage, it is more important to identify spies, their contacts, sources of information, and methods of communications than to make immediate arrests.

6. Be alert. The greatest defenders against sabotage are the loyal American workmen who are producing the materials and weapons for our defense. They can be the "watch dogs" of defense in every walk of life.

7. The forces which are most anxious to weaken our internal security are not always easy to identify. Communists have been trained in deceit and secretly work toward the day when they hope to replace our American way of life with a Communist dictatorship. They utilize cleverly camouflaged movements, such as some peace groups and civil rights organizations, to achieve their sinister purposes. While they as individuals are difficult to identify, the Communist Party line is clear. Its first concern is the advancement of Soviet Russia and the godless Communist cause. It is important to learn to know the enemies of the American way of life.

Mr. Speaker, we must tell the truth to the peoples of the world about ourselves. Frank admission is good for the soul of a Nation as well as for the spirit of an individual. We must, therefore, recognize our faults and vigorously and promptly correct them. We must recognize our weaknesses and replace them with strength. We must habitually practice what we preach.

But these are human frailities, and a Nation is only made up of human beings. We must recognize human values in whatever color of skin they reside. We must increasingly have grounds for living pride and for willingness to speak out strongly for the American way of life. We adult Americans must so speak and so live and have our being each day that our children and youth shall live in an atmosphere daily of pride and possession in having the privilege of being born and raised in the United States of America.

Our schools, both public and private, must initiate and carry on courses of citizenship in such a manner that, increasingly, the children and youth of American have the intellectual knowledge and attainments about their country which qualifies them to meet the ridiculous, absurd, and untrue claims of aggressive communism.

Mr. Speaker, we have been and are in a war of words and ideas as well as with airplanes, submarines, and bazookas. This Stockholm petition is but another evidence of that fact. I vigorously urge that no one sign that petition. I also strenuously advise all patriotic Americans to withhold their names from so-called petitions for peace, and so forth, until they first check up to see the origin thereof. Here follows the splendid history of the Stockholm petition as set forth in the New York Times:

For two weeks last March a meeting of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress or "Peace Partisans" was held in Stockholm. Chairman of the committee was Frederic Joliot-Curie, the French Communist, who was removed as French High Commissioner for Atomic Energy.

The meeting was the culmination of a series of international conferences. The first was a "World Congress of Intellectuals" held at Wroclaw, Poland, in 1948. In 1949 there were a "Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace," held at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, and a "Congress of Partisans of Peace," held in Paris. At all these gatherings the theme was "peace." The participants were Communists or extreme left-wingers.

Stockholm was the grand finale. At the meeting a peace petition was adopted. Preparations were made to obtain signatures to the petition throughout the world.

TEXT OF THE APPEAL

This document is headed: "Your Hand Can Stop Atomic War. Sign for Peace."

This is the text:

"WORLD PEACE APPEAL

"We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of peoples. We demand strict international control to enforce this measure.

"We believe that any government which first uses atomic weapons against any other country whatsoever will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal.

"We call on all men and women of good will through the world to sign this appeal."

Accompanying the text of this petition—now being distributed in the United States—is a statement to the effect that millions of people of all faiths, creeds, and races are signing and that "if we, the people, say 'no' to war there will be peace." Quotations from a number of prominent persons in support of peace are appended.

The World Peace Appeal of the Peace Partisans has become a major weapon of Russian propaganda against the west. In Moscow the official party journal, Pravda, laid down the dictum that anyone in any country who refused to sign the petition automatically exposed himself as "an accomplice and henchman of the warmongers."

The Communist Parties on all the continents have made extraordinary efforts to obtain signatures to the petition. Left-wing labor groups, idealists, and people whose hatred of war exceeds their knowledge of Soviet tactics have been marshalled to roll up the peace vote.

Last week the first comprehensive results of this immense effort were disclosed. In Paris M. Joliot-Curie, the committee chairman, announced that the Stockholm peace petition had been signed by 273,470,566 persons. This is one-eighth of the human race.

TABULATION BY COUNTRIES

Analysis of where the bulk of the claimed vote comes from reveals some interesting facts. One is that the vast majority of the signers live in countries behind the iron curtain. The ratio between populations and signers of the peace petition in some of the principal countries is shown in these figures:

	Population	Signers
U. S. S. R.	193,000,000	115,275,000
Poland	24,500,000	18,000,000
Czechoslovakia	12,500,000	9,500,000
Hungary	9,200,000	7,500,000
Bulgaria	7,200,000	5,801,346
Korea (North)	9,000,000	5,680,000
China	463,000,000	44,000,000
East Germany	18,500,000	17,046,000
West Germany	49,700,000	2,000,000
France	41,200,000	12,000,000
Italy	46,000,000	11,631,523
Great Britain	50,800,000	780,277
India	347,000,000	127,389
Japan	83,000,000	1,345,000
United States	150,000,000	1,350,000

The complete list of national totals is an indication of how and where most of the signatures were obtained. These are some side lights:

1. Of the world total, 235,000,000, of 86 percent, came from Communist-dominated countries—Russia, China, eastern Germany, and the various Soviet satellites. The Soviet Union alone is said to have rolled up 100,000,000 signatures in a 2-week period. This was after the Supreme Soviet had made it plain that signing was the thing to do by giving the petition its own unanimous endorsement.

2. Some of the Soviet satellites did even better at signing up than the U. S. S. R. In east Germany, for example, the announced total of signatures equals over 92 percent of the whole population, infants included.

3. Western Europe contributed 32,000,000 signatures. Italy and France, which together contain only a third of western Europe's people but have strong Communist parties, supplied 80 percent of the west European total. No signatures were reported from Spain or Portugal. Yugoslavia didn't furnish any, either.

4. The non-Communist countries of Asia provided 2,868,000 signatures, most of them from Japan and Burma. Only 1 person out of every 2,700 in India signed. The African total calls for examination. Some light is thrown on the question by the size of the poll in the various areas.

Persons who make it their business to sample public opinion note that the United States total of 1,350,000 signatures far exceeds the estimated number of Communists and fellow travelers in this country. They believe that many of the signers are idealistic people who are horrified by the thought of atomic war but who haven't thought much beyond that. In addition, there are a certain number of people in any community who will sign virtually anything they are asked to sign, without close examination.

Abroad, there are other factors at work as well as these. In Europe and Asia millions of confused, war-weary people dread the prospect of an atomic conflict in which their own lands would be battlefields. There is suspicion, exploited by the Communists, that the United States and the Soviet Union are engaged in a struggle to the death for world domination. Many of the signers of the petition want, above all things, to be neutral in the war they foresee. Communists are doing all they can to further this idea.

These general interpretations of west European reactions are borne out by on-the-spot observations by correspondents of the New York Times.

WHAT IS RUSSIA'S MOTIVE?

Why has the Soviet Union gone to such lengths to circulate its "peace appeal" and publicize the claimed results? Why has so much effort been expended to befuddle world opinion?

Two suppositions are advanced to answer the questions. One is that the Kremlin, realizing the depth of the fears and uncertainties aroused throughout the free world by the present international situation and awful threat of atomic conflict, is seeking to weaken the resolution of its adversaries by the same "upside down" arguments it has advanced in the Security Council debate over the Korean war. Millions of people hate war and want peace; if the United States can be pictured as a warmonger eager to use the A-bomb, potential allies will be alienated and discord will be sown in the United States itself.

The other supposition is that the Russians greatly fear the American lead in the atomic field. Winston Churchill has said that the United States stock pile of A-bombs is the only thing that has prevented a full-scale Soviet invasion of Europe. If the Russians could somehow muster sufficient world opinion to weaken America's determination to use its chief present defense against Soviet aggression, the Kremlin's ambitions might be more easily realized. And Russia itself would escape the dire penalty of its actions.

Panama Offers Aid in the Korean Conflict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, later in the current week, consideration will be given to the bill, H. R. 8677, which was designed to place the Panama Canal operations on a businesslike basis. The measure has received most careful study by members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Those of us who have studied the affairs of the Panama Canal are very much aware of the unusual relationship between our Government and the Republic of Panama. We recognize clearly that, without a cordial and neighborly relationship between us, the operation of the canal might be seriously jeopardized.

About a year ago, while visiting the Panama Canal, I had the honor of addressing the Panamanian Assembly. I was very much impressed with the cordiality and friendliness with which I was received, and I came away feeling that our future relationship was destined to continue on the same friendly basis.

This morning, I read with great pleasure in the Panama Star and Herald the message of President Arnulfo Aria, of Panama, to his people on the subject of the Korean conflict and the attitude of his government toward it. The President's statement is of such timely interest and so reassuring to those of us who are particularly interested in the Panama Canal that I am constrained to place the entire text of the message in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It follows:

PANAMA TO FULFILL HER DEMOCRATIC DUTY—ARIAS

Text of President Arnulfo Arias' message to the Nation yesterday on his government's all-out offer of aid to the United Nations on the Korean conflict follows:

"Fellow citizens, you have just heard the Cabinet declaration which was read over this microphone by the secretary general of the Presidencia.

"That document embodies the decision at which the Government has arrived, impelled by its determination to provide effective moral and material cooperation with the United Nations, of which Panama is one of the charter members—in its arduous struggle for the defense of democracy, in mortal peril from international tyranny seeking to grab the entire world.

"It is also a categoric reaffirmation that Panama, true to its pledges in bilateral treaties with the United States of America and the Continental Defense Pact signed in Rio de Janeiro, is ready, as always, to contribute within her means to the defense of the Canal, that is, the defense of her own sovereignty, to which it cannot renounce. It is also conclusive proof of American solidarity, of which the Republic has given ample evidence on many occasions since her foundation.

"Reasons of internal and external security which our country must not and cannot ignore without failing its binding obligations and its deep democratic faith, have therefore impelled the Government which I have the honor of presiding to take the measures which it considers to be of immediate necessity in the face of the critical world situation."

ASKS FOR COOPERATION

"Because of the threat that hovers over our country and over democracy, we call upon you earnestly to cooperate with the Government as good patriots and Americans. To that end, there is no better contribution on your part than the will to work and to keep order in order to help saving our Christian civilization, the pride of democratic countries.

"We are convinced that this appeal will be answered. This conviction stems from the tradition of our people dating from the time when our soil already served as a bridge between the Maya civilization of the north and the Inca civilization of the south. It has been confirmed by our colonial and postcolonial history and it is reaffirmed by contemporary history. Panama has never hesitated to fulfill its destiny: It made the extreme sacrifice of giving of her own soil that the whole world should benefit.

"We Isthmians have become convinced that the soil we tread has a deep world significance. For, despite the continued and repeated onsets of powerful and crushing foreign influences, we have been able to keep the intrinsic Panamanian essence in our love for our own things and have adapted our life to those moralities which can be of benefit to our nationality.

"But if we have been doing this instinctively, almost without realizing it, it is time that we acquire full conscience of our mission as the center of the Americas and as the Bridge of the World, where a spiritual force that will spread slowly over the world is developing as a result of the fusion of races, languages and ideas around us.

"The great Bolivar's words were profoundly significant:

" 'How fine it would be that the Isthmus of Panama were, for us, what Corinth was for the Greeks. Let us hope that some day we shall have the good fortune of installing there an august congress of representatives of republics, empires and kingdoms to discuss the high interests of peace and war with the nations of the other three parts of the world. That magnificent position between two great seas may become, with time, the center of the universe. Its canals will shorten world distances, will link closer the commercial ties of Europe, America and Asia. . . Perhaps only there will be the site of the capital of the earth, as Constantin would have made Byzantium in the old hemisphere.'

"And as he prophesied, we hope that the great centers of Pan-Americanism will converge here and that their material moral and spiritual influence will spread from here. We Panamanians have the great responsibility of having to be prepared to offer the world a home of brotherhood and peace for the development of the future American civilization.

"Panamanians: I call upon you to ponder on the seriousness of the present time; to set aside petty quarrels in order to unite our forces and our wills in the service of the country and of the democratic ideal which it fosters; to live in harmony, seeking only the happiness of our beloved country and the solidarity of all the nations of America and showing to the world that we keep solid faith with the United Nations, the hope of freedom—and justice-loving countries."

Text of other documents released in connection with the President's broadcast follows:

"The Secretary General of the Presidencia announces that the Cabinet Council, at a special meeting held August 2, decided unanimously to offer to the United Nations the following:

"1. Bases for training military contingents of the United Nations.

"2. Free transit over our highways for the troops of the United Nations.

"3. A contingent of Panamanian volunteers.

"4. The use of the national merchant marine for the transportation of materials and troops.

"5. Farming lands to help in supplying the troops."

My Voting Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GARDNER R. WITHROW

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I am asking permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, to take advantage of the privilege extended to me as a Member of Congress to protect myself against distortion of my voting record as a Member of this Congress.

I have been compelled to do this because of numerous advertisements appearing in daily and weekly newspapers in my district which distort my congressional voting record.

Probably the most flagrant distortion is the attempt being made to create the impression that I am opposed to the dairy interests of my district and that I have voted in favor of the oleomargarine interests. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The facts are that in March of 1949 I appeared before the Agriculture Committee of the House of Representatives and argued against the passage of H. R. 3, which was a bill repealing all taxes and Federal restrictions upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. Further, that prior to the vote, I took the floor on March 31, 1949, and argued against its passage. On April 1, 1949, I voted against the bill. That is the record and it cannot be disputed.

Because of my forthright position against colored oleomargarine and in favor of our great dairy industry, I have been publicly commended by farm groups throughout the United States.

Now, so that there will be no misunderstanding, I want to cite to the citizens of the Third Congressional District and point to the fact that the interests spreading this false propaganda, these malicious half-truths, are the interests that have always fought the things that we liberals have stood for. In order to implement and to obtain their objectives these special interests, under the guise of operating as a voluntary committee, with unlimited financial backing, have in every campaign to date used these same miserable and unwarranted tactics.

The above-mentioned ads containing half-truths and malicious inferences now being carried in the newspapers are put there to try to confuse the public and are costing the "fat boys" thousands of dollars. I leave it to you to answer the question—"Why are they doing it?"

You can be sure that the Old Guard which now is in complete control of the voluntary committee of the party always makes certain that the candidate they endorse will be subservient to them.

In our congressional district, this voluntary committee held a caucus at Richland Center at which they handpicked a candidate.

These attempts to distort and misrepresent my record shall not deter me in my determination to continue, as I have in the past, to give real representation to the people of my congressional district and to continue to support our great dairy industry.

Throughout my legislative career, I have supported wholeheartedly rural electrification, soil conservation, and adequate farm credits. I have untiringly worked in conjunction with farm leaders to formulate a long range, constructive farm program; that during the interim I have contended that full parity price supports must be maintained. I have consistently supported measures which have been of benefit to the farmers, the workers and the veterans of my district.

In this present emergency—an undeclared war—it has been my contention that we should adopt a pay-as-you-go tax policy as far as it is practicable and, further, that we should adopt a tax policy that would take the excess profits out of this undeclared war. If the boys are to be called upon to make these extreme sacrifices, surely no individual or group of individuals should be permitted to make exorbitant profits through the furnishing of the implements of war.

Make no mistake, the above mentioned activities on my part are the real issue and the real reason they are distorting my voting record.

I have a profound respect for the Republican Party and the principles as advocated by Abraham Lincoln and I feel that the overwhelming majority of the people who constitute the Republican Party are loyal, God-fearing citizens who believe in good government. However, I have nothing but the utmost contempt for this coterie of individuals who are attempting to prey upon this Grand Old Party to use it to serve their own selfish, special interests.

Let us keep the record straight. We must bend every effort to preserve the primary election law in the State of Wisconsin so that men, providing they can properly qualify, can have the right of free men to seek public office. The voluntary caucus system which handpicks candidates, is a direct violation of the spirit of the primary election law and is conceived so as to circumvent it. The voluntary caucus system is the entering wedge for the repeal of the State primary election law.

Your Land and Mine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the remarks of Henry J. Taylor, distinguished author and commentator, over the ABC network last evening:

YOUR LAND AND MINE

(By Henry J. Taylor)

Mr. TAYLOR. A military plan did exist in event of Red aggression against South Korea. We're not seeing it. For by the plan our men would not be in South Korea tonight at all.

But when President Truman retired on the night of the third day of the aggression and suddenly made up his mind to order American ground forces into South Korea this order scrapped the plan—although I do not believe it has ever before been revealed.

Yet every home in your land and mine is affected. And what goes on behind the scenes is our concern; for it is not true that a basic military plan never existed. It existed. But it was scrapped by that sudden order. So, here is the simple truth.

Now, when the news of the flagrant Stalin aggression struck, the original problem was not whether the United States must intercede. That was an elementary decision. America had to take action against the North Korean aggressor. If we did not intercede we could lose any hope of stabilizing anti-Communist interests throughout the Far East.

No; the real problem was how to intercede and punish the aggressor—what method would be best, how best to employ our facilities to our best advantage, what would be the wisest fundamental policy for the President to adopt.

Just to take action would contain great peril. The decision as to method would require long-headedness. The decision would set a pattern. In short, we were entitled to choose what poison we would hand the other fellow to drink.

There may be other aggressors to punish in a dozen distant places where Stalin can push his Soviet stooges forward, feed us natives to fight, in North Korean style—bleeding us savagely wherever Russia wants us to bleed, at no loss to Russia herself * * * China, Indochina, Burma, the Philippines and elsewhere.

The plan the President scrapped sought to avoid setting this savage ground pattern by which Stalin could retain the strategic initiative by, in his own sweet time, pushing forward one satellite group of natives after another for us to fight—North Koreans today, vast hordes of others tomorrow.

For Russia's trump card in most of her wars has been to draw the enemy into nature's punishment—distance, or climate or manpower as nature's punishment.

The plan realized that no draft calls out of our homes and factories—a hundred thousand one month, another hundred thousand another month— can ever be big enough to supply American inductees to fight with guns and bayonets wherever Stalin dictates throughout the vast, tangled land-mass of Asia, trapping American troops in the jungles, rice-paddies, mountains and rivers of areas from which we can have a surface military victory if we spend enough, but from which there can be no return in respect to long-term world peace or American security; with Stalin sitting in the Kremlin saying "Now, let me see. Where will I trap their soldiers next?"

Accordingly, the plan to avoid this had pointed out that if we intervened on the ground in enough such places as South Korea, and for long enough years, the ability of the United States to defeat the Soviet Union itself would be clearly imperiled. And that's what interests Stalin. No wonder a plan existed with all our fundamental values at stake.

The plan to avoid these traps had taken a cold, hard look at the potential populations of peoples and races at Stalin's disposal for fanatical and savage warfare against our inductees on the ground: Malaya five million, Indochina—where the French are bogged down—twenty-five million, Thailand seventeen million, Burma another seventeen million, Iran eighteen million, Red China four hundred and fifty million, and so forth. The plan insisted we should not allow our pattern for commitments to exceed our powers. We should use a method of intervention against the Korean aggression that would exploit our American advantages, not the enemy's Asiatic advantages.

ANNOUNCER. And now, Mr. Taylor, what was this plan which fell by the wayside?

Mr. TAYLOR. Why Mr. Truman ordered our ground troops into South Korea and thus scrapped the plan I do not know, and neither do many of our military leaders, but here are the facts:

The fundamental of the plan was to keep our intervention in Korea, our chastisement of the North Koreans by our forces, off the ground—keep our intervention off the ground—and especially off the ground in South Korea, the homeland of our friends.

It was proposed by important military planners that:

1. We serve an ultimatum on the North Korean Red aggressors, through the UN, directing them to withdraw their aggressor troops north of the thirty-eighth parallel within 24 hours.

2. That the North Koreans submit to the UN for judgment the issues with South Korea which they say caused them to resort to military force.

3. That on North Korea's failure to comply in accord with the Charter of the United Nations the air and sea forces of the United States and the United Nations would instantly declare a naval blockade around Korea and at the same time bomb all communications and industry in North Korea—and only North Korea. The plan would have left South Korea, the homeland of our friends, untouched by our forces in the intervention. For not a bomb would drop there nor a foot soldier be landed.

4. We would keep up this bombing of North Korea—and only North Korea—indefinitely, if necessary. From our bases on Guam and Japan we would bomb the North Korean ports—Najlin, Changjin, Kanan, Wonsan, Chinnampo, the capital and every railroad and factory; but never—never—put an American foot soldier in South Korea. And certainly the achievement of our objective could not take longer than to fight our way on the ground all the way up to the peninsula, mountain by mountain, town by town.

In short, we would have made life miserable, made aggression miserable, for the Soviet satellite that marches when Stalin says to march; made life miserable from the air in its own territory—North Korea—and only North Korea, and not been party to the destruction of the South Korean homeland.

For, regardless of our international motives, it's difficult today for a South Korean native to see how he and his family is being protected when his own countryside is made a battlefield by Americans from far away; and when actually, because we have soldiers on the ground, our bombers have bombed more targets in South Korea in support of our troops than they have bombed in North Korea, although both North and South have been set on fire.

If you or I were the average South Korean native, of which there are about 20,000,000, we would look up and see an American plane overhead, and the next thing our home is blown up—and the American Government announces that the result is excellent. Or we see a cluster of American GI's in our village, and the next thing, artillery fire—and our houses are knocked down, our livestock is dead, we're homeless, and more American jeeps and guns pass us by on the roads to win battles we do not thoroughly understand.

For what we are doing now is like fighting across New York State and displacing all the people in New York State. Five hundred thousand people live in Taegu alone. In fact, we have already put over a million and a half South Koreans on relief.

What this can eventually mean to us is not hard to imagine.

Instead of this, the plan that was scrapped also had in mind that if we did intervene in South Korea on the ground, when we get all through, we Americans would have to rebuild South Korea all over again.

Further, by the plan which fell by the wayside, we would have been exploiting our technological advantage—airplanes—over our opponent—North Korea—instead of fighting the enemy on its own terms, best suited to the enemy's greatest and only fitness, namely, unlimited ground troops to throw against us without regard for human life, theirs or our own.

It would have avoided our becoming involved up a dead-end street in mass land battles against barbarians who do have unlimited manpower behind them—can pin us down in their guerrilla-infested mountains and valleys and—once we are in—bleed our American ground troops; bleed us in a pattern of attrition that Stalin can duplicate elsewhere to the long-term peril of our country, for there is a limit to the number of mistakes which our country can absorb.

Instead, all our ground forces would remain intact and secure for other possible missions—not trapped with savages in Korea and other places from which there is no return.

But when President Truman ordered our ground soldiers into South Korea and they struggled to the front on the 4th of July, the die was cast.

This scrapped the plan. His order substituted a method the expanded outcome of which no man can foresee.

There you have the facts. And here we are.

Suppression of Communist Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM B. FUGATE
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. FUGATE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution which was received on August 21, 1950, from Mr. John O. Youell, chairman, John Fox, Jr., Post, No. 5715, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Big Stone Gap, Va.

I concur wholeheartedly and unreservedly in the views of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, as expressed in the resolution adopted by the John Fox, Jr., Post, No. 5715.

Never in the history of America has there been a greater threat to individual freedom and government by law, and to the institutions of democracy by the forces of atheism, as presently existing in the Kremlin of Soviet Russia.

Legislation should be enacted forthwith to require all Communists in the United States to register and declare their affiliation. They should be required to obtain a license before they would be allowed to circulate in the mails communistic propaganda. Should we become engaged in war with Russia, all known Communists should be immediately apprehended and incarcerated. Those resisting should be dealt with summarily.

The resolution follows:

Whereas the John Fox, Jr., Post, No. 5715, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, is an organization of men who have defended the principles of freedom and democracy on the land, on the sea, and in the air, outside the continental limits of the United States; and

Whereas these men are now cognizant of the threat of communism to the ideals for which they have offered themselves, soul, mind, and body; and

Whereas the members of this post realize that the whole aim of communism is world conquest and the immediate ultimate aim of communism is the conquest of the United States, since the United States represents the real threat to Communist domination of the world, due to the freedom-loving spirit of the citizens of these United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the John Fox, Jr., Post, No. 5715, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That all Communists, who are registered as such, be subjected to trial in the Federal courts of the United States, as traitors to the American way of life and if found guilty of such, be deported immediately to the United Soviet Socialist Republic of Russia, where they can enjoy the so-called ideals for which they so readily and dogmatically offer their services and efforts; and be it further

Resolved, That the Associated Press, the United Press, NBC, MBC, CBC, and other news gathering agencies, including various newspapers and radio publicity agencies, which give national publicity to organizations that are known to be communistically inclined, be requested to ignore or identify the actions taken by such subversive organizations, so that the citizens of the United States, who are true citizens of the United States, will not be confused and misled by the high sounding titles of such Communist dominated organizations; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of this post will be on the alert for any Communist activity of any type within their immediate vicinity; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to the national and State headquarters of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, our Senators and Congressmen from Virginia, our State senators and delegates, the Associated Press, the United Press, the National, Mutual, and Columbia Broadcasting Systems.

Resolution passed unanimously.

Signed by Resolution Committee:

JOHN O. YOUELL, Chairman.
W. ED STEWART,
HOBART SHORT.

National Groups in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER A. CHESNEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. CHESNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I would like to include the following article by Keith Wheeler which appeared in the Chicago Sun-Times of August 21, 1950, regarding national groups in the United States:

CHICAGO PROFILE SEES NO PERIL TO MELTING POT—CHARLES ROZMAREK DEFENDS NATIONAL GROUPS IN UNITED STATES

(By Keith Wheeler)

Once upon a time, somebody asked Charles Rozmarek, president of the Polish National Alliance, whether he didn't consider it deleterious to the American melting pot that Polish-Americans have retained a certain national cohesiveness within the United States.

Rozmarek, a large, bland man with a slow though frequent smile, leaned back in his chair and started a résumé of English history.

He dwelt upon the military-occupational nature of the Roman conquest of the British Isles, pointing out how little of Roman culture had been implanted among the rude denizens of England. He dwelt for a time upon the Saxon invasions, making the point that these Teutonic warriors had for centuries made the language of Britain a German dialect.

He progressed to the Norman invasion of 1066 and went on to explain how William the Conqueror's personal greed came to infuse the principle of escheat into the body of British common law.

He finally got around to Chaucer in the midfourteenth century, and there he made his point.

It had taken more than three centuries to evolve the written English language out of the polyglot tongues of the Celts, Romans, Angles, Saxons, and Norman French. The evolutionary process of amalgamating Polish and other national groups into an essentially American culture is a lot further along after only four generations, he pointed out.

"Such national groups as ours are anything but bad for America," he said. "Instead they make sure that America is enriched by the best we have to give."

The answer was characteristic of the man who heads the 321,000-member PNA and concurrently stands as titular leader of 6,000,000 Polish-Americans through his presidency of the Polish American Congress.

Son of a Pennsylvania coal miner, Rozmarek has become a man of considerable cultural attainment. He speaks Polish, which he got at home. His English is the product of school and study. Spanish came by trading lessons with a Mexican political refugee in the coal mines. He taught himself German to the point of fluency and an exhaustive acquaintance with German poetry.

Rozmarek is a suave, carefully spoken man who apparently relishes his acquaintance with the past and his facile ability to apply its events to the present.

On matters of current history, his expressions tend toward the florid, as when he describes Poland as "the bulwark and outpost" of the western Christian world against the repeated incursions of Asiatic "hordes." There is, he says, a crystal-clear parallel between the feat of Jan Sobieski, who saved Christianity from the Moslems at Vienna in 1683, and the time in August 1920, when an infant Polish Government stopped the westward expansion of bolshevism at Warsaw.

Outside of their influence upon American policy, both the PNA and the Polish-American Congress exert a considerable influence upon the cultural, social, and economic lives of their members.

The PNA, which this year is celebrating the seventieth anniversary of its founding, has become largely a social group and simultaneously one of the country's largest fraternal insurance organizations, ranking fifth in the Nation in both policyholders and total insurance in force.

It was formed in 1880 with the dual purpose of lending the influence of American Poles toward the eventual independence of Poland and assisting in the amalgamation and Americanization of the tremendous waves of Polish immigrants, just then getting started.

The Polish-American Congress, which embraces various Polish social and church groups in a loose federation, was formed in 1944.

Rozmarek, born in the mining town of Wilkes-Barre, became the PNA's first American-born president in 1939. At that time he was a practicing lawyer in Wilkes-Barre after a varied career as laborer, Spanish interpreter, Government munitions inspector, and bank clerk.

Rozmarek has two daughters, Elaine, 20, who majored in Romance languages at the University of Illinois, and Marilyn, 18, a history major at Northwestern.

Universal Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Universal Training," published in the Harrisburg Evening News on August 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSAL TRAINING

President Truman and universal military training are creating an enigma. One day he sends a message to Congress urging immediate consideration, if not operation, of this highly effective form of national defense. Next day he is reported willing to let the whole thing go over until the next Congress.

Everybody is aware that universal military training in these abnormal times is not feasible. Neither the time, the money, nor the human material is available. Korea and other danger spots have first call. Nothing, even debate in Congress, should be allowed to interfere with national defense.

But as a project, universal military training is a necessity. The Nation cannot look forward with confidence to its security unless some such program is adopted. Such training has been opposed by Communists, pacifists, and some others with their fist tightly clinched around the tax penny.

For all these folks, military training has good and sufficient answers and, as today's cartoon indicates, the Nation and the world would be less jittery today had this country adopted universal military training at the end of the last war.

If between battle-front dispatches there is time to consider measures like universal military training, let Congress get to work on it instead of shelving it for a later day. That is the curse laid on the Nation now. It didn't think it needed adequate forces in the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Marines, and universal military training. Putting such matters on the shelf is stupidity in high gear.

Tribute to Hon. William Benton, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 22 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks of Mrs. Anne O'Hare McCormick at the UNESCO tribute dinner to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] held on April 20, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDWARD BARRETT, Assistant Secretary of State. A couple of weeks ago in Washington there was in the State Department what seems to be known as a high-level conference. In that conference, the discussions and arguments were getting pretty hot. People got around to citing authorities. Somebody said, "Well, don't forget what the President said 6 months ago, and what the Secretary said only about 2 months ago." Somebody else across the table piped up and said, "Yes, but did you read what Anne O'Hare McCormick wrote last week?" So you can see that Mrs. McCormick is held in about the same esteem in official Washington as she is in informed quarters in New York. She has worked with BILL BENTON on UNESCO matters on at least one international delegation, and I know, because he told me, has helped with innumerable ideas and suggestions. I think all of you know her as a distinguished foreign news analyst and columnist in the New York Times, and now you will all know her as one of the many friends of BILL BENTON. Mrs. McCormick.

MRS. ANNE O'HARE MCCORMICK. Senator BENTON, ladies, and gentlemen, you know, there is just one thing that I know of that BILL BENTON has not been, and that's a newspaperman. He was never a newspaperman, but from a long experience in meeting foreign ministers and senators and governors and assorted V. I. P.'s, including dictators, who are about the V. I. P.'est of all, I have come to the conclusion that they all came up from the press box, and I must say that newspapermen—I don't think that they—it seems to me that they didn't take very long before they cooled off, because newspapermen in office don't seem to like free-wheeling reporting or criticism any better than any other officials, and the present state of the world does not suggest, I think, that they are particularly brilliant in the job of public relations. Anyway, our honored guest this evening, neither he nor we of the press, can boast that he rose from the ranks, but I am here to testify, speaking for the press, that no one in public life believes in and talks and works so hard for the freedom of the press as BILL BENTON. He has said on more than one occasion, public and private, that the principal motive of his existence is a deep conviction that communication is the most important, the noblest, and the most human of all the interests of mankind. Mr. Ruml has said that he's never stuck to anything, but this is one thing that he's stuck to through all his various reincarnations, and I think he's never forgotten that. And those of us who know something of his activities know that he is a true crusader in this field. A kind of personified Voice of America that none of our enemies abroad, nor our indifferent Congressman at home, can really muzzle. He seems to me, and I have followed his work in many fields in national and international UNESCO conferences, as Assistant Secretary of State, as chairman of the American Delegation to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of the Press, and as a one-man campaigner—which hasn't been mentioned tonight, Bill, I'm surprised—for a world radio network even, he says, if it costs as much as a battleship, and now as a Member of the Senate. For his first act a month ago, as you have heard this evening, was to introduce a six-point resolution calling upon this country to organize a campaign for men's minds and loyalties commensurate with the needs and stakes involved. In all these posts he has manifested his devotion, indeed, his dedication, to the fight against the danger that seems to him, as it seems to me, far greater than the danger of the atomic bomb, or its monstrous progeny, and that danger, ladies and gentlemen, is the spread of hate, more poisonous to the mind and more shriveling to the soul than radioactivity is to the body, and also the spread of darkness, which deprives millions of our fellowmen of the facts of which they can judge intelligently and act rationally. From their point of view I believe the Czech Communists are right in closing our information centers and liquidating the personnel, because in such regimes truth is treason, the most subversive of all the forces they have to deal with. Fortunately we have on our side a priceless asset, and now I am quoting Mr. BENTON, which, he said in his first speech in the Senate, "We do not have to lie." What we have to do, as the President said today, is to step up the campaign of truth, and I think this speech is probably the greatest tribute BILL BENTON has received, in spite of all the wonderful tributes that have come at this dinner, because that for the first time the President of the United States has adopted his program. We have to battle with all our resources and all our power to extend freedom of information. The Czechs have learned that without a free press there cannot be a free people, and we have learned in the testing period in which we have lived in the last few years, we have learned that a free press is the very soul and the very guaranty of freedom. Today I watched in this room some beautiful cavalcades of Greek fashions that were brought here by our eloquent friend, Mrs. Grady, and I could have wept as I watched, because it seemed to me there passed before us like a great frieze, the history of our civilization. And, you know, to see the splendor and the antiquity of this thing we call western civilization is very moving to all westerners who believe in it, and then I could have wept for another reason, because I remember a year ago the agony of the Greeks and that out of that agony they produced this beauty, and it seemed to me as I watched that anything is possible to a free people, because freedom is hope, and freedom is creative energy, and freedom is life. The great general of the cold war is a man who keeps hammering on the walls of Jericho for the right of all men to know the facts on which their destiny depends. BILL BENTON is such a warrior, and I am sure he will never stop hammering at those walls until they fall, as I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, they inevitably will. And if we don't have that message of hope tonight when we are in the presence of people who believe in it so deeply that it means more to them than anything else, then we have no right to live, we have no promise in prospect. I am proud and happy to salute my friend, Bill, on behalf of the press. We of the press are glad he is in the Senate. Among many ex-newspapermen who do not know the value of newspapers as well as he does, maybe it's because he's never been on one, but we are grateful for what he has done, and for what he will do. If there was ever the right man in the right place at the right time, it is our friend Mr. BENTON, because this is the time when the future hangs on the victory not of arms but of ideas, on the victory of truth over lies, and so in the voice of the press I thank you, Bill, and say more power to you in the battle that is the life and death battle of us all.

A Citizen Speaks Up for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Frank D. Bianco, a veteran of two wars:

LEGAL DEPARTMENT,
Des Moines, Iowa, August 19, 1950.

Hon. PAUL CUNNINGHAM,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR PAUL: I have been wanting to write you a letter for quite some time and in view of the present situation of our country, I can't delay any further. I do not know whether or not you are receiving the volume of mail you should be in the present crisis, but I assure you from the comments and conversations I have had with our local people, the thoughts that I now express are the general consensus of opinion.

First, in regard to the position of Russia in the United Nations. I do not know what power, if any, Congress can assert on the matter of policies of our country in the United Nations Assembly, but in view of the history of the operation of the Organization since it was organized, it cannot act successfully as a governing body with the presence of Russia in that body. So far as I can remember, Russia is the only nation that has exercised its veto powers and has done so between 40 and 50 times already. Its obstructionist tactics to prevent the world working at peace is so evident it is beyond argument. If there is any way that Congress can bring pressure to bear upon our State Department to bring about the ousting of Russia from the United Nations, it must be done now. I know the argument is made that if Russia is ousted it will wreck the United Nations. This is pure "bosh" and "bunkum." The United Nations with Russia in it is not a functioning body and is wrecked even now. If Russia were expelled from the United Nations it would lose the most potent weapon it has to spread communism and unrest and corruption throughout the world. In view of the Korean crisis this is the opportune time and the God-given time to accomplish this fact. Oust Russia from the United Nations. Korea may be our Pearl Harbor of world war III.

With regard to our own economy in view of the crisis, politics as usual seems to be the theme of the present administration. I do not believe that business favors such a policy. I believe the people are ready and willing to assume the controls and sacrifices necessary to prepare our country for the coming emergency. It must be done on as nearly a pay-as-you-go basis as it is possible to do so if we intend to save our economy.

As an example of the unrealistic position we have been placed in, I wish to cite one incident at the end of the National Guard camp of the Thirty-fourth Division. Mind you, we had been at war with Korea since June 25, and the camp ended August 13. The railroad companies involved knew months ahead of the movements of troops necessary in and out of these camps and, of course, were confronted with the movements of troops to Korea, but this item was negligible inasmuch as the troops now in Korea were on the west coast. But, nevertheless, with all this time on their hands, the railroad companies did not have the cars available to move out the small number of troops of the Thirty-fourth Division at the end of their camp and were scurrying up and down the highways hunting for cars on the day they were to move out. It involved only a matter of six trains and yet cars were not available.

This is an example of the business-as-usual policy of our administration in the face of the present crisis. I know that our people are awakened to the dangers that we face, but we are not getting the leadership from the administration that the people are entitled to and it is up to those of us who can to make our voices heard that the inefficient and incompetent be turned out of Congress and the executive bodies of the administration. The hour is late; it will not brook of any delay.

If our country is to survive as a free and independent Nation all of its planning, until this threat of aggression is over and completely stifled, must be with the thought in view of the protection of our land. All unnecessary and unrelated expenditures that do not enhance the defense of the Nation should be absolutely curtailed. All expenditures should be directed in this direction, such as highways for fast transportation, railroad cars, and any related subjects that will aid in building up the defenses of our country. These expenditures not only aid in the defense of the country, but are an asset to it. I am sure you will appreciate what I am trying to say. Boondoggling and pork barreling expenditures must be completely stopped.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK D. BIANCO.

Civilian Defense Too Long Delayed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the preparation for civilian defense on the Federal level in the United States has been neglected and postponed too long. Our defense of the civil population should have been prepared long ago even if the Korean war had not occurred in view of the knowledge we already have of the tremendous destructive possibilities of the atom and hydrogen bomb. The neglect of adequate civilian defense is only another indication of the inefficiency and lack of foresight by the administration.

No longer can we afford to delay effective measures which will result in a maximum protection for the civil population if this Nation is attacked. We know that in the event of any future war we must expect attacks upon our centers of population, and we must have adequate shelters and centralized supply stations for first aid and medical treatment.

We need a coordinated Nation-wide defense plan which will utilize all of our facilities for civil defense. We also must carry on specialized research to develop new and more effective methods of protection for our citizens from the effects of regular bombing attack as well as attack by atomic weapons.

Unless measures are taken immediately to build up with all possible speed the civilian defenses of America, if war should strike our unpreparedness would be paid for in the lives of countless men, women and children, helpless victims to the inexcusable indifference of the administration.

I have introduced H. R. 9485 to authorize the Secretary of Defense to establish and conduct an effective program of research and development to increase the effectiveness of the measures for the protection of the civil population of the United States in the event of military attack. This bill, if approved by the Congress, would place the civil-defense plan on the Federal level and would provide for the necessary scientific research and development of more effective methods for defense.

It would further establish within the Department of Defense a central agency which would be directly responsible for civilian defense.

Through the central agency standards to guide public officers of the United States who are charged with the responsibility for the planning, organization and administration of civil defense in the selection of appropriate measures, methods, techniques, and equipment would be developed.

The central agency would disseminate such information and standards to those in charge of civil defense and would assist them in the effective and economical discharge of their duties.

The central agency would also assist in planning with officers of the several States and Territories for appropriate methods, techniques, equipment, and organization for civil defense.

The following are the provisions of H. R. 9485 which, in my opinion, should receive consideration without further delay for the protection of the lives of American men, women, and children who today have no adequate defense against the horrors of modern war:

A bill to authorize the Secretary of Defense to establish and conduct an effective program of research and development to increase the effectiveness of the measures for the protection of the civil population of the United States in the event of military attack, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the National Civilian Defense Act. It is the purpose of this act to provide for the establishment within the Department of Defense of a central agency directly responsible for (a) the initiation, conduct, and coordination of such scientific and other research and development as may be necessary for the identification, study, and solution of the problems incident to the protection of the civil population of the United States in time of hostilities; (b) the collection and analysis of all information necessary for the preparation of sound solutions to such problems; (c) the preparation of standards to guide public officers of the United States who are charged with responsibility for the planning, organization, and administration of civil defense in the selection of appropriate measures, methods, techniques, and equipment; and (d) the dissemination of such information and standards to such officers to assist them in the effective and economical discharge of their duties and for their use in planning with officers of the several States and Territories appropriate methods, techniques, equipment, and organization for civil defense.

SEC 2. (a) The Secretary of Defense, acting through the Research and Development Board of the Department of Defense, is authorized and directed to initiate and conduct an adequate and effective program of scientific and other research and development for the identification, study, and solution of all problems arising in connection with the protection of the civil population of the United States in time of hostilities. Such program shall include—

(1) technical research and development required with respect to rescue methods and equipment; fire-fighting methods and equipment; first aid for casualties; evacuation and postaid care of personnel; shelter design and materials for protective construction; protective masks and clothing; methods and materiel specific to the protection of personnel and facilities of industrial plants; and such other technical research as may give promise of minimizing the effects of modern warfare upon the civil population;

(2) operational research with respect to the effects of the employment of new and improved weapons upon civilian communities; the identification of probable target areas to provide a basis for local planning; and such other operational research as may be required to obtain information necessary for increased effectiveness in the selection and training of volunteer civil-defense personnel and for a better understanding of methods which can be employed to prevent panic and to sustain civilian morale in time of emergency; and

(3) such other research and development as may be required for the development of techniques and procedures necessary for the effective protection and relief of the civil population in time of hostilities.

(b) Upon the basis of information assembled and analyzed pursuant to this section, the Secretary, acting through the Board, shall prepare and make available to public officers of the United States who are responsible for the planning, organization, and administration of civil defense such information and standards as may assist them to discharge such responsibilities with maximum effectiveness and economy and be of value for their use in planning with officers of the several States and Territories appropriate methods, techniques, equipment, and organization for civil defense.

SEC. 3. (a) To promote the effectiveness of all research conducted pursuant to this act, the Secretary shall take such action as may be required (1) to obtain the coordinated and continuous service of such technicians, natural and social scientists, and representatives of other professions capable of making essential contributions in the solution of the problems incident to civil defense, and (2) to insure that activity in civil-defense research and development pursuant to this act will be the major responsibility of each person selected for such service.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary is authorized and directed to—

(1) detail for service pursuant to this act, for such periods as he shall deem necessary, such number of persons on active duty in any of the Armed Forces of the United States as he shall deem necessary, but not more than 50 such persons shall be so detailed at any time;

(2) relieve from active duty, or prohibit the ordering into active duty, in the Armed Forces of the United States of any member of any Reserve component of any such force whose service is determined by the Secretary to be required in any civilian capacity pursuant to this act, but not more than 50 persons shall be relieved from active duty or retained in civilian status at any time pursuant to this paragraph:

(3) to employ the services of any civilian employee of the Department of Defense, and, with the consent of the head of any other department or agency of the executive branch of the Government, the services of any employee of any such other department or agency;

(4) to obtain, with or without compensation, the services of such part-time advisory personnel as he shall deem necessary to carry out his duties under this act. Persons appointed for such service may receive such compensation as the Secretary shall prescribe, and shall be entitled to reimbursement for actual and necessary expenses incurred by them for travel incident to the performance of their duties under this act, or to a mileage allowance and a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence, as determined by the Secretary, for all such travel performed by them; and

(5) to obtain by contract the services of any individual, firm, organization, or educational institution required for the performance of the duties imposed upon the Secretary by this act.

(c) In carrying out his duties under this act, the Secretary shall—

(1) to the greatest practicable extent employ personnel, equipment, space, and facilities available to the Department of Defense for military research and development; and

(2) to the extent that research and development for the solution of civil defense problems are not identical with, or logical extensions of, any program for military research and development, procure such supplemental personnel, equipment, space, and facilities as he shall determine to be necessary.

SEC. 4. There are hereby authorized to be expended by the Department of Defense, at the direction of the President, out of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made to such Department or to the Executive Office of the President, such sums, not to exceed $10,000,000 in the aggregate, to be available for obligation or disbursement during the three fiscal years beginning July 1, 1950, as may be required for the performance of the duties imposed by this act: Provided, That no funds allocated pursuant to this act shall be employed for any purpose described in paragraph (1) of section 5 (c) of this act.

Politics Versus Statesmanship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAT SUTTON
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from one of the local newspapers, entitled "Politics Versus Statesmanship."

In view of the extreme necessity to materially reduce nondefense spending, I am of the opinion that the following editorial is most timely and should be thoroughly analyzed and favorably considered. The editorial follows:

POLITICS VERSUS STATESMANSHIP

Chairman MURRAY, of the House Post Office Committee, used appropriately strong language to describe the bill through which the House hopes to cancel Postmaster General Donaldson's wise and reasonable economy program. An outrageous concession to political expediency was the estimate of the measure made by Mr. MURRAY, a Democrat from Tennessee. He was not speaking without facts. He must have made some Members squirm when he told the House that many of his colleagues frankly had admitted they secretly favored the mail-service curtailment order but felt it would be politically dangerous to say so openly. They were thinking of next November and the threat of opposition from powerful postal employee groups.

During the debate a supporter of the bill asserted that 50,000,000 tired taxpayers have been hit in the mail box by Mr Donaldson's reduction in mail service. These same taxpayers, however, have been hit in the pocketbook by the House's overwhelming vote against the savings planned by the Postmaster General. The Post Office Department has been running up half-billion-dollar deficits each year. These deficits are being paid out of taxes. When Congress refused to increase postal rates to cut this year's deficit and, on top of that, cut the postal rock-bottom budget below what Mr. Donaldson believed to be the operational minimum, the Postmaster General ordered mail deliveries reduced from two to one a day. He estimated this would save the Department up to $70,000,000 a year. No great hardship has been inflicted on the American people by the delivery curtailment. More than 85 percent of the mail was handled on the morning delivery, anyway, so that elimination of the second round has had relatively little effect on mail service. The probability is that most tired taxpayers would prefer the $70,000,000 savings to an extra mail delivery that is not essential.

The House majority that voted for the bill muffed an excellent chance to show real statesmanship at a critical time, when the need for reduction of nondefense spending is extremely acute. The opportunity now passes to the Senate, whose Post Office Committee already has endorsed the cancellation measure. If the Senate, too, should succumb to political expediency, President Truman would be justified in vetoing the legislation, which is wholly without merit.

Takes Time To Build Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a carefully prepared and informative article written by Lester Allen and appearing in the Boston Post of August 20, 1950:

TAKES TIME TO BUILD FORCES—UNITED STATES IS NOW FURTHER AHEAD THAN IT WAS AT START OF LAST WAR—HAS SOME FACILITIES READY

(By Lester Allen)

Amid the snap and crackle of political partisans seeking to place the blame for the deteriorated state of the Nation's defenses, required reading today should be the National Military Establishment bill enacted by the Eightieth Congress, the composition of which is important in determining who is blameworthy.

In that bill the common mission of the Armed Forces was set forth in plain language, specifically directed by Congress. Individual citizens can determine whether the directive of the Eightieth Congress was obeyed, who flouted the expressed will of the people, and why the will of the people was not obeyed.

PLAIN LANGUAGE

Here is the language of the bill: "The common missions of the Armed Forces are: To support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic; to maintain, by timely and effective military action, the security of the United States, its possessions and areas vital to its interest; to uphold and advance the national policies and interests of the United States; to safeguard the internal security of the United States as directed by higher authority; to conduct integrated operations on the land, on the sea, and in the air necessary for these purposes."

The bill was signed into law by President Truman, July 26, 1947—but it is important to see what had happened by then to the Army, the Navy, and Air Force. They were being peeled down to the bone, and were quarreling over the bone.

In 3 years the bone has been so thoroughly gnawed that there is very little marrow left in it. This is no guesswork. The figures can speak for themselves. In 1947 the United States had a scheduled strength of 1,070,000 in the Army. The Soviet Union had 4,100,000. The United States Navy had 729 ships in commission, a fraction of its tonnage, and a scheduled strength of 670,000, including the marines. The Soviet Union had 300 ships and 487,000 men. The United States Air Force had a scheduled strength of 475,000 men and 5,500 to 7,000 operating military aircraft. The Soviet Air Force had 37,000 planes and 700,000 men.

Only 2 years before that the United States had an Army at peak strength of 8,291,336 and over 65 percent of those were deployed overseas. In less than a year this magnificent army had shrunk to less than 1,600,000 and its used equipment was being scattered to the four winds, hawked for sale as surplus and dumped to rust out in jungles and dock areas.

DIDN'T KNOW

Now, all this dispersion of military strength was not accomplished against the will of the American people. They had fought a victorious war—or so they thought. They saw no need for maintaining immense armaments because they could not know, any more than the so-called higher authority could know, that within 5 years there would be a frantic scramble to reassemble those finely trained and resolutely disciplined fighting organizations.

The second guessers and Monday morning quarterbacks can scream vituperation and make accusations, but the plain truth is that the American people believed they were completely victorious, and all the treatment of the armed services thereafter was tinged with their reluctance to maintain huge standing fighting forces or to take the bullying position of coercing weaker nations by a show of armed strength.

The common missions of the Armed Forces must now be carried out and it will be infinitely more difficult because armies, air forces, and fleets are not created overnight. It will be at least a year before anything that faintly resembles an integrated fighting force capable of dealing with even a modest conflict can be welded together.

Most common is an odd delusion that persists among a vast majority of people that by a stroke of the pen President Truman can cause armed legions to spring out of the ground and advance upon the enemy. Why not call up the National Guard? Why not call up the Reserve divisions? Why not take the fleet out of mothballs? Why not call the Air Force reservists back on the job and get the planes flying? The fact is that such a project must be taken a step at a time.

Call up National Guard and Reserve divisions today and there would not be adequate shelter for them, supply problems would leave the armies, squadrons, and fleets starving and without ammunition or equipment. Step by step these things have to be done so that each step dovetails in the footprint of the last step. These are not Minute Men dashing up gun in hand to take a position behind a stone wall—more's the pity.

TAKES TIME

Even basic training—once accomplished in about 13 weeks—now requires twice as long. A reserve pilot faced with a new jet plane of a type he had never flown would be about as much at home in the cockpit of such an aircraft as a man from Mars. To teach an infantryman to fire one of the new recoilless field weapons with any degree of accuracy requires weeks and weeks of intensive drilling—even if there were enough recoilless guns and enough ammunition, which there aren't.

Where would the Navy find enough trained men to handle guided missiles if we had enough and if there were guided missile ships enough? The best estimate of time required to train a crew of men to handle a guided missile is about 8 months.

The handful of men fighting the United Nations' fight in Korea are stalling for time—a few weeks in which reserves can be brought into position to bolster a beachhead—and most strategists feel we will be fortunate if we can hold even a beachhead in Korea.

All in the picture is not as dark as this may make it seem. Fate smiled upon the United States when the Soviet Union made the overt move in Korea. The sudden lightning flash illumined the problem facing the American people as the chief bulwark of the democracies. If 10 years had passed since the end of hostilities on VJ-day a lot of priceless skills would have been lost to the Nation.

As it is, a tremendous backlog of trained men are waiting in civilian life today for a call to apply their knowledge to the Nation's grave need. World War II taught a lot to the United States about mobilization, procurement, research, supply, transport, and all the other basic needs for giving power to a fighting force. Trial and error need not hamper the effort.

TO BE FASTER

A pitifully few harassed senior officers of the Army, Navy, and Air Force nagged, cajoled, and threatened enough money to keep industry interested in developing weapons and keeping posted on industrial mobilization. Cadres of men capable to being expanded into fighting units were kept together by extraordinary efforts. The first 600,000 will be taught more rapidly than the first 600,000 were in 1940.

There are stand-by plants for war production in many critical fields—tanks, guns, ammunition, synthetic rubber, chemicals—and while much of the labor force that manned the plants has been reshuffled into new jobs, it will not take as long to get the plants running full blast as it did in 1941 when the plants had to be built and workers trained.

Many GI's who served in Germany recall with what astonishment the Germans learned that the United States and Britain did not plan to sweep right on across Europe and route the exhausted Red armies before they had a chance to get their breath. At the time the GI's thought it a most monstrous villiany, proof of the depraved militarism of the German people. In the light of the developments of the past 5 years it now appears that the Germans were political realists who faced a necessity, however repugnant it might seem.

Knowing what we do today, there would still be some doubt whether such a course would have been followed. But that is vain speculation and has no part in the job that must be done today. The first requisite of the big task is patience—and patience is difficult when American men are sacrificing their lives, desperate for immediate assistance.

USELESS TO PONDER

The monumental task will be completed quicker, however, and we make haste slowly, as some master of garbled aphorism said. Thousands of families are frantic with anxiety over sons in Korea and they are impatient for immediate complete mobilization. It is sad but true that immediate full mobilization wouldn't get reinforcements there faster, but probably would foul up all the carefully considered plans and make the loss of a beachhead in Korea almost certain.

If we hadn't been in such a tearing rush to get back to normalcy—a normalcy that could never again bring back the "good old days"—we wouldn't be in the mess we are in today, but, again, it is useless to ponder on what might have been.

Politicians who seek to make political capital of the failure to maintain the Armed Forces at full strength should look back over their shoulders at the Eightieth Congress and remember that it wrote a bill that was bipartisan to plan the Nation's defense.

It is to be hoped that the objectives on a political and international level are made clear to all who must do the fighting, and that men old enough and intelligent enough to go out and fight the Nation's battles aren't slathered with gooey bunk about fighting so that they can get back home for a piece of mother's blueberry pie.

There was too much of that kind of morale building in World War II and too little discussion with grown men soldiering about the realities.

Turkey Price Ceilings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL F. WHITE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, a distinguished citizen of the congressional district which I represent, Mr. Arlo Turner, of Modesto, Calif., has prepared for me a memorandum in regard to turkey price ceilings which I feel will be of immense interest to every Member of Congress in whose district turkeys are raised.

Mr. Turner finances the raising of a very large number of turkeys and is recognized nationally as one of the country's foremost authorities on turkey raising and marketing.

The memorandum is printed below:

MEMORANDUM PREPARED BY ARLO V. TURNER FOR CONGRESSMAN CECIL WHITE

SUBJECT: TURKEY CEILINGS

If turkey ceilings have to come, whether we want them or not, what does the turkey industry need, and what is fair.

Expecting that the Defense Act will empower the President to appoint agencies to fix ceilings when and if necessary and that, if established, the Department of Agriculture will consult the Poultry Branch and ask either it or some other agency to draw up regulations and fix prices. I have been endeavoring to obtain the ideas of folks in turkey production and others who are in close touch with turkey producers across the Nation.

This memorandum will discuss only the ceiling which should be established for turkeys, live-weight, at the farm, which move through commercial processing and distribution channels. Those producers near large population centers who prepare and retail their own birds can be protected as processors or retailers and should not be limited to the ceiling established in commercial production. Neither should their costs or expenses be used in determining what is a fair maximum price to producers for commercial distribution.

Let us not forget that ceilings are a maximum beyond which a profit is unreasonable. We are not discussing supports, or markets. We are only discussing the limit beyond which a producer of turkeys cannot go in selling them into commercial channels. He will have good years and bad years. His ceiling should be higher than a fair average price, because he will not obtain a fair price each year.

HISTORICAL

In 1945, the ceiling live-weight for turkeys was 33.6 cents. Parity ratio was 170. Parity was 24.6 cents. At the end of OPA the turkey ceiling was 135 percent plus, of parity. At that time, turkey producers were not receiving a profit on their investment and operation equal to that received by producers of many other specialty crops.

PARITY

Parity is an index obtained by adding the cost of the things a farmer buys, a selected, constant list of commodities, to obtain a parity ratio, which in 1909–1914 was 100 percent. The last ratio published by BAE was 256 percent. In 1909–14, turkeys were not an article of commerce. They were a pin money crop sold in nearby population centers. The only market quotations available to BAE in computing a base period parity for turkeys were quotations during October, November, December and January on the New York and Philadelphia markets during those five years, and in some of those twenty months quotations were not available from those markets. Those sketchy figures produced a base parity for turkeys of 14.4 cents per pound, live-weight, farm. Multiplying 14.4 cents the base period parity established for turkeys, by 256 reflects a parity of 36.86 cents per pound. The BAE's official parity for turkeys for last month is 36.9 cents per pound.

Some farm commodities were not, in 1914, but became free-moving articles of commerce later, such as soybeans. BAE worked out a base parity for those commodities, endeavoring to reflect their cost of production in true relation to the cost of production of other old-time crops. If that were done for turkeys the base parity would be higher than 14.4 cents. With a parity ratio of 256, each 1-cent-per-pound increase in the base parity would mean 2.56 cents per pound in true parity, or 51.2 cents per bird.

I have been informed by economists who have computed the difference for me that if turkey parity were figured like soybeans the base increase would be 2.8 cents per pound, which would add, at today's parity ratio, approximately 7¼ cents per pound to current parity.

Every time a discussion of prices arises in the trade or Government, in connection with supports, ceilings, etc., we have this stumbling block to overcome in the minds of Congressmen who cannot be expected to be familiar with all farm commodities. It is usually presumed that parity for turkeys reflects a true price relationship to parity for things like wheat, corn, soybeans, etc. Since it appears that we may have 5, 10, or more years of semiwar or war economy, it is important that BAE establish, as they did with soybeans, a fair base parity for turkeys.

COST OF PRODUCTION

A commercial producer of turkeys can do most of the labor, growing 5,000 birds. Estimates across the Nation indicate that commercial production requires an investment cost per bird of $5 to $7 for a farm with an ordinary five-room dwelling, a brooder house, range, equipment, vehicles, etc., a total investment of $25,000 to $35,000. The equipment has a short life and soon becomes competitively obsolete. The brooder house should be depreciated rapidly. To investment cost carrying charge, depreciation, etc., must be added feed, poult, fuel, litter, electricity, mortality, and other operation costs.

In figuring parity only 10.1 percent weighted average is allowed for feed. Of the costs in producing turkey meat, feed (for parents and the market bird) represents about 75 percent of cost of production. Suppose 10 commodities were used in determining the parity ratio, each of which, in 1909–14, cost 10 cents, one of them feed. Suppose that today the other nine cost 20 cents each and feed 30 cents. In that case parity for turkeys would be much less than cost of production. The facts are not quite as bad as that would be, but price-supported turkey-feed ingredients are so high, relatively, that turkey parity is not in fair relation to costs. Nor does it even approximate what it should be to give the same net return to producers as does parity for corn, wheat, potatoes, soybeans, etc.

If interest on the investment, taxes, insurance, maintenance, and depreciation, plus factory wages, are added to operating costs of production, commercial turkey production has been estimated by turkey men across the Nation, within the last 30 days, at between 32½ and 36 cents per pound. My guess is about 34½ cents per pound. A number of Government people have asked me why folks go on raising turkeys if they didn't make money last year. That's their chosen business, their life work, their trade. They have a heavy investment. Most of them will not quit until they are broke. They can't quit.

AREA CEILINGS

Some turkeys in large population centers bring a higher price than those in commercial production. For instance, New Jersey producers, surrounded by large population centers, received last year at least $2 per bird more for the few turkeys they raised than those produced in Oregon.

Some national distributors of turkeys make contracts with large retail outlets and chainstores, to supply the turkeys needed by those retail outlets, less freight differential, priced at the New York market on the date of delivery of each shipment. Consequently, in commercial turkey distribution, turkey buyers endeavor to base paying prices on the New York market, less freight, and national distributors endeavor to buy their turkeys where they can buy them on the New York market, less processing, freight, and a profit.

Some people in Government and the trade feel very strongly that turkey ceilings should be different in one area than in another, and that the ceiling on the Pacific coast should be lower than that on the east coast. Checking across the Nation, I find the cost of producing a pound of turkey meat about the same in all commercial production districts.

The California Turkey Federation has a committee which, since January, has stimulated sales of turkeys in California, has spent approximately $20,000 and has done an excellent job. This committee has just been enlarged, is endeavoring to raise an additional $100,000, of which approximately $75,000 is assured. Their intention is to endeavor to make turkeys, whole or cut up, available in all of the butcher shops in the State. If they succeed, California people will eat its turkey crop. I am sure the people of the Pacific coast, in fact everyone west of the Mississippi, who produce turkeys for commercial channels, will feel that the price they are allowed to charge for their birds should not be less than a producer on the east coast is allowed to charge for his. If California or any other area is unable to consume all of its turkeys, the surplus will have to move to another area and, if it does, it will have to sell under the destination area ceiling enough to cover the cost of transportation to destination. We are discussing the limit which a producer should be allowed to charge for his product, and an unfair price in any area is identical with an unfair price to the producer, at the same cost, anywhere in the United States. Live turkey farm ceilings should be equal everywhere in the Nation.

In 1938, I produced 11,000 turkeys. Since then, the company, of which I am president, has financed production of over 9,000,000, supervised production and computed costs of production on every flock. I think I know what it cost to produce turkeys. The checks for those 9,000,000 turkeys were issued in our offices, after deduction of most of the operation costs, usually including poult cost. Continued, efficient turkey production requires, in good years, more than wages plus a small profit, if production facilities are to be maintained and new ones built as consumption requires them. A ceiling should be high enough to return a man his total production cost plus enough profit to keep an efficient producer in business, plus enough in good years to return his losses in poor years. Poor years occur approximately one in three.

Ceilings for processors, retailers and distributors are not commented on herein because honest, reliable, and informed local and national distributors are the people who should supply that information to Congress and the agency appointed to determine those mark-ups.

BUREAU OF AGRICULTURE ECONOMICS

No one questions the care with which these men endeavor to compute cost, crops, markets, and so forth. However, they have not had sufficient funds to obtain, therefore have not had complete factual information about commercial turkey production. Much of their information comes from State agencies which do not have the funds to thoroughly survey and classify. For instance, because of lack of funds, BAE does not always secure prices received by turkey producers who sell their birds through retail channels as against those who sell them in the general commercial market. Their figures, based on the only information they have, reflect prices received by producers, in certain areas in the United States, which no large processor or distributor could afford to pay and remain solvent.

The costs of field surveys to collect such information would be small. The bulk of the turkeys which move in commercial channels are processed by relatively few concerns and individuals, are financed by a very limited number of concerns. The turkey industry needs this information not now available to BAE, because BAE is looked to by the Department of Agriculture, by Production and Marketing Administration, and the trade, for facts which they do not have money enough to obtain.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTUR:

Personnel of the Poultry Branch of the Department of Agriculture fortunately includes a number of career men who are conversant with the problems of the turkey industry in all its branches. Higher administrative officials in Production and Marketing Administration are producer-minded and, if given an opportunity to do so, both the branch and the higher officials can, and I am sure would, competently review costs throughout the industry, consult with informed people, and work out a ceiling program for the turkey industry, if it becomes necessary, which is fair to the producer and which will provide turkeys for the consumer at a reasonable price.

Since you asked me to furnish further information, I have been in contact with people from coast to coast who know turkey production, leaders in the industry, men whom I trust and who know the turkey producers' problems and costs. I have wanted to be sure that this summary would be reliable for your use in presenting the turkey man's problems, to which you have so assiduously and intelligently given your attention in Congress.

I believe, Cecil, that you can take these statements at par, with complete assurance that, if you convey them to your many friends in Congress, you and they will find them reliable. I have done my best in the 2 weeks available, to bring them up to date and check their accuracy.

Respectfully,

ARLO V. TURNER.

Ninety Percent Farm Parity Will Prevent a Depression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, our most important domestic problem in the United States is to maintain a sound, workable farm program. Agriculture is the foundation upon which the economy of our Nation rests. If you wreck the foundation of a building, it will crash to the ground. If you wreck the foundation of the economy of our country, which is agriculture, you cannot escape wrecking the economy of the Nation.

In fact, upon the foundation of agriculture rests full employment, business activity, the success of industry, the future prosperity of the Nation in the years ahead, and the size of the national income.

I do not claim to know all the answers to the problem of agriculture. I have made some study of it since helping to organize the first farm bureau in Marion County 34 years ago, of which I am still a member. From that time to this, as a newspaper publisher and having owned and operated farms, I devoted quite a bit of study through my lifetime to agriculture in an effort to keep abreast with soil conservation improvement and its general problems. For the past 7 years in Congress, I have studied the problem more intensely than ever before and have come to the following definite conclusions.

I am firmly convinced that a sound and prosperous agriculture will continue prosperity and full employment for labor, prosperity for manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and business generally.

I am convinced a prosperous agriculture will insure us against another depression in the future, if the Government in Washington will make a real effort to economize and reduce governmental expense.

Many commentators and newspaper writers who know little of the relation of agriculture to the economy of our Nation, write much about the farmers being subsidized. In fact, they have found it easy to criticize farm legislation and try to blame the farmer for the high cost of living. They do not point out the difference between what the farmer gets and the amount the consumer pays.

Of course, some mistakes have been made in administering the farm program. However, in considering the whole problem, the Congress has been right in protecting the interest of the farmers with a floor or support price of around 90 percent of parity, which has helped to continue prosperity for all of the people. I think potatoes and some other highly perishable vegetables should not have the benefit of any support prices.

WHAT FARMERS THINK

Mr. Speaker, the American farmers are well posted on our agricultural problems. Their combined judgment is helpful as a guide to the facts.

In order to get the benefit of their judgment, I wrote a letter to 10 of the most successful farmers in a number of townships in various counties, asking whether they would prefer retaining our present farm-parity law, or whether they would prefer the Brannan plan. I was pleased to learn that out of 528 replies, 500 favored retaining the present law, and only 28 favored changing to the Brannan plan.

I have learned to have a good deal of confidence in the collective judgment of experienced farmers who throughout the years, by using their brain and muscle, have made a success of farming.

THE BRANNAN PLAN

I am convinced that the Brannan plan is too expensive, too difficult to administer; would regiment, control, and penalize the farmer and wreck agriculture.

THE PRESENT PLAN

Mr. Speaker, the present Agricultural Act under which, with little change, we have been operating for several years, is the result of over 20 years of study, research, and thinking of the ablest men in agriculture of the Nation. It has had searching study by the ablest Members of the Congress as well from every conceivable source that would throw light on the farm problem.

Our present farm program has the support of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and 18 other farm organizations. The facts show it has worked exceedingly well.

An overwhelming number of the Members of Congress who have studied the results and improved the law under its application by trial and error, along with a great majority of the grass-root farmers, agree that we should continue the parity policy of a floor under farm products and build our future farm program on the present law, making such changes as time proves necessary.

You hear much criticism of the billions of dollars Congress has voted to support farm prices. These billions were responsible for the continued prosperity we have had since the farm program became operative, and have not been lost.

LOANS AND RESALE PROFITS

Mr. Speaker, let me give you the amazing facts which show how little the Government has really lost. On loans and purchasing of surplus farm products to the extent of over $8,000,000,000 by the Government during the past 17 years, the balance sheet furnished me by the Government up to April 30, 1950, shows a total net loss of only $212,858,871.

You will say, "That can't be right; we lost more than that on potatoes and eggs last year." That is true, and bad administration caused most of the loss; but on the purchases made on wheat, tobacco, oats, corn, rice, flax, and cotton which amounts to over 85 percent of total loans, the Government made on these enough profit to bring the total net loss down to the above figure. This administration gave Greece five times that much.

If these prices had not been supported, farm income would have dropped, national income would have dropped, business would have dropped, millions of men would have been out of work, a depression would have followed and the Government would have lost billions of dollars in income.

The best investment the Government has made in 20 years was the billions authorized by Congress and handled through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

ONE DOLLAR MAKES $6 MORE

It has been determined, after years of research and study, that every dollar's worth of income produced and sold off of the farm generates or adds $6 more to the income of our country. Let me illustrate:

One dollar's worth of wheat, oats, or fruit sold by the farmer is transported by rail or truck to processing plants, and by the time it makes the rounds through transportation and the processing plants, and comes back to the consumer in bread, wheaties, instant oats, or canned fruit, in this cycle of distribution that dollar has generated an additional $6 of income.

One dollar's worth of cotton produced by the southern farmer, by the time it goes through a cotton gin, to the weavers, and comes back to the merchant's shelf, and is sold in clothing, has produced an average of $6 more.

The same is true of livestock, and all other farm products. Thus, you see that the total income of the farmer is the gear wheel that controls the total national income of the Nation. If the income of the farmer is low, the national income of the Nation is low, the production of our manufacturing plants is low, and millions of men are out of work.

The following table of figures will best prove these facts. By a study of this table you will note that the total national income of the Nation will average about seven times the gross farm income. Where there is a discrepancy, it is caused by the lag of several months, but in the main the 20-year average proves that every dollar of gross farm income generates about six other dollars in the economy of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, practically all of the new wealth of our Nation comes from farm products and minerals out of the earth. They add the new wealth to the economic blood stream of the economy of the country.

You will remember that 1929 was the last prosperous year before the depression. You will note, reading from the following table, that when farm income went down, national income went down. You will note that the gross farm income reached its low point in 1932, while the national income reached its low point a year later in 1933. This lag results from the time required to carry products of the farm to the ultimate consumer.

Farm production and national income

[These statistics furnished by U. S. Department of Agriculture]

Year	Gross farm income	National income
1929	$13,000,000,000	$87,300,000,000
1930	10,500,000,000	75,000,000,000
1931	7,600,000,000	58,800,000,000
1932	5,700,000,000	41,700,000,000
1933	6,400,000,000	39,600,000,000
1934	7,800,000,000	48,000,000,000
1935	9,000,000,000	56,800,000,000
1936	10,000,000,000	66,900,000,000
1937	10,600,000,000	73,600,000,000
1938	9,400,000,000	67,500,000,000
1939	9,900,000,000	72,500,000,000
Average 1930-39: $8,600,000,000×7=$60,000,000,000
1940	$10,300,000,000	$81,300,000,000
1941	13,100,00,000	103,800,000,000
1942	17,700,000,000	136,400,000,000
1943	23,000,000,000	168,200,000,000
1944	23,600,000,000	182,200,000,000
1945	24,000,000,000	182,800,000,000
1946	27,100,000,000	178,300,000,000
1947	33,000,000,000	202,500,000,000
1948	32,500,000,000	226,500,000,000
1949	30,500,000,000	221,000,000,000

You will note for the first 10 years from 1930 to 1939, gross farm income averaged $8,600,000,000 a year. This multiplied by 7 gives approximately $60,000,000,000 annual national income.

Taking the second 10 years, from 1940 to 1949, by adding total gross farm income figures you get $234,800,000,000. This multiplied by 7 gives a national income of $1,643,600,000,000 which proves that each farm dollar generates $6 more in national income.

Due to the lag from one year to the other, as farm crops go on the market, you will find that if you multiply each year by 7 the national income will be up or down a little, but when you multiply the yearly average for the first 10 years, $8,600,000,000 by 7 you get almost $60,000,000,000 annual income. If you multiply each year of the second 10 years shown on the chart you have the same up and down ratio due to the lag of marketing crops. But when you add the left column of gross farm income and multiply the total by 7 you get very near, in the right-hand column, 7 times the gross farm income.

The small difference in gross national income to farm income shown in the second 10-year chart is due to farm prices being held down by OFA controls and consumer subsidies paid during the war era. Even with that the total national income over the 10-year period balances out almost seven times gross farm income.

You will note in 1929 we had farm prices that brought a national income of $87,300,000,000. That was a year of great prosperity with full employment.

As farm prices continued to drop due to the depression the national income dropped in proportion. In the 10 years from 1929 to 1939, handling about the same percentage of farm production, but because of low farm prices, instead of generating $87,300,000,000 a year as we did in 1929, we generated an average of only $60,000,000,000 a year for that 10-year period.

As a result, in the 10-year period from 1929 to 1939, we lost $27,300,000,000 a year, or a total of $273,000,000,000 in that 10-year period.

It was the loss of this income which made it impossible for us to exchange our goods, rather than any surplus of farm products.

During these 10 years you will remember that we had 12,000,000 men in 1933 out of work. You will remember we established the WPA and spent some $25,000,000,000, which was added to the national debt in priming the pump to try to defeat the depression.

Mr. Speaker, the facts are, had we been operating under the farm program in 1929, which we now have, the depression could not have happened, and we would not have lost approximately $27,000,000,000 a year in national income, or $270,000,000,000 during that 10 years.

We are worrying about our national debt of $260,000,000,000. We lost just about that in national income during the 10 years from 1929 to 1939, as I have shown you by the table, because of low farm income which forced a low national income.

Assume we now remove farm price supports, and our gross farm income drops back, and our national income drops back to the 1939 level of $72,500,000,000—or, in other words, if we drop back to 1939 price levels, our income will be one-third of what it is at present. What will happen to our bonds, employment, business, and where will we get the over $40,000,000,000 in taxes with which to run the Government this year, or in the future.

These figures are authentic and are taken from Government statistics in Washington. If you will study and restudy this table, and note the explanation I have tried to make clear, I think you will agree with me that we must support farm prices at a level high enough so our annual income will pay the cost of operating our Nation on a solvent basis, and begin to retire the national debt.

Yes, we had better keep the present farm program, improve it, and keep prosperity for everyone.

Strengthening the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to the editor of the Indianapolis Star written by Mrs. Walton G. Wilson, United Nations chairman of the League of Women Voters of Indianapolis:

LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF INDIANAPOLIS,
Indianapolis, Ind., August 14, 1950.

To the EDITOR OF THE INDIANAPOLIS STAR:

Public interest in the United Nations seems to be quite aroused at present.

The League of Women Voters is committed to the policy of strengthening the United Nations by developing its effectiveness under the present Charter. The UN study committee of the league recognizes that the Charter has provisions within it for correcting its weaknesses without altering its structure or essential usefulness. It is for that reason that we inform ourselves about the workings of the various commissions and branches other than the Security Council. The committee considers it a public service at this time to make our findings available to the community.

We are aware of the dangers of totalitarian rule wherever it presents itself or under what guise. When we support the commissions in the UN which are aimed at assisting the backward peoples to achieve independence and dignity, we believe we are doing it in the spirit of the American tradition. Such activities as the FAO, ILO, etc., are free of the taint of imperialism since their services are rendered where needed on behalf of member nations. By taking advantage of the opportunity offered under the Charter for them to use their experience of freedom in backing these commissions the democracies could, we believe, counteract the appeal of totalitarian regimes.

Most informed observers advise that Asia suspects any large power, including Russia, of imperialistic intentions when such powers undertake any large-scale unilateral action. Senator ROBERT TAFT addressing the Republican editors of Ohio last week showed his awareness of the situation in the Orient when he told them the United Nations would have to make the peace terms when the military operations in Korea came to an end. The United States is committed before the world legally, politically, and militarily to the United Nations. It seems like dangerous trifling to subject United Nations officials and representatives to serious charges without supporting evidence which would stand up in court.

The United Nations study group of the League of Women Voters has stated what procedures we are for on a rather broad front. We do not share the belief that friendly governments have left us holding the sack or that we can assume an isolated position in the world solely on the basis of what we are against.

If we are to coexist in the atomic age with nations and peoples whose concepts of peace, freedom and democracy differ radically from our own, we need to carry our eggs in more than one basket. The League of Women Voters considers a study of the available facts about these people and the structure and functions of the UN as much of a duty as voting in the elections. Mr. Malik has chosen propaganda as his weapon and the United Nations as the arena with the whole world as his audience. The people of the United States need to know the truth and see that Mr. Malik and the nations are confronted with it.

Respectfully yours,
Mrs. WALTON G. WILSON,
United Nations Chairman of the League of Women Voters of Indianapolis.

Conveyances for Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion some hours ago sent two circular letters to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS], chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Veterans' Administration.

The letters are as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1950.

Hon. JOHN PHILLIPS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PHILLIPS: There is now pending before your subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations House Joint Resolution 473, introduced by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts, the purpose of which is to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to continue providing automobiles and other conveyances for certain disabled veterans and to provide funds therefor.

For your ready reference, I enclose copy of Resolution No. 85, adopted at the Miami, 1948, National Convention of the American Legion, which is self-explanatory.

As I understand the situation, under legislation now in effect, these benefits were to expire on June 30, 1950, but unfortunately the funds allocated thereto were exhausted on or about April 30, 1950. As you know, there still are hundreds of disabled veterans in hospitals as result of their wartime service, and in addition thereto, there are also hundreds of cases of veterans whose claims have not as yet been adjudicated in order to determine their entitlement to an automobile or other conveyance of the type in question. Actually, there are numerous cases in which the veteran's entitlement has been established but unfortunately, due to the lack of funds, they have been unable to avail themselves of the benefits intended by this legislation.

Hundreds of these men will not be discharged from their respective hospitals until after July 1, 1950, and as you can well appreciate, until they shall have been discharged and their claims adjudicated, they are not in position to apply, through channels, for these automobiles, etc.

In other words, we respectfully submit that a veteran should not be denied the opportunity to obtain an automobile or other conveyance due to the fact that he was not fortunate enough to be discharged or have his entitlement established prior to either June 30, 1950 (the date of expiration of the current legislation), or prior to April 30, 1950 (the date on which we understand the fund became exhausted).

In view of the foregoing, and on behalf of the national organization of the American Legion, may I respectfully request your favorable consideration of House Joint Resolution 473.

Thanking you for your courtesy and cooperation in this matter, I am

Sincerely yours,
MILES D. KENNEDY, Director.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Portsmouth, Va., August 15, 1950.

CHIEF LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR,
The American Legion National Headquarters, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a member of the American Legion, Post 37, Portsmouth, Va. I am writing to you in relation to Public Law 663, of the Seventy-ninth Congress. This law, as amended, provided that combat wounded veterans who had lost or lost the use of a leg should be eligible for a grant from the Government of $1,600 toward the purchase of a new automobile or other conveyance. The law was designed to help those who, due to their injuries, were unable to make use of normal public transportation.

Last October this law was again amended to provide for its extension until June 30, 1950, but at the same time it was decided that no further funds would be provided for use. In other words, the law was to expire on June 30, 1950, or sooner, if funds ran out.

I am a paraplegic, and was retired from the Army on April 30 of this year. Immediately upon my retirement, I made a claim for this assistance. My claim was approved before June 30, but by that time, funds were no longer available. I understand that the only recourse that I and the many others who were forced, through the severity of their wounds to undergo a lengthy hospitalization, have, is to try to get another law such as this passed. We need this help. Without an automobile, we cannot get around. Others, many of whom suffered less debilitating wounds should have, and did receive the help. The law would have been self-terminating, because one had to be a combat wounded veteran to be eligible.

Can you advise me as to whether or not there is any effort being made to secure passage of another similar bill, or if there is any way in which I and the others like me can appeal this decision? We did not ask for, nor write the original bill, but through the years in the hospital (almost 6, in my own case), we have been counting on the help it would give us. Can you help us?

Sincerely yours,
FRANK L. KIRBY.

Nothing To Worry About?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are making superhuman efforts to unify the countries of western Europe, our High Commissioner in Germany, Mr. McCloy, it would appear, assures the American people that the situation in Germany is well in hand and that we are guiding German attitudes and that the Germans are receptive to this guidance.

There are unmistakable signs, however, that Germany's neighbors do not share Mr. McCloy's optimism and that they are beginning to fear the resurgence of German industrial and military might. What is the truth about the German attitudes? Are the Germans really receptive to our democratic ideals? What are the Germans receptive to?

The Society for the Prevention of World War III, a nonprofit educational organization, 515 Madison Avenue, New York City, which for a number of years has been studying the German problem in all of its ramifications, in its just published summer issue, 1950, presents a bill of particulars, cogently and tersely, about the real present German attitudes. Under the heading "Nothing to worry about?" the society's magazine No. 35 clearly demonstrates that the American people have sufficient cause, indeed, to worry about our German policy. The article follows:

NOTHING TO WORRY ABOUT?

"This is a critical period for Germany and one which finds the Germans, in general, receptive. It is a period in which we should redouble our efforts to guide German public attitudes in the direction of the free western world." (John J. McCloy, United States High Commissioner, to Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, in his First Quarterly Report on Germany.)

The American people will now be able to breathe a sigh of relief as they read the resolute words of the United States High Commissioner. Henceforth they need not fret about such insignificant occurrences as they read in the press daily:

The Chancelor of the West German Republic leading a German rally to the tune of Deutschland Ueber Alles.

The growing defiance of allied policy and personnel by Germans of all stripes and colors.

The ever-increasing influence of neo-Nazi politicians and their political parties.

The training of ex-Nazi diplomats to take over where they left off under Hitler.

The reestablishment of the German civil service as it was under Hitler and staffed with pro-Nazi bigwigs.

The return to power of the industrial war lords of the Ruhr who provided the guns and tanks for the Hitler war machine.

The rising clamor of the Germans for the freedom of the top Nazi war criminals.

The hounding and persecution of genuine anti-Nazis for participating in the Allied denazification program.

The resurgence of the German cartel network which aims at strangling the economies of her neighbors.

The reemergence of the I. G. Farben octopus, spearhead of past German aggressions.

The spending of American funds on unnecessary luxuries, while making no effort to cope with the unemployment problem—as revealed by the ECA.

The deliberate falsification of statistical data by the Germans in order to mislead the Allies as to the true state of Germany's economic revival.

The conspiracy of German industrialists to grab hold of the markets in Communist China, and the secret deals they are making with the iron-curtain countries.

The undermining of all agricultural reforms by the Germans, despite the hundreds of thousands of farmers who are landless, though close to 2,000,000 acres are available.

The sabotage of the reparations program which has now resulted in the retaining of most of the Hermann Goering steel works—a basic component of the Nazi war potential.

The smuggling into Germany during the year 1949 of $1,000,000,000 worth of goods, chiefly coffee, cigarettes, chocolate, and nylon.

The deliberate attempt by German politicians to aggravate the financial crisis by providing tax windfalls for the industrial war lords—another device to squeeze more money out of American taxpayers.

The German threats and insults against the west over the Saar Treaty.

The boasts by members of the German General Staff that they are in constant contact with some 4,000 generals and high officers who held key positions in Hitler's Reich.

This is but a partial list. There is much more to be told, but should we bother when the American people are now assured by the United States High Commissioner that the situation is well in hand, that "we" are "guiding German attitudes" and that the Germans "are receptive"?

Why should the American people pay any attention to eight prominent Senators, Republicans and Democrats alike, GILLETTE, HENDRICKSON, IVES, LEHMAN, KILGORE, DOUGLAS, CHAVEZ, PEPPER, who have expressed alarm over developments in Germany? Why should the people become excited when they are assured that the Germans are meek lambs who are being "guided" and are "receptive" to the standards of free communities?

These Senators have asked President Truman to appoint a commission to investigate all matters pertaining to Germany. Do they really believe that there is something intrinsically wrong with our German policy? Or have they been taken in by the hysteria of fanatical diehards who believe what they read in the newspapers?

In this connection the New York Times recently carried a story bearing the headline: "U. S. Expert Defends Employment of Former Nazis in German Jobs." This anonymous high official in the Office of the High Commissioner told the press that it was a "misinterpretation" of the facts to assert that the denazification program had failed because many former Nazis had been returned to their jobs or had obtained new positions.

Should we listen to such experts because they possess a certain kind of logic which is above the heads of the common man? The common man just can't understand that putting the Nazis back into power is really a subtle way of denazifying Germany. As reported by the Times this high official said, when we put them back into office, they are less "vulnerable to neo-Nazi schemers."

This is our method of fooling the Nazis. If this doesn't make sense to the common man, let him at least retain his faith in the wisdom of the American High Commissioner. Is it not high time that the American people ignored the ravings of alarmists who cannot perceive the enormous good that is coming out of Germany day after day?

Don't we realize that they will be faithful friends of the democracies whom they despise as a matter of fact, and as long as our taxpayers' billions will flow to them, they surely will not make open alliance with their eastern neighbors?

Therefore, all we must do is to show some tolerance and understanding to a misled but essentially dynamic and democratic people.

Ten Major Jewish Agencies Denounce Stockholm Peace Appeal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement released by the National Community Relations Council. It gives me special pleasure to insert this statement in the RECORD, because some organs of public intelligence, perhaps innocently or accidentally and perhaps maliciously, have given undue prominence to so-called Jewish names in connection with espionage arrests.

I have said over and over, and I repeat, that the members of the Jewish community are utterly loyal to the Government, the institutions, and the noble traditions of the United States, and more intelligently loyal than some of the groups who sneer. There are fewer individuals of Jewish faith among those who are disloyal, and a higher ratio of Jews in the armed services than in the general population.

NEWS FROM THE NATIONAL COMMUNITY RELATIONS ADVISORY COUNCIL, NEW YORK, N. Y.

(For release Friday morning, August 18, 1950)

Ten major Jewish organizatiaons today denounced the Stockholm appeal and characterized as a "despicable divide-and-conquer tactic" the circulation of a version of the pro-Communist petition directed specifically to Jewish groups.

In a statement released today, the Jewish organizations called upon "all who wish to serve the peace of the world and the preservation of freedom to reject, with calm and common sense, the Stockholm appeal." The organizations charged that "those who assist the unscrupulous Communist aggressors in advancing this instrument of their destructive purposes make use of every device of confusion and distortion."

Organizations which signed the statement were: American Jewish Committee; American Jewish Congress; Anti-Defamation League; Association of Jewish Chaplains in the Armed Forces; B'nai B'rith; Jewish Labor Committee; Jewish War Veterans of U. S. A.; National Community Relations Advisory Council; National Council of Jewish Women; and Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Declaring that the fraudulence of the appeal directed to Jews is transparent, the statement pointed out that the endorsements contained therein "obviously come from pro-Communists, from those behind the iron curtain who had no choice, or from innocents who have been duped by the spurious appeal, if indeed the endorsements are authentic."

Pointing out that circulation of the Stockholm appeal has, in some instances, provoked groups to violence, the statement said:

"American democracy can and must be preserved not by abrogating the cherished principles of civil liberties but by confident reliance upon lawful processes and the appropriate governmental agencies."

STATEMENT OF OPPOSITION TO THE STOCKHOLM APPEAL AUGUST 17, 1950

At the very time when the peace of the world has been shattered by Communist aggression in Korea, a spurious peace petition, the appeal of the World Congress of Partisans of Peace, generally known as the Stockholm appeal, is being circulated by Communist and pro-Communist groups. The falsity of this misleading petition has been exposed by President Truman, by Secretary of State Acheson, and repeatedly by religious, labor and other organizations genuinely devoted to world peace, including the undersigned organizations. On August 2, the officers of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Synagogue Council of America joined in a denunciation of the deceptive Stockholm appeal, and correctly designated it "a camouflage designed to confuse the free societies."

Those who assist the unscrupulous Communist aggressors in advancing this instrument of their destructive purposes make use of every device of confusion and distortion. In this connection, our attention has been called to the issuance and circulation among Jewish groups of copies of the petition containing alleged endorsements of some religious leaders and public figures in European countries and Israel. It is a well-known Communist technique to make special and divisive appeals to the various religious, nationality and racial groups in the United States. We resent this despicable divide and conquer tactic. The falsity of the version of the Stockholm Appeal directed toward Jews is transparent; the endorsements obviously come from pro-Communists, from those behind the iron curtain who had no choice, or from innocents who have been duped by the spurious appeal, if, indeed, the endorsements are authentic.

We, the undersigned organizations, hereby denounce all versions of the false petition, and call upon all who wish to serve the peace of the world and the preservation of freedom to reject, with calm and common sense, the Stockholm appeal.

The presentation of the deceptive Stockholm appeal has in some instances provoked groups to violence directed against those who would deceive them. By circulating the Stockholm appeal, the Communists are attempting to provoke the American people to violence, threat of violence, mob action and disruptive disturbances. We urge the American people to avoid this trap. American democracy can and must be preserved not by abrogating the cherished principles of civil liberties but by confident reliance upon lawful processes and the appropriate governmental agencies.

Jacob Blaustein, President, American Jewish Committee; Rabbi Irving Miller, President, American Jewish Congress; Meier Steinbrink, Chairman, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith; Rabbi Morris N. Kertzer, President, Association of Jewish Chaplains in the Armed Forces; Frank Goldman, President, B'nai B'rith; Adolph Held, Chairman, Jewish Labor Committee; Ben Kaufman, Executive Director, Jewish War Veterans of the United States; Irving Kane, Chairman, National Community Relations Advisory Council; Mrs. Irving M. Engel, President, National Council of Jewish Women; Maurice N. Eisendrath, President, Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

CVA and Defense Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "CVA and Defense Production," by Assistant Secretary of the Interior C. Girard Davidson at the chamber of commerce forum luncheon, Pendleton, Oreg., Monday, July 31, 1950:

ADDRESS BY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR C. GIRARD DAVIDSON AT THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE FORUM LUNCHEON, PENDLETON, OREG., MONDAY, JULY 31, 1950

CVA AND DEFENSE PRODUCTION

Regardless of what subjects we talk about these days, our thoughts are always skipping back to what is now happening across the Pacific in Korea.

We are all proud of the United States for the leadership which it is giving to the free nations of the world in resisting unprovoked aggression and in defending the independence of sovereign countries. All of us were stirred by the speed and courage with which President Truman moved to array the forces of our country behind the United Nations and to make the American position in defense of freedom known throughout the world.

We are all hopeful that we can bring the Korean battle to a successful and speedy close. We are hopeful that our determined stand in Korea will prove a deterrent to aggression elsewhere in the world. Our preparations, however, must take into consideration the possibility that our hopes will not be as speedily achieved as we might wish.

President Truman has reported to the Congress the measures which must necessarily be taken to protect us both abroad and at home. In his recent economic report, he has further outlined what the Korean emergency—and the threat of similar emergencies elsewhere—means to our economy.

It is obvious that our military effort and our diplomatic negotiations are dependent to a great extent on the strength of our domestic economy. Knowing that, we can see more clearly what Korea means to us at home.

It means that we must expand production of the things which our armed forces need. We must have not only enough to restore peace to Korea, but also enough to be ready to quell, in cooperation with other members of the United Nations, any future aggression anywhere.

It means that we must divert production of some factories from civilian goods to military goods.

It also means, of course, that we must tighten our belts. We must spend less on consumer goods and more on military procurement, which means higher taxes. Only in that way can we prevent run-away inflation and keep our Nation's fiscal affairs on a sound basis.

But the emergency does not mean that we have to abandon all peacetime production. Certainly it does not mean that we must hold our economy to a static level. Quite the contrary. We must expand industrial production to provide enough for both military and civilian needs.

Fortunately, ours is a large and rich country. Bigger and better is an American tradition. No one doubts that we are able to and know how to expand our economy to do the job ahead.

The President pointed out that private business need have no fear that emergency expansion would result in more productive capacity than this Nation would need when the present emergency is over.

Our industrial machine is now running at top speed and it still cannot meet current civilian demands. As our population continues to grow, as all of us aspire to a higher standard of living, these civilian demands increase year after year. It is not merely a military emergency that forces us to expand industrial production. We shall continue to need this new industrial capacity after the emergency is over.

Expansion means more steel, more aluminum, more fabricated goods, more cheap electric power. It means more of all the thousands and thousands of manufactured products this Nation uses.

And the President made it plain that the Government must do its part in working for an expanded economy in the future. We cannot abandon our growing program of resource development—and that means human resources as well as natural resources—if we are to have the kind of Nation we all want when the peace is finally won.

We can achieve these things, acting with characteristic American energy and teamwork, but we know that the job will not be an easy one.

Faced with such pressing problems, we shall have no time for foolishness. This is not the time for private wars which divide and dissipate our energies.

For that reason, I can find little patience for the current propaganda campaign of the private electric companies. It is disconcerting to note that, just this month, this campaign has invaded the pages of the widely read Reader's Digest magazine.

The article to which I have reference is entitled "Prime Example of Creeping Socialism: The Columbia Valley Authority." It is signed by the distinguished ex-Governor of Wyoming, the Honorable Leslie A. Miller. But it might well have been written by one of the paid propagandists of the electric companies.

We might speculate about this. Governor Miller has admitted to the papers that he did not write parts of it. The Reader's Digest has confirmed this.

The magazine editors admitted that they added to the article what they euphemistically call summarizing phrases. The public is led to believe, however, that Governor Miller is responsible for the contents of the entire article.

It should be noted that this article, which purports to inform the public about CVA, hardly mentions CVA. Here this widely circulated magazine had an opportunity to give the people some basic facts on an important question of public policy. All the facts on the CVA question should be broadly disseminated so that the people can make up their own minds as to its merits and demerits. Unfortunately, Reader's Digest overlooked this opportunity for performing a useful public service.

It was this same magazine which, only a few months ago, printed an earlier rabid attack on the CVA. At that time, many people wrote to the Reader's Digest and suggested that the magazine print in a succeeding issue an article stating the pro-CVA side of the story.

When I saw the August issue, I was astounded that the magazine should be publishing another anti-CVA article without offering an opportunity for rebuttal. I was further disturbed to find that this anti-CVA article was commissioned by the magazine. Thus it could not be considered an accident, a case of the editors happening upon a good piece in the morning mail.

These two articles, and particularly the references to "socialism," which the editors admit to inserting, must have given great pleasure to the private electric companies. By labeling the CVA "creeping socialism," the Reader's Digest falls right in with the latest directive of the electric companies advertising program.

I wish all of you could see and read this booklet entitled "The Public and You," which the electric companies advertising program has distributed privately to the executives of private electric utilities. The booklet gives the results of a public opinion poll and has an interesting commentary on the results.

"This is a shocker," the booklet comments. "Sixty-three percent of the people approve TVA. Are they Socialists? Liberals? Fuzzy-thinkers? Low-income folks?"

"Apparently not," the booklet replies. For the poll revealed that 65 percent of the upper-income people approve TVA, that 83 percent of the editors and educators, people who read and get around and think, approve TVA. Even more horrible for the utilities executives are these facts brought out by the poll: 55 percent of the Republicans approve TVA, 53 percent of the free enterprisers approve TVA, and 45 percent of the private electric companies own employees approve TVA.

Furthermore, the survey shows that 63 percent think that TVA's in other parts of the country would be a good idea. Evidently, Pacific Northwest residents had their say in this public-opinion poll.

Unable to understand why so many people approve TVA, the survey further asked whether it was known that TVA does not pay the same taxes as business concerns. Most of the people said they knew that. Nonetheless, of the people who knew it, 66 percent still approved TVA and 65 percent favored more TVA's.

Then the pollsters took a new tack and asked, "Would socialism be a good thing or a bad thing for the United States?" Naturally 69 percent of the people said it would be a bad thing.

These facts led the electric company advertising experts to the following conclusion, which I quote from their booklet.

"From the preceding charts, it is apparent that to link our fight to the TVA question would run us into a lot of opposition, most of it based on lack of knowledge. But to link our fight to socialism is something else again. The people do not want socialism.

"We're on favorable ground there. The electric companies advertising program in magazines and on radio will stress the fight against the socialistic state more in the future. It should be stressed, too, on the local level * * * in speeches, radio talks, interviews, and other public expressions of management opinion."

Doesn't it seem to you, after hearing what the electric companies propose to do, that the Reader's Digest is following the line of the power trust? "Don't argue the facts," the line says. "Instead, pin the nasty label on CVA. Call it 'creeping socialism'."

Now let us leave this propaganda to the electric companies and get back to the facts on CVA.

The CVA was proposed to meet a specific problem, the existence of which no one has successfully questioned. Almost everyone knows that there is something wrong with the present system of handling the Federal Government's responsibility in river basin development in the Pacific Northwest.

There are too many cooks stirring the broth. Three Federal agencies are trying to handle the control of a single river system. Twenty or more Federal agencies are concerned with other aspects of our lands and water resources in a single river basin. The results are everywhere apparent in delays, in confusion, sometimes in open conflict. This is not the fault of the Federal agencies, but of the congressional acts under which they must operate.

Now that defense needs begin to press on us, the delays in the Federal river development program in the Northwest become even more apparent—and more dangerous.

As an example, let us look at a few facts about aluminum.

Currently we are making about 700,000 tons of aluminum a year. We should be making at least 1,200,000 tons, as we did during World War II. This is a minimum figure, but it will serve us for this discussion.

Why aren't aluminum plants expanding? It is not because they don't want to. For the last 2 years they have said they could use a whole lot more aluminum just to fill civilian orders. They have money for plant expansion, too, and they want to spend it.

But aluminum plants can't expand production at present prices unless they get more low-cost power. It was low-cost power that brought 50 percent of the aluminum industry to the Northwest in the beginning. Naturally the industry looks to the Northwest for further expansion, because the Nation's greatest reserve of low-cost hydropower is in this region. But today we have a power shortage here which, according to present schedules, will continue until at least 1958. New industries needing large blocks of power can't get it.

In order to get the minimum 1,200,000 tons of aluminum we need, we must have more power dams in the Northwest in a hurry.

If we don't get those dams, the alternatives are grim.

One of the alternatives is to cut the civilian use of electric power. The additional power needed is equivalent to the electricity requirements of about 30 normal suburban nonindustrial cities averaging 90,000 population. No one wants to cut off power for 30 such cities, for 2,700,000 people.

Another alternative is to use high-cost power. This would raise the price of aluminum. Today aluminum made with 2-mill power costs about 16½ cents a pound. But the cheapest power now available for aluminum expansion averages 6 mills. This would raise the price of aluminum about 4 cents a pound, to 20½ cents The total added cost to the consumer each year would be about $96,000,000. That $96,000,000 out of the consumers' pockets might better be invested in a hydro-power dam in the Pacific Northwest. It would buy about 150,000 kilowatts of capacity.

As I said, we are short of aluminum because our dams in the Northwest are behind schedule.

A primary reason for the delay is the difficulty which the three Federal water and power agencies have had in reaching agreements on which dams are to be built, which agencies are to build them, and in what order they are to be constructed.

Obviously this would be avoided if the three agencies were combined into one, as provided by the CVA legislation.

A second reason for delay has been the absence of continuing construction funds. Each year the Federal agencies must wait for congressional action to see how much of a dam they can build. At the same time, the returns from the dams already built are going back to the Treasury without contributing to continued growth of the Pacific Northwest. In 1949 alone, the Bonneville Power Administration turned back to the Treasury, out of power revenues from the two dams now operating, over $10,000,000 in excess of operating expenses and of repayment requirements.

CVA would be authorized to use this money to speed construction of dams once they had been authorized by Congress.

A third reason for delay is to be found in the operations of the Congress. It is natural that the Congress would be hesitant about moving ahead on these dams as long as there is conflict among the agencies. As a result, the Northwest program proceeds piecemeal. You all know that the dams to be constructed by the Corps of Engineers were authorized in the rivers and harbors act of this year, but that the equally important dams to be constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation were left out of the act.

Among the projects omitted was Hells Canyon Dam, one of the most important units. The schedule for bringing the Northwest out of the power shortage by 1958 requires that construction on Hells Canyon Dam start this month. This is now obviously impossible.

In its action on 1951 appropriations Congress further demonstrated the ineffectiveness of this divided system of administration. Funds for the Corps of Engineers projects in the Northwest were uniformly increased by the Senate committee over the House committee recommendations. On the other hand, funds for Bonneville and Reclamation projects were decreased. For example, the Senate committee gave a more than $5,000,000 increase for the Engineers' Lookout Point Reservoir, and more than $7,000,000 for the Engineers' Detroit Reservoir. On the other hand, the Senate committee decreased Reclamation's Columbia Basin project by $4,000,000 and Reclamation's Hungry Horse Dam by $1,000,000. Bonneville Power Administration construction funds were cut $2,000,000 and its contract authority one and three-quarter million dollars.

If the river-development program for the Pacific Northwest came to the Congress in a single, comprehensive package it is unlikely that we would continue to have these unbalanced enactments of only half a plan. By presenting to the Congress a single, comprehensive program for dam construction for the region CVA would make it possible for the Congress to move more sure-footedly.

We must not forget these facts in any discussion of the CVA question. We are not doing as well as we might, and these days in the light of defense needs, as well as we must.

Regardless of the form and details of any proposal for improvement, it must be obvious that these three principles must be followed in order to do the job better.

First of all, we must pull together the numerous Federal agencies now working on natural-resources development in the Pacific Northwest. This is an obvious way to gain efficiency and save money. The river system is one job and it should be handled by one agency. We should have a single program, comprehending the needs of the entire region and all the natural resources, as well as a single schedule for accomplishing it.

In the second place, we should take the Federal operation out of Washington, D. C., and bring it 3,000 miles across the country to the Pacific Northwest where the job is to be done. We need on-the-ground grassroots management of our Federal operations. We need Federal officials in the region responsible for getting the job done. We need Federal officials in the region responsive to the problems of the region and to the needs of the people. We need an effective partnership between the Federal operation and State and local governments and private individuals.

In the third place, we need businesslike management of the Federal resource operations. It seems to me entirely logical that the enterprises of the Federal Government should make use of all the new and efficient management methods which the American private corporation has developed. The Hoover Commission recommended that these business-type procedures be followed in financing, budgeting, and accounting for Federal water and power developments. A method for doing this is already established under the Government Corporation Controls Act, which provides both for business-type management of Government corporations and the strictest accountability to the Congress.

The current CVA proposal follows all these principles for improvement of the Federal resource operation in the Pacific Northwest.

If details in the legislation need refining, that can be done in congressional hearings in the field. These three basic principles, however, must be a part of any CVA legislation which finally becomes law.

Today the residents of the Pacific Northwest, together with people all over the country, are ready and anxious to make the maximum contribution to the defense of our national security. But as workmen, we are only as good as our tools. We do not now have the tools we need to make our maximum contribution. We are not tooled up to realize the power potentialities of this region and to make possible the necessary expansion in aluminum and in other metals and minerals.

This tooling up cannot be deferred much longer. Better to have enough and have it on time, rather than too little and too late.

Disposal of Surplus Perishable Commodities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it has become increasingly plain that there is a great need for a rearrangement of our whole policy with respect to Government-owned agricultural products. These products have been bought in great quantities by the Commodity Credit Corporation in price-support operations. They have been held in storage warehouses when they should have been used as food by needy persons and by institutions and agencies who care for indigent persons.

The purpose of this bill is to broaden the scope of the present law so as to facilitate the disposal in a useful manner of perishable agricultural commodities held by the Government. At the present time the Department of Agriculture has millions of dollars invested in butter, cheese, dried milk, eggs, and numerous other kinds of products. They are in storage and serving no useful purpose. At the same time, Government and non-Government associations of a nonprofit character, such as hospitals, mental institutions, homes for children, the aged, and numerous types of welfare organizations that care for the poor and the handicapped in life are in need of these various commodities being held by the Government. It does not make sense.

Last evening I was startled to learn from the radio report of a news commentator that our Government had spent upward of $400,000,000 to buy up potatoes in its price-support program at a price of $1.68 per 100 pounds and then resold them at 1 cent per 100 pounds to make alcohol or fertilizer. In other instances they were treated with an acid preparation and discolored so they could not be used for human consumption. At other times they were destroyed by pouring oil over them and setting fire to them. At the same time, our War Department is paying $2.95 per hundredweight for potatoes with which to feed our soldiers.

These conditions must not be permitted to continue. Although there has been some improvement in latter days, yet there is more that can and must be done. The legislation now before the House, it is promised, will provide a ready means of getting these perishable agricultural products into channels where human need will be served.

I give my support to the bill.

Liberal Party Calls for Total Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

LIBERAL PARTY OF NEW YORK STATE,
New York, N. Y., August 18, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN KLEIN: The Liberal Party of New York State is convinced that the emergency confronting our Nation is not just that of a little war in Korea, but a comprehensive emergency which will continue from now on until the Soviet Union is genuinely ready to leave the world at peace. Until then, we must be ready for instant action if the Soviet Union precipitates broad-scale war.

Upon the basis of this conviction, we believe that there must be set up now the entire machinery for activation of total economic mobilization on a moment's notice.

The enclosed series of recommendations on the national mobilization program, just passed by the State committee of the Liberal Party, aims at the complete preparedness which our Nation needs now.

We hope you will give these recommendations serious consideration in working on legislation for the national mobilization program.

Sincerely yours,

BEN DAVIDSON,
Executive Director.

RECOMMENDATIONS ON NATIONAL ECONOMIC MOBILIZATION MADE BY STATE COMMITTEE, LIBERAL PARTY OF NEW YORK STATE

We regard the present emergency as being not merely the Korean war alone. The emergency includes the potentiality of the Korean conflict for a third world war, precipitated by the Soviet Union either by bite-by-bite action upon vulnerable points or by sudden general attack. Whether the Soviet opens general attack with her own forces or sacrifices the people of her satellites first upon the altar of Soviet expansionism, the peril to the United States and the entire free democratic world is now acute.

It is the height of folly and of danger to regard the Korean conflict as an isolated and self-contained emergency. The attack of Soviet sponsored and directed North Korea upon United Nations sponsored South Korea, the persistence of that attack in defiance of the United Nations directives, the continuance of the attack in the face of United Nations military involvement, the refusal of the Soviet to stop the conflict, which she can do with a single word to North Korea—all this must be understood as part of the entire Soviet plan for world conquest. The Soviet will attack whenever and wherever she considers the opportunity ripe. She will not await our convenience.

Therefore, the United States and, with it, the entire free democratic world must be totally prepared for total attack at any moment from now on. The emergency confronting our country is not momentary in Korea, but a comprehensive and continuing emergency regardless of what happens in Korea.

We have seen time and again that an aggressor with expansionist aims is encouraged to act by the military weakness of his opponents. A third world war, therefore, cannot be averted by speaking softly and wielding a toothpick. Aggressors respect only strength. And it is only complete readiness to oppose force with strength—with full strength—that can deter the Soviet Union from throwing the world into flame. Complete preparedness is the only hope for averting a third world war.

It is upon the basis of our conviction that the emergency is total now and will continue to be total until the Soviet Union shows itself concretely prepared to permit the world to be at peace—it is upon this conviction that we base our over-all recommendation that the national preparedness program be pointed toward total mobilization. This does not mean that all the resources of the country—human, natural and industrial—be completely mobilized at once. It does mean immediate establishment of the entire machinery for activation of full mobilization the moment this becomes necessary. It means that Congress must provide the President immediately with all necessary control powers. It means that the President must set up all complete stand-by machinery now for exercise of those controls and must maintain that machinery on instant-action alert. This will obviate the hazardous, piecemeal, patchwork, scurry approach to mobilization for total war if and when it comes.

Toward this end, we recommend the following:

1. PRIORITIES, ALLOCATIONS, REQUISITION

The President should be granted immediately not only the power to set priorities and allocate materials but also the power to requisition plants or entire industries which engage in "hold-out" action in order to force the Government to grant their profit-making terms. In fact, any plant or industry which violates the mobilization program should be subject to requisition by the Government. There should be no policy of pampering industry.

The war effort must get first priority. But our war needs must not be permitted to serve as a pretext for a reactionary assault on our social services. Insofar as the war effort remains limited to the Korean conflict and to relatively gradual mobilization against other and larger eventualities and permits allocation of materials to civil needs, there should be a secondary "must" priority accorded first to housing for the low- and middle-income groups, to hospitals, to schools—in other words, to the basic social needs of the people. No materials at all should be allocated to luxury enterprises.

2. PRICE CONTROL

Price-control powers granted to the President should be broad enough to cover all goods and services and all prices from source to consumer, from raw materials through manufacture to the sale and resale. The "squeeze" upon the price-controlled retailer by uncontrolled wholesale and manufacturing prices should be obviated. The squeeze upon the Government and its rearmament program by industrial profiteers should be crushed at once. (According to Air Force officials, industry has hiked the cost of the Air Force procurement program as high as 90 percent in the few weeks since the start of the Korean war.)

While it may not be necessary at present to place price ceilings on goods in ample supply—unless hoarding, panic buying, black-market creation of artificial shortages make ceilings necessary—price ceilings, along with priority and allocation controls, should be placed at once on all goods in short supply and epecially on all materials and goods going into military production.

Prices should be rolled back immediately to May-June levels. And that includes prices of goods produced for the Armed Forces.

Complete machinery for rationing should be set up at once to be available for quick action.

3. RENT CONTROL

The gradual increase in rental housing during the past few years—which has stimulated premature decontrol for various areas of the country—will necessarily be retarded by our military production program. At the same time, the need for housing will be accelerated by our war measures, as experience in all previous wars has shown. Therefore, it is vital that strong rent-control powers be made available to the President. These should include the power to place rent controls anywhere at any time, including those areas presently decontrolled.

4. WAGE CONTROLS

Our entire program of recommendations under this heading is based upon the principle of equal responsibility and equal sacrifice for labor and industry. To freeze wages while industry piles up huge profits would be flying in the face of all justice. The inflationary danger at present lies in the actuality of skyrocketing prices, not in the potentiality of rapidly rising wages. The fact is that, even before the Korean war, there was an imbalance between wages and prices. The precipitate price rises since June 25 have only served to throw wages still further out of line in relation to the cost of living.

We are therefore opposed to any wage freeze at this time.

Whatever controls may ultimately be established over wages should be subject to the satisfaction of the following conditions:

(1) Roll-back of prices to the May-June level and such wage readjustments as will bring wages into balance with the increase in living costs which developed before the Korean war.

(2) Provision for wage improvement in trades operating under substandard labor conditions.

(3) Imposition of excess-profits taxes at the very same time as taxes upon individual income.

5. FINANCE

As much of the mobilization program as possible should be financed on a pay-as-you-go basis. We recommend that taxes be raised both in order to finance the mobilization program and to halt inflation. Increased taxes must apply—and apply equitably—both to individuals and to business and industry. Taxes upon industry should be such as to prevent inordinate profit-making. People of low income should receive special consideration.

We also recommend for further exploration the following possibility: Increase in income taxes would have the double function of financing the war effort and of stemming inflation. In the case of incomes under $10,000 a year, it is suggested that that part of the tax which represents the anti-inflationary function be set aside by the Government in war bonds to be repaid to the taxpayer in 10 years (in effect, compulsory savings).

We recommend that the President be given power to control all avenues of credit for all purposes and that the exercise of those controls be left to his discretion. Bowing to the interests of one field, like real estate, raises the question of equitability of credit controls in other fields.

A war contract system should be devised to prevent the making of huge profits.

6. SMALL BUSINESS

Wherever possible without detriment to the war effort, it is essential that small business be given full opportunity both to participate in and to advance the mobilization program. War mobilization increases the possibility of concentration of production in big industry to the detriment of small business. This threat should be realized and countered.

7. BLACK MARKETS

Heavy penalties should be established for black marketeering all the way from source materials to consumer. Our experience during the last war showed that measures taken then against black marketeering were far from effective. Black marketeering should be made a costly and perilous crime.

8. CIVIL RIGHTS—CIVIL LIBERTIES

Throughout the entire mobilization program and under all controls, no matter how drastic they may have to be, there must be no abrogation of the civil liberties and civil rights of free citizens in a free democracy. Measures for national security must be taken; spies, saboteurs, fifth columnists of both Communist and Fascist movements must be dug out, immobilized, and punished. But this urgently necessary action must not be permitted to infringe upon the democratic rights of our American people. Democracy is flexible enough to be able safely to maintain needed controls at the same time that it safeguards inalienable rights.

Continued discrimination in employment will retard the mobilization program. With the need for additional manpower in the present emergency, it becomes nothing short of sabotage of the mobilization program to deprive the country's production of the skills and efforts of workers because of their color, creed, or ancestry. Congress should act in this session to wipe out discrimination in employment. All war contracts should contain a provision prohibiting discrimination in employment on Government production. Segregation in the armed services should be eliminated.

9. UNIFICATION OF MOBILIZATION PROGRAM

We urge strongly that fragmentation of the direction of the mobilization program be avoided. If we are to have the maximum concentration of effort we must have the maximum of coordination all the way down the line. Splitting up mobilization program functions among various cabinet offices and special Government agencies is hardly conducive toward such coordination.

We therefore recommend that there be a single over-all Federal agency, appointed by and responsible to the President, which will be in complete charge of the national mobilization program—other than military—and which will handle the job right through planning, coordination, operation, controls and all other phases of the program. Labor, industry, agriculture, and the consumer public should all be equally represented on this board.

Under the jurisdiction of this agency, but appointed by and responsible ultimately to the President, there should be an Administrator for each mobilization function—priorities and allocations, requisition, price control, rent control, rationing, credit control, etc. Such an agency will not only have a unified structure, but will be the unifying force in the entire national mobilization program. The unified Military Defense Establishment will thus be paralleled by a unified economic mobilization establishment.

10. MORALE

The national-mobilization program cannot achieve its highest effectiveness unless the morale of the people is mobilized behind it. Only if the Government—and that includes Congress as well as the Executive Department—will fully alert the people to the gravity of the situation, the urgency for action and the inevitable need for sacrifices on the part of everyone—only then will the Nation be fully prepared to meet the dangerous days ahead. Mobilization must be three-pronged—mobilization of manpower, matériel, and morale.

At the same time it is essential for the morale of our Armed Forces that their military preparation be accompanied by a thorough briefing on the perils confronting our Nation and the world, on the values of free and democratic life which are at stake, on the objectives of their fighting. This should be matched by intensive education of the people at home on the very same score.

Now is not the time for petty or partisan politicos by any group or individual. Unity at home against a common foe is another essential both for the morale of our troops and for the successful prosecution of the national program.

Appropriations for Extensions of Remarks

REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL WILSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana with a great deal of reluctance. Certainly it was no reflection upon the gentleman from Indiana, or his record in the Congress, or any remarks that he wished to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD. I registered my objection in the first place because $1,000 is a lot of money. Every local government in my district weighs and weighs very heavily the consideration of the appropriation of each and every thousand dollars. My taxpayers are helping to pay this bill the same as everybody else's taxpayers. If we throw away $1,000 here and there, ill-advised, and without much forethought, by stuffing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, we are going to have to do some explaining to our taxpayers when we go home.

I question seriously, and I shall read the article inserted and try to determine, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, whether or not we should appropriate $1,000 for this matter and similar matters for stuffing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, there is, of course, nothing new in the fact that the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities has been under continual attack in some quarters for our efforts in seeking to bring out into the light of day the activities of groups and organizations seeking to influence national policy in these critical times.

The right of any individual or any group to do its utmost in seeking to influence public policy is, of course, beyond challenge, and neither I, as chairman of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, nor any member of that committee has any disposition to restrict in any fashion the right of petition, the right of political action, the right of free speech, or of free press. Anything of that nature would be foreign to our characters and our own fundamental beliefs in the processes of democracy.

Although there is nothing new in the fact that we have been under attack in this committee for seeking to bring all lobbying out into the open, that is, to make the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946 clear in its application and effective in its operation some of the forms of these attacks upon us are somewhat puzzling to me.

Recently I called to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, an editorial in Life magazine which had represented this committee as being out to "get" business and antiadministration groups for expressing their point of view on legislative and national issues. I think I was able to show clearly in that presentation to the House that the editors of Life magazine, to say the least, had prepared their editorial attack upon us hastily and without bothering to check the actual facts.

I carefully avoided making any charge or accusation that Life magazine had deliberately attempted to mislead their readers in furtherance of any sort of plot or conspiracy against this committee and its objectives. But I did say that Life magazine obviously had been played for a sucker, had been taken in by the Committee for Constitutional Government, which has been conducting an all-out war against the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities.

Perhaps I should not have been surprised, Mr. Speaker, to find in the August 19, 1950, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, on page 10, in their lead editorial of that issue, a discussion of the work of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, which in tenor and tone is remarkably similar to the previous editorial in Life magazine. Nevertheless, I was greatly surprised. I was surprised chiefly by the fact that the inaccuracies of the Life editorial were not only repeated but expanded in the Saturday Evening Post editorial.

As in the case of Life magazine, the editors of the Saturday Evening Post, in preparing their editorial, ignored the first principle of responsible journalism by failing to make any effort to check the facts on which they were basing their editorial. That I just cannot understand.

Complaints against the work of this committee have been made from time to time by groups and individuals whom we have had under investigation and these complaints have been carried in the newspapers in some detail and have been relayed across the country by the wire services. Each of the wire services and every responsible newspaper correspondent in Washington reporting these complaints or attacks have always been careful to check the facts, to get an explanation if one was forthcoming, and they have tried to balance their stories so that both sides are presented.

Under those circumstances there could be absolutely no legitimate basis upon which I could complain. That is responsible journalism and good journalism. The wire services practice this policy scrupulously and we have come to expect it from all responsible reporters in Washington.

With all their resources, and with the excellent staff people I know they employ in Washington and elsewhere, I am utterly amazed at this failure first of Life magazine and now of the Saturday Evening Post, in preparing editorials, to make even a cursory check into the facts before proceeding with unsupportable editorials.

I would like to take this editorial in the Saturday Evening Post of August 19 point by point and show the truly amazing extent of its misinformation. As in the case of Life magazine, I do not think this is a deliberate attempt to mislead; I think it is just sloppy reporting, lazy reporting, inept reporting, and I am very sorry to see such an outstanding magazine revealed as being so careless in its fact finding and reporting.

The editorial is entitled "We Can't Salvage Free Enterprise Without a Battle"

It starts out this way:

> The late Professor Schumpeter of Harvard used to contend that the most serious threat to capitalism was the ineptitude of the capitalists.

I am sure there is a lot of truth in that.

The editorial then continues:

> As a current example you could take the weak response of too many businessmen and capitalists to the threat of the Buchanan lobbying committee which is engaged in a counteroffensive against the few conservatives who have waged effective war against the Socialist drift of the Truman Fair Deal.

By the weak response of businessmen and capitalists to the threat of the Buchanan Lobbying Committee, I assume the Saturday Evening Post has reference to the fact that scores of business corporations in this counrty have straightforwardly turned over to this committee without any hesitation whatsoever information we had requested from them on the funds they spent for the perfectly legitimate and perfectly legal and perfectly proper effort on their part of seeking to influence the action of Congress on legislation intimately affecting those businesses.

I presume that is what they had reference to in this editorial. The remainder of the editorial, of course, will bear that out.

But taking this first statement of the editorial by itself, the Saturday Evening Post is voicing concern that business corporations have nothing to hide and no reason to hide it are being weak enough in their defense of the capitalist system as to turn over to a congressional investigating committee the simple facts about their perfectly proper activities in the field of influencing legislation, a field in which they have every right to engage in.

But let us take the rest of that paragraph:

> The Buchanan Lobbying Committee, which is engaged in a counteroffensive against the few conservatives who have waged effective war against the Socialist drift of the Truman Fair Deal.

This is completely false. If the editors of the Saturday Evening Post have not any better idea than that of the purposes of this investigation and of what we are trying to do, then they must not have read a single story of the many which have appeared in the New York Times and the Christian Science Monitor and many other outstanding newspapers of the country explaining the completely objective basis under which the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities has been working both sides of the street in our investigations into any area of lobbying activity or legislative interest we have gone. This policy was laid down at the very first meeting of the membership of this committee last October. It has been scrupulously adhered to. Our hearings will show that. Our hearings will show that we have set out to find out how lobbying operates, who is doing it, how they do it. In every area that we have covered we have taken typical proadministration lobbyists and typical antiadministration lobbyists and we have alternated from one side of the street to the other, and the sort of information we demanded from the one type of lobby on the one side of an issue, we were just as insistent in demanding from its counterpart lobby on the other side of the issue.

Mr. Speaker, if any committee of the Congress, particularly any investigating committee, has been more insistent on an objective approach and a nonpolitical approach than we have in trying to get to the bottom of the problem of making our lobbying act effective, I do not know what committee it could have been. This statement, therefore, that we are engaged in a counteroffensive against conservatives and antiadministration elements is completely false.

The word counteroffensive implies an attack to repel and attack. In our committee we have avoided and ruled out of order and discussion of the merits of the legislative issues which the various lobbying groups before us have supported or opposed. Our record shows that. Although some groups appearing before us have sought to make our hearings into a forum or a sounding board on their own point of view on legislative issues, we have avoided these discussions and halted them and ruled out debates between members of the committee and the witnesses whether a proposed legislative course of action is good or bad, whether it is in the public interest or against the public interest. I will admit this was difficult to achieve. All seven members of our committee, the four Democrats and the three Republicans, are extremely active in the legislative battles in the Congress. We are all loyal to our respective political parties. The lobbying areas that we have gone into are areas of extreme political controversy and it is very difficult to keep seven Members of Congress from rising to the challenge of a good political argument. But by and large I think we accomplished our goal of keeping the merits of these issues out of our discussions.

To get on with this editorial, the second paragraph states:

> The Buchanan committee has haled before it several groups which are engaged in propaganda in opposition to socialism.

To interrupt, at that point, I will say that this is perfectly true. We have haled before us several groups engaged in propaganda in opposition to what is described here as socialism. We have also had before us at the same time and in the same series of hearings other organizations taking the exact opposite position on various legislative issues as these groups referred to as being against socialism.

In other words, we had the National Association of Real Estate Boards, the National Association of Home Builders, and the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association, all of which are engaged in a continual battle against what they call socialized housing, that is, public housing. And in the same hearing series, we had the CIO Housing Committee, the National Housing Conference, Inc., and the Housing and Home Finance Agency of the Federal Government, all of which were vigorously promoting the public housing bill.

We had the National Economic Council and the Committee for Constitutional Government in other series; also, in that same series, we had Americans for Democratic Action and the Civil Rights Congress.

Similarly, when we called the Foundation for Economic Education, which publishes pamphlets on economic research tending to show that the proposals of this administration are leading us to socialism and disaster, we had already had before us the Public Affairs Institute, supported largely by railroad labor and other unions, which publishes pamphlets on economic research tending to show the need for the enactment of many administration proposals.

So, while it is true that this committee has haled before it groups propagandizing in opposition to what they call socialism, a fair statement in this editorial would have had to say that this committee has haled before it a variety of organizations engaged in propaganda for and against administration measures. It did not say that; and that was sloppy reporting, to say the least. But to continue with the second paragraph of this editorial:

> One of these groups is Frank Gannett's Committee for Constitutional Government, which is not charged with lobbying in Washington, but does print paper-covered editions of various books, including John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead, for distribution to the public.

I am completely at a loss to understand this reference to the fact that the Committee for Constitutional Government "is not charged with lobbying in Washington." The Committee for Constitutional Government lobbies in Washington and all over the country. It is registered under the Lobbying Act. It reports its receipts and expenditures under the Lobbying Act. The reporting is not complete; up until this year, it had never reported the name of a single contributor under the act. But it has given the Congress the figures on its total receipts and on each expenditure of $10 or more. These figures show that among all the organizations reporting to the Congress under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, the Committee for Constitutional Government is the second largest spender, second only to the American Medical Association campaign against compulsory health insurance.

Here then is a lobby which admittedly lobbies and which has accepted the application of a Federal law applying to lobbying. We have not "charged" them with lobbying in Washington because there is no question about it; they do lobby, and they have every right to. The use of this word "charged" in reference to lobbying is perhaps unfortunate, because it implies that anyone engaged in lobbying is doing something improper. Our whole objective here is to bring home to the American people and particularly to the organizations subject to the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act that lobbying—that is, in its broadest sense, the effort to influence legislation—is a perfectly proper and usually helpful activity in a democracy; that it is in fact a necessary activity in representative self-government.

The Saturday Evening Post, however, in this editorial makes this totally uninformed statement that we have called before us the Committee for Constitutional Government not because they are engaged in lobbying—you notice these words, that the CCG "is not charged with lobbying in Washington"—but because they distribute books to the public.

A mere reading of the New York Times story on that hearing or a look at our record, which has been open to inspection, or a telephone call to me from Philadelphia, could have set the editors of the Saturday Evening Post straight on why the Committee for Constitutional Government was called before us for hearings. We are investigating lobbying; we are investigating lobbying groups which engage in widespread propaganda activity; we are investigating them not because we object to these activities or seek to prohibit or restrict them in any fashion, but to find out whether or not they are adequately covered by the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act or whether that act needs improvement or clarification to keep activities out in the open where they belong. There is not a word in the Saturday Evening Post editorial about the objectives of this committee or the assignment given this committee by the House of Representatives, all matters of public record and easily ascertained by any cub reporter.

Let us proceed with this editorial. Amplifying this reference to CCG's distribution of The Road Ahead, the editorial continues as follows:

> Now comes the Buchanan committee and demands a full account of this operation, with a list of all those who have paid for bulk orders of The Road Ahead. The justification of this procedure, as attempted by Representative BUCHANAN, is that Congress is influenced by public opinion; therefore, it is necessary to investigate bodies which influence public opinion. For the moment the committee seems to be concerned mainly with certain unpopular individuals and with large corporations. But if the Lobbying Act is to be stretched out of its commonly accepted interpretation to include efforts to persuade the people as a whole, what becomes of freedom of press and opinion?

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us take this paragraph apart. The Buchanan committee has asked for the names of those who have given the Committee for Constitutional Government as much as $1,000 for any purpose whatsoever, including but not limited to payments for the mass distribution of books. We have asked for this information because the Committee for Constitutional Government has never reported to Congress on the sources of its income, until this year when one contributor was identified by name.

The Lobbying Act requires that organizations subject to it must report each quarter on the names and addresses of all those who make contributions of $500 or more. Now what is a contribution? The act defines a contribution as including "a gift, subscription, loan, or advance, or deposit of money or anything of value and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution." Section 305 of the act requires that organizations subject to it file with the Clerk of the House quarterly "the name and address of each person who has made a contribution of $500 or more."

The House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities has gone on record time and again that we are not policing this act, we are not a grand jury seeking to ferret out violations of this act for purposes of prosecution. We have taken a hastily drawn piece of legislation which has not operated completely successfully and we are trying to find out what is wrong with the legislation, if anything.

The Committee for Constitutional Government has followed a policy of concealing the names of its contributors. I do not say that as an accusation. In saying that I am only reporting what Edward A. Rumely, executive secretary of the CCG, has forthrightly told this committee of the House of Representatives. He said they do not want the names of their contributors made public. He said they are afraid if the names of their contributors are made public, these contributors will be subject to political or economic or other retribution from opponents of the organization. He said that when the Lobbying Act was passed in 1946, the Committee for Constitutional Government immediately sat down to devise a technique of keeping secret the names of those who provide the organization with funds.

Whether the CCG is violating the act is not our concern. That is the concern of the Department of Justice. But if this act is not operating to bring out into the open the names of individuals or corporations or unions or any other sources providing the funds for lobbying organizations to enable them to carry on their lobbying work, then Mr. Speaker, that is our concern and very seriously so and it is up to us to find out what to do about it.

The Congress has said that this information must be made a matter of public record. If the act is not accomplishing that purpose because of violations, that is one thing; that is the Department of Justice's responsibility. But if it is failing in that objective because of loopholes in the act, that is our responsibility.

We have asked the Committee for Constitutional Government to give us this information and they have refused. They have flooded the country, and particularly all newspapers and magazines, including, I would imagine, the Saturday Evening Post, with press releases attacking the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities for having the effrontery and the arrogance to ask them where they get their money from—where a lobbying organization subject to the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, spending a half million dollars or more a year to influence national legislation, gets its money from.

We have asked for this information—and we have received it—from virtually every other organization, whether subject to the Lobbying Act or not, whether reporting under the Lobbying Act or not, that we have investigated. We have gotten it from all of the groups in the housing lobby that we approached. We got it from the National Economic Council and Americans for Democratic Action. We got it from the Public Affairs Institute and the Foundation for Economic Education, neither one of which appears presently to be covered by the Lobbying Act. But they gave it to us. We got it from a wide variety of other organizations, registered and unregistered under the act, that we investigated—many groups interested in repeal of excise taxes, groups interested in the enactment of basing-point legislation, groups active in minimum-wage legislation.

But we have not gotten it from the Committee for Constitutional Government and guess who else we did not get it from—the Communist-led Civil Rights Congress.

Editorial complete in Saturday Evening Post of August 19, 1950, follows:

WE CAN'T SALVAGE FREE ENTERPRISE WITHOUT A BATTLE

The late Professor Schumpeter, of Harvard, used to contend that the most serious threat to capitalism was the ineptitude of the capitalists. As a current example you could take the weak response of too many businessmen and capitalists to the threat of the Buchanan Lobbying Committee, which is engaged in a counteroffensive against the few conservatives who have waged effective war against the socialist drift of the Truman Fair Deal.

The Buchanan committee has haled before it several groups which are engaged in propaganda in opposition to socialism. One of these groups is Frank Gannett's Committee for Constitutional Government, which is not charged with lobbying in Washington, but does print paper-covered editions of various books, including John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead, for distribution to the public.

Now comes the Buchanan committee and demands a full account of this operation, with a list of all those who have paid for bulk orders of The Road Ahead. The justification of this procedure as, attempted by Representative BUCHANAN, is that Congress is influenced by public opinion, therefore it is necessary to investigate bodies which influence public opinion. For the moment, the committee seems to be concerned mainly with certain unpopular individuals and with large corporations. But if the Lobbying Act is to be stretched out of its commonly accepted interpretation to include efforts to persuade the people as a whole, what becomes of freedom of press and opinion?

Opposition to the machinations of the Buchanan committee has usually taken the form of refusal to produce the information demanded by the committee. Inasmuch as a committee of Congress can compel the surrender of almost any information it wants, this is likely to be futile. Unaccompanied by adequate explanation, it also creates the impression that the individuals subpenaed are trying to conceal something.

President W. C. Mullendore, of the Southern California Edison Co., did go to the bat with vigor on what he called the effort of the committee to "use intimidation in limiting the exercise of the right of free speech in opposing or supporting proposed legislation"; and the Committee for Constitutional Government took the ground that the Buchanan committee was interfering with its constitutional right as a publisher to immunity from unreasonable search and seizure. These were justified defenses, but more is required.

What is lacking is an offensive, more or less like that suggested by Frank Chodorov in Human Events. He quotes the Buchanan committee's statement that the Committee for Constitutional Government spent $1,571,240.72, or an average of $40,000 a month for the 38 months studied. Says Mr. Chodorov:

"Peanuts and fiddlesticks. Every hour of the day the agencies of the Government spend more than that monthly average to influence legislation, and the legislation they plug is to lengthen their tenure, increase their appropriations, better their emoluments, strengthen their hold on the public purse. * * * The biggest, most pernicious, most unscrupulous, and entirely selfish lobby in Washington is the Government. * * * Its list of contributors includes every man, woman, and child in the United States. And yet it has the effrontery to point the finger of scorn at an organization that digs up a piddling $40,000 a month for printing and distribution of literature * * *."

Let somebody add to the conventional lawyers' defense against the aggressions of the Buchanan committee something like this: "We challenge your authority under the Constitution, but we are not embarrassed or ashamed of what we are doing. John Flynn's The Road Ahead is an angry book, with here and there an excess of zeal, but it does expose the socialist nature of the Fair Deal program, an analysis already accepted by the British Labor Party. If there is any restriction in America on the right of persons, including corporations, to challenge the pretensions of a political group in this country, it hasn't yet been put in the form of law. Until freedom of speech has been outlawed by Congress, we intend to support our ideas by whatever authorities seem to us likely to arouse the people to their danger."

The only way the battle for a free economy will be won is by forthright resistance in terms that can be understood, not exclusively by demurrers and legal responses and applications for injunctions, important as these are. If the fight can be staged in an arena where people can see what punches are being thrown, free enterprise may have a chance. It certainly has none if its protagonists always make themselves look like bad boys talking their way out of something sly and discreditable.

BUCHANAN'S reply to editorial follows in letter form:

The EDITOR,
Saturday Evening Post,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Several errors of fact mar your August 19 editorial on the work of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, of which I have the honor to be chairman.

You endorse the argument of the Committee for Constitutional Government that our efforts to secure information from it interfered with its "constitutional right as a publisher to immunity from unreasonable search and seizure." As a publisher, however, you should have been able to distinguish between yourself and such groups as the Committee for Constitutional Government. A regular publisher takes the normal risks of operating a private business. He expects to pay income taxes on his receipts and does not seek tax-exemption, as does the Committee for Constitutional Government. He is in business for profit and is not primarily an advocate, grinding out printed matter which presents only one side of the subject. The ordinary publisher does not incessantly appeal to the public to bring pressure to bear on Members of Congress. It need not register and report under the Federal Lobbying Act as the Committee for Constitutional Government does. We have not charged that the Committee for Constitutional Government is engaged in lobbying; they have admitted it. As Edward A. Rumely, the group's executive secretary, told us: "We don't deny that." The issue should not be confused by the efforts of such organizations to conceal their objectives, their activities, and their backers from public scrutiny—particularly when they themselves claim to have exercised "decisive influence" on many pieces of legislation.

Not freedom of the press but simple honesty is at stake here. All that we ask is that those who seek to influence legislation stand up and be counted. Where there is nothing to hide, there is nothing to fear from full public knowledge of the facts.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK BUCHANAN,
Chairman, House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities.

The "Communist-led" Civil Rights Congress, an organization labeled as subversive by the Attorney General, takes a position so remarkably similar to that of the Committee for Constitutional Government as to make it appear they are actually allies in this attack. I am sure they are not. Nevertheless, after the Committee for Constitutional Government had protested that it was a violation of their constitutional rights for us to ask them where they got their money and from whom—that is, large sums of $500 or more or totals of $1,000 or more—the Civil Rights Congress came in here and said it was a violation of their constitutional rights to ask them for the same information.

Rumely of the CCG said his contributor would be harassed if their names were made public. Patterson of the Civil Rights Congress said the contributors to his organization would be harassed and persecuted if their names were made public. Rumely is afraid the Communists might try to smear contributors to the CCG; Patterson is afraid organizations like the CCG will smear the contributors to the Communist-led Civil Rights Congress.

It is an interesting situation. Because each of these groups fear extremists on the other side, they have independently decided that the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States have no right to information now required to be made public under the Lobbying Act, or information which an effective and clearcut Lobbying Act should require to be made public.

Other organizations engaged in mass pamphleteering propaganda on legislative issues have not felt that making public a list of their contributors would destroy the effectiveness of their organization or harm the reputations of their contributors. In other words, they are not ashamed of the causes they espouse and do not feel they have to conceal the sources of their funds. In our democracy where every citizen has the right to espouse any point of view he desires, there is inevitably an aura of suspicion surrounding concealment of this sort.

Continuing with an analysis of this paragraph in the Saturday Evening Post editorial, the editorial says that the justification of this procedure in asking CCG for the names of their contributors, the "justification" as "attempted" by me is that since Congress is influenced by public opinion, "therefore it is necessary to investigate bodies which influence public opinion."

I hope that is a little bit more than a justification. I hope it might also be regarded as something of an explanation. I would call the attention of the Saturday Evening Post editorial writers to the first public hearing ever held by the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities on March 27, 1950. Printed copies of these hearings have been available for some months. They have been widely distributed to the press and others.

Our very first witness was a distinguished professor at Princeton University, Dr. Hadley Cantril. He is a psychologist. His field is the psychology of public opinion. He was our opening witness. He was called to tell us about psychology of public opinion formation, how public opinion is formed and how it is measured. He was called on the theory that the factors which influence public opinion generally are very definitely factors which influence the legislative process. Members of Congress try to keep informed on the opinions of their constitutents and frequently are guided by those wants and desires and views. A concerted mass effort to influence opinion in a Congressman's district is a definite influence on legislation. That is basic.

This was not just my view. The ranking minority member of our committee, Mr. HALLECK, of Indiana, majority leader of the House in the Eightieth Congress, had this to say in reference to Dr. Cantrill's testimony and its relevancy to our investigation:

> I have always felt that a Congressman down here is in a kind of a dual position. He is charged first with exercising his own best judgment in the national interest, and, secondly, he should be constantly tempering that judgment with what he can conceive the majority sentiment of the people he represents. Now, in that consideration, of course, it is important that he be able to find out what the majority sentiment is, and, of course, insofar as majority sentiment may motivate his actions, then clearly the processes by which sentiment is created, the processes by which people believe one way or another, as you have pointed them out here, are important, so it seems to me, in any consideration that a committee like this might give to the over-all problem.

The Lobbying Act, Mr. Speaker, applies to organizations or individuals engaged in efforts to influence, directly or indirectly, the passage or defeat of any legislation by the Congress of the United States. There are, of course, many statutory exemptions. Again, however, we are not engaged in uncovering violations of this act; we are engaged in trying to find out whether the act is adequate. To know that, we must know what is being done in this field of indirect lobbying, not for purposes of regulating it, because we are not interested in regulating lobbying, but for purposes of making the act effective in keeping paid lobbying and organized, paid efforts to influence legislation out in the open where their sponsorship can be seen. And so it is true we are investigating bodies—lobbying organizations of one sort or another—which seek to influence public opinion.

But when the Saturday Evening Post says that our committee seems to be concerned mainly with certain unpopular individuals and with large corporations, that is not supported by the facts. That is completely off base. Again it represents sloppy research or no research at all. Certain unpopular individuals, if we can place Rumely and an individual who is now in jail, a Joseph P. Kamp, in that category, have defied this committee and refused to provide information to it and have protested that they have been singled out for persecution by this committee, and an executive of the Communist-led Civil Rights Congress has done and said the same, but numerous other individuals, popular or unpopular as the case may be, have appeared before us and not felt that they were singled out at all. Mr. Francis Biddle, former Attorney General of the United States who is now the chairman of Americans for Democratic Action, was subjected to the same sort of questioning and asked to provide the identical sort of information as all the other witnesses. Dr. Dewey Anderson, of the Public Affairs Institute, a liberal economist supporting administration programs was questioned in the same fashion. For every lobbyist or lobby which we have investigated on one side of the political avenue, we have investigated a counterpart lobbyist or lobby on the other; both were asked the same sort of questions; both were asked to provide the full financial detail on the organization; both were questioned as to techniques of influencing legislation; both were treated the same. So I cannot see how any reasonable observer could conscientiously say that for the moment, or at any time in our work, this committee has been concerned mainly with certain unpopular individuals and with large corporations.

The same sort of questionnaires which went to business corporations went to labor groups and farm groups. Virtually every national trade association has been asked for information about its legislative activities. We have had exhaustive investigations made into the activities of certain Government agencies accused of the improper or illegal expenditure of Federal funds for lobbying purposes. The Federal Security Administrator was personally summoned as a witness and subjected to a searching cross-examination of several hours, much of it very critical.

How then it could be said honestly that we are concerned mainly with "unpopular individuals and with large corporations" I do not know. We have been concerned mainly and exclusively with only one thing: lobbying activity.

The editorial continues in that same paragraph with a statement about stretching the Lobbying Act "out of its commonly accepted interpretation" to include efforts to persuade the people as a whole and asks what then becomes of freedom of press and opinion.

As a matter of fact the greatest difficulty this committee encounters is to get any reliable and forthright interpretation of the Lobbying Act as it is now written. The "commonly accepted interpretation" this editorial speaks of has been a very difficult one for us to discover. We are trying to make this act so clear that there will be more than a commonly accepted interpretation; we want it to be specific, clear and unmistakable in its actual meaning. In this reference the Saturday Evening Post has further demonstrated complete ignorance of our investigative problem.

And when it asks what becomes of freedom of press and opinion, the Saturday Evening Post asks a foolish question, because there is nothing in the Lobbying Act and there is nothing seriously proposed for insertion in the Lobbying Act to prevent the free expression by anyone—not just newspapers and magazines—from expressing views or lobbying or carrying on propaganda activities of any nature. Newspapers and other periodicals are specifically exempt from the act; the radio is not but in my opinion should be. We have no desire to restrict the full freedom of public discussion by anyone, including, of course, newspapers and magazines which are guaranteed that freedom by the Constitution.

So this argument boils down to a fallacy. In asking a lobbying organization where it gets its funds, we are not doing anything to restrict that organization from doing anything it cares to with those funds. The Committee for Constitutional Government and the Civil Rights Congress, however, maintain that the disclosure of their sources of support will destroy their effectiveness or restrict or hamper their freedom of action.

Can any truly American organization make such a claim and remain American in concept?

The next paragraph in the Saturday Evening Post editorial is interesting in that connection. It says:

> Opposition to the machinations of the Buchanan committee has usually taken the form of refusal to produce the information demanded by the committee. Inasmuch as a committee of Congress can compel the surrender of almost any information it wants, this is likely to be futile. Unaccompanied by adequate explanation, it also creates the impression that the individuals subpenaed are trying to conceal something.

When the Saturday Evening Post speaks of the opposition to the machinations of this committee, of my committee, as having usually taken the form of refusal to produce the information demanded the magazine should have pointed out, perhaps that this usual form of opposition is the form which has been used by three organizations: The Committee for Constitutional Government, the Constitutional Educational League, and the Civil Rights Congress. The editorial should have, perhaps, pointed out that all three followed this pattern for identical reasons, a pathological obsession against revealing their completely concealed sources of income. The obsession in each case is the result of fear—fear that disclosure of their sources of support will destroy them. The Saturday Evening Post editorial says that "unaccompanied by adequate explanation" this refusal to provide the information "creates the impression that the individuals subpenaed are trying to conceal something."

As a matter of plain fact, each of those three organizations has given what it regards as an adequate explanation for its refusal. And in each instance, as a matter of plain fact the explanation was forthright to this effect. They are trying to conceal something; they feel they must conceal. They have said so.

Now the Saturday Evening Post Editorial turns to a new direction. The next paragraph reads as follows:

> President W. C. Mullendore, of the Southern California Edison Co., did go to the bat with vigor on what he called the effort of the committee to use intimidation in limiting the exercise of the right of free speech in opposing or supporting proposed legislation—

I want to interrupt there. Mr. Mullendore was one of about 170 or 175 corporation executives to receive the questionnaire from us asking for information on the money they spent for influencing legislation. Mr. Mullendore considered this intimidation and an effort on our part to limit the right of his company in the exercise of free speech. Mr. Mullendore's letter of protest which he released to the press—as he had every right to do—was picked up by the Committee for Constitutional Government and reprinted and distributed by them throughout the country as evidence in support of the CCG's position that it should not give us the names of its contributors. As I told the House earlier in connection with Life magazine's use of this same incident in an editorial, there was no connection between the CCG investigation and the questionnaire distributed to business executives, although the CCG was one of a number of organizations specifically mentioned in that questionnaire. Mr. Mullendore shot from the hip in that letter, accusing us of seeking to limit his exercise of free speech merely by asking him what funds were spent by the Southern California Edison Co. in an effort to influence legislation. Mr. Mullendore has been very active personally in the Foundation for Economic Education. His company can contribute all the money it wants to to that or any other organization engaged in trying to influence legislative decision. But I do maintain that a committee of Congress investigating the extent of lobbying activity has a right to know about such expenditures, whether by business corporations, labor unions, professional organizations or Federal agencies. And Mr. Mullendore, it will be noted, was one of only three or four corporation executives throughout the country receiving our questionnaire who felt that the information requested was unwarranted.

The Saturday Evening Post does not say anything about the more than 150 corporations which gave us the information without any hesitation whatsoever.

But to continue with the editorial which I interrupted in the midst of a paragraph:

> and the Committee for Constitutional Government took the ground that the Buchanan committee was interfering with its constitutional right as a publisher from unreasonable search and seizure. These were justified defenses, but more is required.

If it is justified for the Committee for Constitutional Government to claim, as a "publisher" that it is immune against giving us information bearing on its lobbying activities—and remember this is an organization registered under the Lobbying Act as a lobbying organization—then it seems to me that the Saturday Evening Post has developed a novel theory about the limits of the powers of congressional investigating committees or else it has innocently swallowed a purely phony story planted—deliberately and assiduously planted—by this lobbying organization.

How any reputable newspaper or magazine could regard the Committee for Constitutional Government as a "simon pure" publisher is beyond me. The CCG was established exclusively for the purpose of influencing legislation. Its whole operation is designed to influence national policy. It is not a commercial operation; it is a nonprofit organization. It publishes books and pamphlets just as the Communist Party publishes books and pamphlets and for exactly the same reason—to sell a political viewpoint to the American people and to influence national policy. It is so close to being a political organization that I imagine it is on the border line of being subject to the Corrupt Practices Act, if not already subject to it.

I am amazed that the Saturday Evening Post would regard it as justified for such an organization to refuse to give a congressional committee the facts about its financial sources, the names of those who finance its operations. I am particularly amazed that the Saturday Evening Post would seek to so cheapen the philosophy of the first amendment to the Constitution as to wrap it like a cloak around an organization which publishes books and pamphlets as a means of spreading a political viewpoint, and to say that any activities of this organization are immune from investigation—immune from investigation, I emphasize, not just immune from any law restricting its freedom of expression or operation—but immune from investigation by Congress merely because it publishes some books. Carrying that philosophy to its ultimate, any newspaper or magazine could carry on any activity under the sun, including dope smuggling, and claim immunity from investigation under the first amendment. That is artificial and ridiculous

The editorial continues:

> What is lacking is an offensive, more or less like that suggested by Frank Chodorov in Human Events. He quotes the Buchanan committee's statement that the Committee for Constitutional Government spent $1,571,240.72, or an average of $40,000 a month for the 38 months studied. Says Mr. Chodorov:
> "Peanuts and fiddlesticks. Every hour of the day the agencies of the Government spend more than that monthly average to influence legislation, and the legislation they plug is to lengthen their tenure, increase their appropriations, better their emoluments, strengthen their hold on the public purse. * * * The biggest, most pernicious, most unscrupulous and entirely selfish lobby in Washington is the Government. * * * Its lists of contributors includes every man, woman and child in the United States. And yet it has the effrontery to point the finger of scorn at an organization that digs up a piddling $40,000 a month for printing and distribution of literature."

I gather from these two paragraphs of the editorial that the offensive suggested by Mr. Chodorov and by the Saturday Evening Post is to prove that it is not necessary to investigate lobbying by private groups because the Government, or Government officials or employees also engage in efforts to influence legislation; that it is not necessary to have a law requiring that lobbyists operate in the open because Government agencies or Government officials also seek to influence legislation.

This committee is aware of the fact that Government agencies and Government employees spend a great deal of time seeking to influence legislation. Not only that, we have been investigating some of these efforts and some of these operations. There is a criminal law prohibiting the use, except under certain circumstances, of Federal funds for the purpose of seeking to influence Congress.

We have been investigating alleged specific violations of that law. We have been investigating also the so-called proper type of lobbying by Government agencies, for we on this committee recognize not only that Government agencies have a right to express views to Congress, but that in fact they have a duty to give the Congress the benefits of their experience and views on current legislative issues. In a broad sense that is lobbying and it is similar to private lobbying of the kind that we have investigated.

But what does all this have to do with an offensive against the purposes of this committee in seeking to find out how lobbying operates? For one thing the editorial is downright dishonest, or at least clearly uninformed, in stating that the Government, presumably meaning this committee of Congress, has had the effrontery to point the finger of scorn at an organization for having collected $40,000 a month for lobbying purposes. The scorn has been reserved for the refusal of the Committee for Constitutional Government to stand up like an American organization, rather than hide like an underground movement, stand up and show us all where their money comes from and who contributes that money. It is interesting that the Communists have the same reluctance to comply with the American tradition of operating in the open.

Now let us continue again with the Saturday Evening Post editorial:

> Let somebody add to the conventional lawyers' defense against the aggressions of the Buchanan committee something like this: "We challenge your authority under the Constitution, but we are not embarrassed or ashamed of what we are doing"—

Outside of that reference to aggressions of the Buchanan committee, so far that sounds interesting, so let us continue with the Saturday Evening Post's proposed draft of a statement for the Committee for Constitutional Government to address to us:

"John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead"—

> "is an angry book, with here and there an excess of zeal, but it does expose the Socialist nature of the Fair Deal program, an analysis already accepted by the British Labor Party. If there is any restriction in America on the right of persons, including corporations, to challenge the pretensions of a political group in this country, it hasn't yet been put in the form of law. Until freedom of speech has been outlawed by Congress, we intend to support our ideas by whatever authorities seem to us likely to arouse the people to their danger."

That statement is the Saturday Evening Post's idea of what an effective rejoinder by the Committee for Constitutional Government to this committee would have said. Strangely enough, it happens to be much along the lines of the constant barrage of statements out of the Committee for Constitutional Government about this committee of the House and our demand for pertinent, relevant information about their lobbying activities and sources of funds.

It follows the CCG line in insisting that, by asking where the organization gets the funds it uses for mass distribution of its one-sided literature, we are trying to suppress the distribution of these books. How does that follow?

The fact is that the CCG itself fears that disclosure, that publicity about this operation, will ruin its effectiveness and kill the market for its publications. No other lobbying organization which came before us, except the Communist-led Civil Rights Congress, took such a dim view of the repercussions from having the public know where its money comes from.

Would people refuse to buy the Flynn book and distribute it if they knew this whole operation was a big-business front, for instance? Or because some very prominent industrialists put up a lion's share of CCG's funds?

I cannot answer that question. I do not know the answer. Obviously, however, the Committee for Constitutional Government fears any "exposure" about its supporters for the obvious reason that it believes such disclosure will dry up the sources of its support.

The Foundation for Economic Education, supported largely by contributions from leading American industries, was willing to give us the names and amounts of these contributions. It takes the position that the material it puts out is useful and honest; it is not ashamed of its work. It feels that even though people know that General Motors or United States Steel or some other industrial giant has subsidized some of its publications, people will nonetheless read these pamphlets for the information they contain or the expositions they make.

Similarly, the Public Affairs Institute, supported largely by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and with funds also from other unions, has no hesitation about allowing these facts to be known to the people who read the institute's pamphlets on point 4 or on labor relations or on anything else.

But the Committee for Constitutional Government and the Civil Rights Congress flock together in refusing to reveal this information to a committee of Congress for fear of what disclosure will do to its effectiveness.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, we on the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities are not concerned how many thousands or millions of copies of any pamphlet or book the Committee for Constitutional Government put out into the channels of public discussion. All we want to know is: who pays for them?

There is no law that says that corporations cannot engage in lobbying activity. There is a law which says that corporations cannot spend corporate funds in political campaigns. The same applies to unions. Some of this so-called lobbying activity, on both sides of the street, is getting awfully close to the poltical expenditure border line, but that is an enforcement problem for enforcement agencies, not for us. We have looked into it only for the purpose of educating ourselves to the realities of modern-day lobbying techniques.

But how it can be said honestly that we are in any fashion whatsoever violating the right of freedom of speech or transgressing on it, by asking these lobbying organizations where they get their funds is a question which I cannot answer, although the CCG has tried valiantly to raise the issue and to answer it also. And the Saturday Evening Post unknowingly, I hope—I hope it was unknowingly—seems to have fallen for that "plant."

The concluding paragraph of the editorial charts a proposed course of action, as follows:

> The only way the battle for a free economy will be won is by forthright resistance in terms that can be understood, not exclusively by demurrers and legal responses and applications for injunctions, important as these are. If the fight can be staged in an arena where people can see what punches are being thrown, free enterprise may have a chance. It certainly has none if its protagonists always make themselves look like bad boys talking their way out of something sly and discreditable.

That ends the Saturday Evening Post editorial on this subject on how free enterprise can remain free only if it gets behind an organization like the Committee for Constitutional Government and supports that organization in refusing to tell a committee of Congress where its funds come from. I certainly disagree with that thesis, and I think most businessmen and free enterprisers would join me in disagreeing with it. The Congress has a right to know what forces are operating in America and how they operate to influence national policy. We have a right and a duty to know what the Communists are doing. We have a right and a duty to know what extremists on the other side are doing. And we have a right and a duty to know what middle-of-the-roaders organized into mass pressure campaigns for in most cases wholly commendable purposes are also doing and how they do it.

The Saturday Evening Post in this editorial I have just cited has, I believe, unwittingly struck a deep and damaging blow at the cardinal American principle of forthright and honest discussion of national affairs, of open-and-above-board political and economic debate and discussion of full disclosure of the interests behind mass movements of all kinds. We cannot have free and open discussions and debate and free choice of opinion and view if our people are unable to find out the names of those sponsoring the distribution of opinion-forming material, and thus assess the motives behind those views.

The full disclosure required in principle by the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act is one of our best devices for increasing rather than decreasing public interest in national affairs. Instead of being skeptical or suspicious of the views of organized pressure groups because they do not know who is behind them, the people can see for themselves now that many lobbying groups whom they otherwise might suspect of selfish interest are supported largely by groups and individuals with no selfish ax to grind, with no special-interest ambition.

Pressure groups which hide, which operate in the dark, cannot help but breed suspicion about their motives. They deserve suspicion.

The Saturday Evening Post, I am afraid, has come to the defense of such groups by advising them to stay hidden, keep concealed, go underground, and to tell the Congress, and through us, the American people, to go jump in the lake when we inquire about their make-up and structure.

That is not the sort of reaction I would expect from a magazine which enjoys such tremendous mass acceptance in America, a magazine which has been built to its present eminence by a publisher who years ago led a crusade against the false advertising of patent medicines and similar nostrums. Much of the credit for the passage of the Food and Drug Act belonged to Cyrus H. K. Curtis. He crusaded through his publications for an end to the untrammeled right of quacks and crooks to offer adulterated or misbranded or dangerous remedies to the American people in medicine bottles. He crusaded against the false advertising which promoted sales of these nostrums by fooling, and eventually killing, the people who bought them.

That is a proud heritage for a magazine. In this instance, however, the Saturday Evening Post has allowed itself to be used by fake nostrum peddlers in a campaign to avoid disclosure of the true facts about their so-called remedies—in this case, where the money comes from to put out these political patent medicines.

The Saturday Evening Post, in its last sentence, said that free enterprise supporters have been fighting us with legal means. Actually, we had one legal action against us: from the Committee for Constitutional Government. It was thrown out of court. Free enterprise, in my book, is not synonymous with the Committee for Constitutional Government. The quicker free enterprisers find out that this outfit is strictly an underground movement intent on remaining hidden and concealed, the more intelligently free enterprise, so-called, can defend its legitimate interests in the realm of national policy.

Foreign Policy on Imports Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL V. MACK

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the clumsy, bumbling acts of the Truman administration with its lack of a foreign policy, and particularly lack of a foreign-trade policy, were spotlighted by three developments last week.

The longshoremen union in New York City and later in Boston refused to handle and unload shipments of canned Russian crabmeat that are known to be the products of slave and forced labor. Later a shipment of Russian furs were likewise embargoed. As a Member of Congress, I cannot support a violation of a Federal law, but so far as I know the union did not violate any Federal statute—but rather sought to enforce one that has been on the books for over 20 years. There is in the Tariff Act of 1930 a clear prohibition against the entry into any port of the United States any product of slave or forced labor. The Secretary of the Treasury and his Chief of the Bureau of Customs have had the situation called to their attention. It has also been called to the attention of the State Department, whose Assistant Secretary had testified at Lake Success that there were known instances of slave and forced labor in all of the Communist countries. But, while the Treasury promised to investigate last March, the State Department fell back on the excuse that apparently there existed a market for foreign-canned crabmeat in the United States.

It is my firm belief that the longshoremen union or any other group should not make nor determine our foreign policy nor assume the enforcement of Federal laws. But why do we permit Federal officials charged with enforcement of the laws to shirk and avoid their duty, brazenly and openly defying Congress, sometimes resorting to legalistic interpretations to justify their inaction.

It is clear that Russia is endeavoring to build up her war potential and is buying critical materials and supplies wherever she can. The skyrocketing prices of rubber and tin are two instances of their activities. The dollars earned by imports of furs, crabmeat, and other luxuries are being used for just this purpose. The action of the Commerce Department last week in requiring export licenses on over a thousand items of a critical nature is complete confirmation.

The Wall Street Journal last Friday carried a report from their correspondent in Frankfurt, Germany, stating that Allied occupation officials had ordered a drastic crackdown on shipments of strategic and industrial goods from western Germany to Russia and her satellites. It is obvious that the decision and the action had the approval of the Truman administration and the State Department.

It would appear that the Truman administration has had another change in policy—but has it? The direct action would call for the cutting off of imports from Red Russia and her Red satellites. Stop the dollar-earning imports and you will practically wipe out the trade in critical raw materials and supplies not only here but in western Europe and throughout the world. Such action is possible through the enforcement of section 307 of the Tariff Act of 1930 banning imports of slave and forced labor. Just why does the Truman administration, its State Department, and its Treasury Department refuse to enforce the law?

Concerning the embargo on shipment of western Germany goods behind the iron curtain while the Allied Council permits other western powers to ship goods behind the iron curtain, the Wall Street Journal, on August 18, 1950, carried the following interesting dispatch:

EMBARGO GERMAN EXPORTS

(By Edward Hughes)

FRANKFURT.—Allied occupation authorities here have ordered a new and drastic crackdown on shipments of strategic and industrial goods from west Germany to Russia's eastern European satellites.

This may be the first important step in a coordinated United States-western Europe drive to keep such goods out of Russian hands.

In Paris, a study is under way to set up a universal list of restricted items. The United States and western Europe—presumably including west Germany—would be expected to abide by this list.

If this goes through, it will amount to economic sanctions against the Communist part of the world.

NEW ORDER COMING

In the last few days, the American-British-French control group in Frankfurt has issued a confidential order bluntly canceling the practically unlimited authority the German federal government was granted over exports of ball bearings and synthetic rubber compounds 3 months ago. The Germans don't know it yet but the Allied High Commission is also planning to issue another order further restricting the Bonn government's control over the export of strategic commodities, including nonferrous metals and products and possibly scrap iron and steel.

Allied officials are angry at the Bonn government. In the past 90 days it has permitted a flood of ball bearings, machinery, rubber compounds, and metals to pour eastward to Russian controlled Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria.

This is considered a bald violation of instructions issued when Allied controls were relaxed May 10. Until that date German exporters and manufacturers were required to submit requests for the export of strategic war potential goods to an Allied export control working party for screening before actual shipment. This board imposed tight restrictions on shipments to east Europe.

Commodities on a small secret list must still get Allied approval before export, but the shipment of a large number of items of lesser strategic importance was removed from Allied prior scrutiny and turned over to Bonn for screening. Under this May 10 directive, Bonn is required to see to it that shipment of these items eastward is not substantial in quantity.

WANTED TIGHT CONTROL

"We had hoped the German Government would take this job off our hands and keep a tight control on eastern exports," says an allied official. He adds dryly: "This hope has not borne fruit." That's why Allied High Commission officials decided secretly to take over the control of many of these items after a series of meetings here 2 weeks ago.

German officials who have learned of the Allied orders are highly vexed. They charge discrimination in such matters will cripple the German economy. The Germans point to the fact that many of these restricted items can be purchased by eastern European countries at will in Britain and France.

"Why should we lose this business to the victorious Allies?" the Germans ask.

Allied officials admit it's unjust. They contend, however, the discrimination against Germany will soon be removed when the United States-western Europe superlist of restricted items now being worked out in Paris is completed.

At any rate, the increase in west Germany's east-bound exports of potential war materials—as they're classified by the Allies—has been astounding.

"In the first 21 days after the export-control authority was handed over to the Germans," says a High Commission official, "more ball bearings and rubber compounds were shipped to east Europe than in the entire previous 5 months when the control was in Allied hands."

SHIPMENTS UP TENFOLD

No figures are yet available for July and it is difficult to find comparable figures for the earlier part of this year. But some June statistics show the trend. According to the German Government's own figures, the shipment of ba'l bearings and roller bearings to five satellites during June increased tenfold over the May exports from west Germany. June shipments were valued at $101,000, compared with $9,000 worth in May. The bulk of the June shipments went to Hungary, which got $94,000 worth of west German ball bearings and roller bearings. It had gotten none at all in the previous 12 months, officials say.

Look at the rubber compounds. Bulgaria received $61,000 worth in June this year after getting none in May or in the previous year. The total west German rubber compound shipments to five Eastern European puppets in June was $120,000 worth, which is double the May figure.

Carbon black, important rubber compound chemical agent, was shipped out of West Bulgaria and Rumania during June to the tune of $38,000, with most of it going to Hungary and a bit to Czechoslovakia. In May just $1,000 worth of carbon black went to these nations. In the entire previous year, none at all was shipped to them.

Barium compound, lead compound, sodium compound and nickel compound moved in this West-East pattern in the amount of $52,000 during May. This more than doubled in June to $127,000. Crude iron and pig iron and semi-finished iron goods increased from $430,000 in May to $664,000 in value in June. The comparable figures for April are not available, but officials say shipments in that month were much lower than in either May or June.

MORE INCREASES

In June shipments of these products to the Czechs trebled its May volume, those to the Rumanians doubled. The June shipments of steel pipe to Hungary were five times the May level, while electrical equipment exports to the same satellites increased seven times.

Allied officials are not sure yet how tight they'll pull the knot on German exports to the East, but they plan to send their second restrictive order to Bonn in the next week or two. Under this expected order, as well as under the terms of the first order sent a few days ago, all applications for shipments of restricted items must again be sent to the High Commission before approval and shipment. The Allies will reject a large number of these applications, it's said.

The problem facing officials is how to set a hard and fast rule governing the shipments. What makes a commodity strategic? "I can't tell you, and neither can anyone else," says an official who'll have to deal with the applications. The instructions to Bonn were to prevent shipments of the items on the secret restricted list in substantial quantity. "What is substantial quantity depends on the time and place," this official explains cryptically.

He makes it clear, however, that shipments permitted by Bonn in the past 90 days have definitely been substantial. He further alleges the German Government has indulged in a skulduggery to conceal the size of some individual orders from the High Commission's prying eyes. The High Commission recently discovered one application for a very large shipment to the East had been broken down into several small applications and approved by the German Government.

REPORT FROM WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON.—The Commerce Department's export-control program has been "under review," since the Korean crisis, to decide whether it is working satisfactorily, and whether any products should be added to, or subtracted from, the control lists. But officials insist "no broad shift in policy is contemplated at this time."

From the end of the war until March 1, 1948, export controls were used exclusively to "protect the domestic economy." Many things were scarce in this country, and the export restrictions were used to prevent these from being shipped abroad.

But in March 1948 there was a shift in the policy. A ban was placed on shipping strategic goods to unfriendly countries, specifically Russia and her satellites.

This ban is carried out as follows: Items deemed having strategic importance are placed on the Commerce Department's "positive" list. This means that a license must be obtained for any goods on the list.

For the hottest items on the "positive" list there are two further classifications: The "R" list and the "RO" list. The "R" list includes all items which cannot be shipped outside the Western Hemisphere. The "RO" list covers items which can only be shipped to Canada.

The Defense Department controls all shipments of military matériels and the Atomic Energy Commission all atomic items. Commerce Department is only in control of commercial goods.

The Commerce Department screens all materials for potential strategic importance. For example, most foodstuffs and textiles can be shipped without a license because it is considered they have no immediate strategic value. But parachute cloth can only be exported with a license, and, although most tires can be shipped freely, restrictions are maintained on bulletproof tires and tires that could be used on military vehicles.

Children's Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit for publication in the RECORD the attached article, entitled "In Behalf of Children," which appeared in the August 13 issue of the St. Clare Bulletin, edited by Rev. P. L. Colgan, O. S. A., pastor of St. Clare Parish, Grosse Pointe Park, Mich., which is my home parish. The article follows:

IN BEHALF OF CHILDREN

Parents and those in charge of children would do well to ponder a statement recently issued by the New York Youth Commission. The statement contains a Children's Bill of Rights, as follows:

1. The right to the affection and intelligent guidance of understanding parents.

2. The right to be raised in a decent home in which he or she is adequately clothed and sheltered.

3. The right to the benefits of religious guidance and training.

4. The right to a school program which, in addition to sound academic training, offers maximum opportunity for individual development.

5. The right to receive constructive discipline for the proper development of good character, conduct and habits.

6. The right to be secure in his or her community against all influences detrimental to wholesome development.

7. The right to individual selection of free and wholesome recreation.

8. The right to live in a community in which adults practice the belief that the welfare of their children is of primary importance.

9. The right to receive adult good example.

10. The right to a job, commensurate with his or her ability, training and experience, and protection against physical or moral employment hazards which adversely affect wholesome development.

11. The right to early diagnosis and treatment of physical handicaps and mental and social maladjustments at public expense, whenever necessary.

To which we might add this conclusion: Those in charge of children who, deliberately failing in their responsibilities, transgress these rights, will have a frightening account to render to the God who said: "Suffer the little children to come to Me."

MacArthur Not Consulted on Korea Before Attack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following article refutes the innuendo that the debacle in Korea is General MacArthur's responsibility. I am including the article as part of my remarks. It appeared in the Washington Times-Herald on Sunday, August 20:

MACARTHUR HAD NO SAY IN KOREA BEFORE WAR—STATE DEPARTMENT ASSUMED COMPLETE CONTROL OF OUR INTERESTS, SAYS STAFF OFFICER

The following is a quote from a letter by a member of General MacArthur's staff in Tokyo. It reveals that the State Department assumed complete control over American interests in Korea and did not keep the far eastern commander informed of any developments before hostilities started. The letter was released to the Times-Herald yesterday by its recipient, a man of high repute in Washington:

"Prior to the President's decision to intervene militarily, General MacArthur had no more responsibility or authority as to Korea than did Drew Pearson.

"Even before the inauguration of the republic, the State Department assumed complete control over American interests and responsibilities in that area, it being excluded from this theater's strategic and administrative responsibilities.

"Thereafter the military advisory group which remained to assist in the organization, equipping and training of the South Korean forces came under the American Ambassador at Seoul, without operational, administrative, or even liaison channels to General MacArthur's headquarters.

"The basic policy of the United States against undertaking military operations in Korea, as was the decision to restrict the type of arms and equipment to be supplied the Korean forces to the requirements of internal order, was made in Washington, without the slightest references here as to either.

"The order to commit American air and naval forces, while most fully supported by the general as providing a dramatic base for the enunciation of a positive American policy against further Communist expansion in Asia, was received without the slightest prior consultation. Nor did the general send in any prior views or recommendations on the Korean situation.

"There is not the slightest truth in Pearson's statements, and they are undoubtedly but a continuation of the efforts to undermine public confidence in the general, which has been the aim of the radical fringe in the United States for so many years. Senator KNOWLAND touched upon this question of responsibility in answering Ickes' charges in the New Republic, and I am sending a copy of his comments taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in case you failed to note them."

What To Do About Communists and Fellow Travelers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of August 22, 1950:

THE ANTI-COMMUNIST BILLS

The Senate now has before it three distinct and rival measures dealing with subversive activities of Communists and their sympathizers. These are: The Mundt-Ferguson bill (S. 2311), the McCarran omnibus bill (S. 4037), and the administration bill (S. 4061). The first two differ fundamentally from the third in that the former impose general sanctions against Communists and Communist fronters, while the latter, correcting some specific defects of existing law, reflects the view that sweeping legislation would be "unnecessary, ineffective, and dangerous." We are inclined to think that, on the whole, the administration viewpoint is the correct one at the present time. We believe that close scrutiny of the Mundt-Ferguson and McCarran bills will show why this is so.

These measures have as one of their two principal joint features a provision making it a crime to conspire to perform any act that would "substantially contribute" to formation in the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship under foreign control. This language is so vague that it seems to us it could be used to impose restraints on freedom such as the American people have not known in 150 years. In any case, it would seem advisable before passing legislation of this type at least to await the final decision of the Supreme Court on the Smith Act, which prohibits conspiracy to advocate the forcible overthrow of the Government, and which has already been used to convict 11 leaders of the Communist Party.

The other principal joint feature of the Mundt-Ferguson and McCarran bills is the registration requirement they would impose on all Communists and on Communist-front organizations. The danger here is that the registration provisions might be used to destroy incipient political parties or even existing organizations advocating unpopular causes which may or may not be on the Communist fringe. This in our opinion approaches too closely to a possible regimentation of the American political structure along more or less orthodox party lines.

The primary objective of this legislation, and one with which we emphatically agree, is to render the Communists harmless, to destroy whatever potentialities they might have of forcibly overthrowing the American Government. But would these registration provisions accomplish that purpose? Those Communists and Communist sympathizers who would register are already known to the authorities and those who are not would doubtless remain underground. It is quite possible, in fact, that the whole party would be driven underground by this legislation, in which case it might become considerably more dangerous than it is at present.

In addition to the provisions already discussed, the McCarran bill contains in entirety a drastic and senseless immigration measure that has already passed the Senate (S. 1832) but which, as we have said before, is fundamentally antidemocratic. It contains other sections of lesser importance, some of which are, in fact, included in the administration bill. These involve a tightening of espionage, registration, military security, and deportation laws.

In considering all of this anti-Communist legislation it must be remembered that the primary Communist danger to the United States comes from an imperialist aggressive world power—Soviet Russia. A secondary danger comes from agents of that power who may be found principally (but by no means exclusively) within the American Communist Party and its controlled organizations. There is virtually no danger from the Communists as a domestic political party. In what Justice Holmes has called the competition of the market, the Communists have been able to win virtually no office of national importance. It is in the area of espionage, sabotage, and subversion that we have to fear the Communists inside this country. But it is precisely in these fields that we have ample legislation (subject to minor improvement) such as the treason, espionage, sabotage, naturalization, and registration laws, as well as the loyalty program for Government employees and various administrative regulations to boot.

Is it wise, then, to adopt legislation which is couched in language so broad that it could seriously infringe upon individual liberty, which could set a precedent for interference with the traditional freedom of political parties or political organization, which as a practical matter might defeat its own purpose, and which at the present time is not necessary for the defense of our institutions? The freedoms of the American political system have cost too much in centuries of blood, sweat, and tears to be discarded or even endangered just because we want to take action against a contemptible and puny band of misguided zealots within our borders. When and if they become a threat to public order, then will be the time to move against them. Meanwhile, we urge the American people not to strike out in blind fear or fury, thereby undermining, as President Truman has said, the very internal security they seek to protect. To do so might give us an emotional satisfaction. But there would not be one Communist less in the country.

School Housing Problem, Moon Township School District, Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. FULTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

CORAOPOLIS, PA.

Hon. JAMES G. FULTON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

We urge your support of S. 2317 in House and shall appreciate advice as to action taken by House. Our wartime defense-housing project increases our school enrollment by an average of 485 pupils. The Federal Government built one six-room building to take care of these children. Our district's legal bonding power is insufficient to provide the funds for the building we need and have planned. S. 2317 is designed to aid districts such as ours.

MOON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT,

Women of America Oppose Socialism and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, less than 5 years since terrible World War II we find our Nation again in war largely the result of misguided policies on the part of our national leaders who lost the peace at Yalta and Potsdam through their appeasement of Russia. Lost the peace at the close of the war that had cost the lives of 332,000 of our finest American young men with 1,000,000 wounded.

At the conference of Yalta near the close of the war, the then President, assisted by Alger Hiss of the State Department and others, permitted Russia to be put in the driver's seat in western Europe, and given control of Manchuria and the northern half of Korea which has spread the iron curtain of communism over 300,000,000 people of China.

Notwithstanding the Congress appropriated $85,000,000,000 for defense since the close of the war, the administration has little to show for the money spent. We were caught unprepared in Korea causing the loss of the lives of many of our soldiers. Today our heroic soldiers are fighting desperately with their backs to the ocean against 60,000 well-equipped Korean Communists who are making a desperate attempt to annihilate or capture them.

Regardless of the blundering mistakes that have brought this situation about, every resource of our Government must be placed behind the war effort to protect as far as possible the American soldiers who are doing the fighting, many of whom will continue to sacrifice their lives in the defense of our country.

In every effort to prosecute the war the Members of Congress and the people must and will support every military effort of the Government, till victory is won.

On the home front the Congress must cut out every unnecessary Government expense in an effort to keep our Nation in a sound financial condition, so that those who return will have as sound a government as possible to come back to, where they can again engage in peacetime pursuits.

While our soldiers are fighting communism abroad we must win the fight against socialism and communism at home. The women and mothers of American soldiers have become aroused at the ease with which Communists infiltrate and secure employment in the Federal Government, where they have stolen our atomic secrets, passed them on to Russia, making it possible for them to produce the atomic bomb and hasten world war III.

Mr. Speaker, fortunately the women of America are becoming aroused against the encroachment of socialism as well as communism.

They see socialistic political forces at work that would invade the American home, lower the standard of living, threaten the health of her family and, through higher prices and heavier taxes, dissipate the life savings she and her husband have provided for the future.

While we regret to see our women provoked to anger, it may help to preserve the American way of life and protect the American home. Because, when the women become sufficiently aroused, they will wield their political brooms and do something about it.

Hundreds of women from all types of homes, and the officers of various women's clubs have written me expressing their opposition to certain proposed legislation. I am glad to see the women taking a greater interest in Government and politics. Their help is needed today as never before to stop the creeping paralysis of socialism. They will decide the result of the coming election.

Mr. Speaker, the women have a very great stake in our Government, which places upon them a great responsibility. They are willing, capable and ready to assume that responsibility.

Women outnumber the men in voting strength. Women own outright, or are beneficiaries of 75 percent of all the stocks in the corporations of this country. They are the beneficiaries of 80 percent of all life insurance in America. They purchase 75 percent of all the consumers goods purchased in the Nation.

They are the strongest and most powerful influence to resist the left-wing, socialistic and communistic forces that today threaten to destroy this Republic.

The influence and power of the women who direct their homes, take a keen interest in the schools and the education of their children, and make such a great contribution through their church organizations for the moral uplift of their communities, are building our citizens of the future.

They are opposed to certain proposed legislation and policies of government that threaten the Nation.

SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

Socialized medicine, which would increase the cost of medical care and lower the type of medical service rendered, is a threat to her children and the members of her family. She will resist that threat at the ballot box. The welfare and health of her children and members of her family come first.

Mr. Speaker, many of us here in Congress who have seen the purchasing power of the dollar, since 1940 to the present time, reduced to 58 cents because of the waste, taxing, and spending of this administration, welcome the help of the women in this campaign.

Women throughout the Nation realize that their life insurance and securities which were bought from the family savings to protect the widows and children are now worth only 58 cents on the dollar in purchasing power.

They want to see the value of their savings and securities restored to their 100 percent purchasing power. They realize that the high cost of living and inflation has been brought about by the Government spending billions more each year than it collects in revenue to run the Government.

The women of America whose sons are being called to fight to stop communism abroad, demand that this administration drive Communists out of the Federal Government, and at long last really do something constructive to stop the spread of communism in this country.

They demand that the constant drifting of this country down the road to socialism be stopped before it is too late. We who have led the fight against communism and socialism in the Congress welcome the timely and effective support of the women in this crusade to save the American way of life.

The women realize, as well as the men, that we must stop spending more than we take in, stop mortgaging the future and opportunity of our young people, and try to maintain the financial solvency of our Government.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Parent Teachers Association, Daughters of the American Revolution, women's auxiliaries of the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars, and various other women's organizations have passed resolutions condemning compulsory health insurance, or socialized medicine, is an evidence of the determination of the women of America to exert a greater influence in the coming election than possibly ever before.

Transcript of Proceedings in Case of Alice Heroux Versus Harold Heroux

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW JACOBS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following transcript of proceedings in the circuit court of the State of Oregon for the county of Multnomah:

Question. But he is able to work?

Answer. Yes.

Question. When is the last time he provided for the children?

Answer. He never did, really. When I left him, he has never supported them, since I left him.

Question. He has never paid anything towards their support?

Answer No.

Question. But he had an income and could have supported them during the past 2 years, had he wanted to?

Answer. Yes.

The COURT. You may take your decree of divorce, the care, custody, and control of the minor children and the defendant will be directed to pay $75 a month toward the support of the children until the further order of the court, and I will have an extra copy of the transcript of the testimony in this case sent to Congressman JACOBS, of Indiana, the House Office Building, Washington, D. C., who has a bill in Congress now before the committee, to control that and get deserting fathers to support their children. If the bill is passed, we can follow the fathers wherever we find them and not only require fathers to assume their responsibilities toward their children, but undoubtedly save millions of dollars now given to the support of children by these States.

Certified: A true transcript.

The Freedom To Be Free

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend, I wish to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-challenging paper by a prairie political philosopher, Mr. B. M. Maunders, of Virgil, S. Dak.

Mr. Maunders is a frequent contributor to the readers' columns of our South Dakota papers and his writings are widely read. In telling me how he came to write the following article, he said:

I am really an independent voter who was misled by a fireside chat reference to Andrew Jackson which said "What Jackson started has not yet been finished," but who got off the New Deal bandwagon when, after observing certain financial manipulations early in New Deal days, I concluded I had been listening to double talk.

"In stepping out from the New Deal," Mr. Maunders writes, "while not leaving any political job, I exercised the same right 'to take a walk' that has been used by Al Smith, James Farley, and some others."

Mr. Maunders' article written "In Remembrance of 1776" on the Fourth of July 1950, follows:

IN REMEMBRANCE OF 1776

The text in this instance is taken from the pen of the man who wrote The Crisis. As stated: "Man has no property in man, neither has any generation a property in the generations which are to follow."

This writing therefore, is done because of quite frequent specious reference to the common man, and is offered as material for study by anyone whom, for reasons which of necessity may have been beyond his or her control, might be misled thereby.

For a long time preceding our noteworthy 1776, it may have been customary to use the "common man" designation through a popular belief in a lower strata of humanity. This belief, however, was upset with the epochal first draft of the Declaration of Independence appearing in a Philadelphia newspaper under the title "A Serious Thought" and over the name of "An Englishman."

PAINE AND JEFFERSON

Then, with Thomas Jefferson being the generally accepted author of the writ ratified under the title "The Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America," the question arose as to who actually wrote that memorable set of principles. But the question evidently was answered by the person who stated that: "Whosoever wrote it, Thomas Paine was its author."

Who wrote what however, is of little importance to anyone familiar with the humanitarian persuasions of both Paine and Jefferson. What seems of greater consequence is the fact that those persuasions were written in, and "A Serious Thought" had reached full expression in what afterwards became known as the Declaration of Independence.

Upon the basis of all this, it is not out of line to assume that the conclusions of both Paine and Jefferson were written into that Declaration wherein "all men" became the "common" denominator.

Paine—to whom the term "common man" might have been applied, and Jefferson, the aristocratic sage of Monticello, who later feeling that something was amiss in the Constitution, fathered the Bill of Rights incorporated in that instrument.

The conclusion within our text, along with the American trinity, the right to life, the right to liberty, and the right to the pursuit of happiness, is the foundation upon which the institution known as the United States of America was built, all of which proclaims the right of each man to live by his work as a free moral agent, and in that status enjoy the fruits of his work.

Jefferson, whose settled belief was: "That government is best that governs least," enumerated the forms of government existing among men as:

"Societies exist under three forms sufficiently distinguishable. 1. Without government, as among our Indians. 2. Under governments wherein the will of everyone has a just influence, as in the case of England in a slight degree, and in our States in a greater one. 3. Under governments by force; as in the case of all other monarchies and in most of the other republics. It is a problem, not clear in my mind, that the first is not the best. But I believe it to be inconsistent with any great degree of population."

MANNA FROM ON HIGH

Today we have the great degree of population and two schools of thought on parade as to the merits and demerits of government using a tax lever as means of showing how Uncle Sam can obligate himself out of debt, and in one time and two motions make the recipient of a Federal hand-out believe it is manna from on high.

It has been written that: "The mother of the useful arts is want; the mother of the fine arts is plenty." And proof thereof is found in the Gothic period (1150–1450), of which Prof. Rene Thevenin, eminent French scientist stated:

"After 6 centuries of misery and horror came the expansion of the three glorious centuries of the Middle Ages, one of the greatest periods of art and faith in the history of humanity, accompanied by the building of marvelous cathedrals, rivaling the greatest masterpieces of all time and all countries. This magnificent development carried the mind of man to heights which it has not often attained in history."

Within every human being is the urge to self-expression. That is self-interest, the economic driving force, further recognized as justified egoism. Then there is selflessness, or self-interested devotion to the rights of others in all matters of a public nature; the gateway to spiritual attainment and satisfaction after material wants are satisfied. These are the God-given motors of life—the basis of morals in a free society.

However, we have selfishness also to consider—unbalanced regards for me—without respect to the rights of others; a border line case of creed, or gumming up of the motors of life which, primarily, is responsible for too many being forced to forever have hand on the throttle, eye on the rail, shoulder to the wheel, and nose on the grindstone, in an effort to keep body and soul together without recourse to adhesive tape or safety pins—and at the expense of "spiritual attainment and satisfaction."

Such a situation may reasonably be assumed as one of the foremost factors lending truth to a statement by Representative FRANCIS CASE in a talk at Huron almost a year ago on the loss of moral values.

At this point, let's reexamine the statement anent the right of each man to live by his work as a free moral agent, and in that status enjoy the fruits of his work.

Briefly, to a thoroughgoing American, life without liberty is a rather meaningless setup.

For liberty involves the right to choose the vocation for which one is best fitted in exercise of that economic driving force toward satisfaction of material wants. And the pursuit of happiness, the gateway to spiritual attainment and satisfaction after material wants are satisfied, is impossible without the two rights first named in the American Trinity.

AN INDIAN ASKS A QUESTION

Louis Fischer, author, lecturer, and outstanding authority on international politics, had this to say during a lecture on September 6, 1942:

"I returned exactly a month ago from a 28,000-mile trip by air to India and the Middle East and back again to America. I spent 8 weeks in India. Indians often discuss the President's "four freedoms" and ask, 'Do the "four freedoms" include the freedom to be free?'"

At another point in his lecture, Mr. Fischer stated: "The question is not whether the 'four freedoms' are enough or whether we ought to have a few more thrown in for good measure. In fact, two are perhaps enough. For if we have freedom from fear, we have freedom of worship and freedom of speech. The real important freedoms are freedom from fear and freedom from want. Freedom from fear means democracy and peace for all, and freedom from want means economic security and comfort for you, for me, and for the Chinese coolie."

The Uncle Toms whom Lincoln freed had life and social security after a fashion. They were fed, clothed, and housed. And sickness involved a process like unto a farmer of today calling in a veterinarian for medical attention to a sick animal in which he has a dollars-and-cents interest. But that was not the kind of arrangement the great emancipator eulogized at Gettysburg when he said: "* * * That we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

However, those words spoken by Lincoln cannot, by any logical reasoning process, be construed as meaning centralized Federal authorities—such as TVA, for instance, with its red-ink accounts, and which might have been avoided had the admonition of Thomas Edison been heeded. And it takes something beside a financial contribution at a Jefferson Day celebration to prove a belief in "that government is best that governs least."

"Of the people, by the people, for the people" is something beside mere implication of the right of every citizen of every State in the United States to a say-so at the polls.

A social and economic set-up by Federal authority as in vogue today means more and more governmental appointees and political job hand-outs, which, in turn, involves the necessity of said appointee keeping his trap shut regardless of what he may learn of what the founding fathers thought or did in suiting action to words, until we finally arrive at the point where free elections are a thing of the past.

SOCIALISM OF THE CHAIR

During a pro and con study of socialism many years ago this writer learned therefrom of a kind identified as Socialism of the Chair, which, as separated from other forms, means simply rule from the top down. And that again in no way parallels the kind endorsed by Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln. What do you think?

Marx and Bismarck or Bismarck and Marx. Each representing individual ideologies antithetical to Jefferson's; combined they are synonymous of infamy. And for sake of convenience here we shall give it the label of "Bismarxianism."

While a complete treatise of this particular and peculiar kind of doctrine and its workings to date is, because of length prohibited here, its identity as a plan outlined by one of the foremost social and economic writers is given as: "The program was a recrudescence of one which was old when it was introduced by the Gracchi in ancient Rome and eventually destroyed the Empire. It was given to Bismarck largely by Prof. Adolph Wagner, who was reputedly an ancestor of our Senator Robert F. Wagner."

Bismarxianism therefore, had its origin with Prince Otto Von Bismarck, whose mottoes "Blood and steel" and "Might makes right," and whose contempt for the so-called common man are too well known among well-informed students of world economy to need any special mention here. It was born when Bismarck saw in the social security, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, and health insurance planks in the Socialist program, the means of gaining his own end. And the string of names among much-publicized American proponents of the program is a long one.

The appeal in a petition by German industrialists in 1929 that the intervention of the state should be restricted and should only extend to such branches as cannot be served by private enterprise was disregarded by the government in that time. Now, under the sing-song of "democracy," the program is under way in other countries, not to democratize them but to demoralize them. And this program of which nazism, Hitler, and World War II were an interlude, has been brought on a gilded platter to the front door of these United States—a hangover from Tory ideologies dead in 1776 but not yet delivered to the undertaker.

Recalling our text now, and upon the basis of the foregoing in order thereafter, the question arises as to just how we may attain anything like the much talked of social security or welfare state as presently advocated, through process of borrowing ourselves out of a debt status which, in the last analysis, is property in man as well as property in the generations which are to follow.

Think of the freedom to be free.

Statement No. 2: Examining Congressman Poulson's Recent Extension of Remarks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, continuing my commentary on the extension of remarks by Congressman POULSON found in the Appendix of the RECORD for August 17, I wish now to refer to some of the other points in his seven-point discussion of that date. In my first commentary found in my extension of remarks located on page A5975, I touched on two of the points which Congressman POULSON made in his presentation of California's attitude toward the proposal to divert water from the Columbia River into California. Reviewing for sake of connection—point 1 of Mr. POULSON'S statement was that nobody in California wanted to bring water from the Columbia River into that State, a point which I questioned after referring to the record of 1947. The second point of his statement was that California could not afford to finance a project of such magnitude, and with that I fully and thoroughly agreed, because such projects should be built by the Nation.

Going now to the third point of Congressman POULSON'S statement, I will quote him in full:

> Third. California would never call upon the taxpayers of the Nation to pay for such a project, as Arizona has done in the case of the proposed central Arizona project, which Secretary Chapman says would cost the Nation's taxpayers more than $2,000,000,000 in interest alone.

Perhaps Congressman POULSON intended to say: "California would never again call upon the taxpayers of the Nation, and so forth," for surely he knows that California has already called upon the taxpayers of the Nation to construct great projects like the Central Valley and the Imperial Valley in California, both of which were built by Uncle Sam at the request of California and both of which were more complex and more expensive than the proposed Columbia River diversion would probably be. I am afraid my friend from California is conveniently overlooking what California has already asked the American taxpayer to do for her in the realm of reclamation. I am not criticizing this work done by the Nation for California, for as I have said before, in general I favor it.

Would the cost of bringing water from the mouth of the Columbia River into California be less expensive and less of an engineering feat than the conquest of the Imperial Valley or the completed improvement of the great Central Valley of California? I think so—but in the absence of such information as Chairman WELCH of the Public Lands Committee sought in 1947, we can only guess about comparative costs, but my guess is that the diversion proposed by Chairman WELCH from the Columbia, although a Herculean task, would be less difficult and less expensive than either of the two great existing projects built in California with Federal aid. Already the Central Valley in California has received a Federal investment of about $400,000,000 and it will cost many times the present investment when completed with its 40 dams and reservoirs and many more miles of canals which should be built. Its final construction costs may run to three or four billions of dollars. I have voted and worked for it.

What about the cost of the great Imperial Valley development in California? To figure its cost properly we should include not merely the cost of the All-American Canal, both divisions, but also the cost of the Imperial diversion dam, and undoubtedly the cost of the Hoover Dam also. Of course, the farmers in the Imperial Valley are not repaying the cost of Hoover Dam, but the present facilities and development for irrigation in the Imperial Valley could not exist without Hoover Dam. It is fortunate that the dam can pay for itself by producing hydroelectric power, but just the same, without that great reservoir to store and regulate the water and to detain the silt, it would have been impossible for Imperial Valley to have the All-American Canal, which California begged for in 1928. The Swing-Johnson bill, which was sponsored by two California Members in Congress, resulted in the congressional act known as the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928, which gives southern California a great dam and canal—exactly what Arizona now asks for in the Central Arizona project—a similar dam and canal in Arizona. Therefore, in considering the money put up by American taxpayers at the request of California to make possible the present Imperial Valley and Coachella Valley, we must consider that California asked the American taxpayers for several hundred million dollars to build Hoover Dam and the All-American Canal, with all their appurtenances.

Mind you, I am not complaining of that cost to the Nation, for this was one of the best investments that Uncle Sam ever made, and which will pay out. I simply want to remind my friends in California that they have not hesitated in the past to ask for huge blocks of Federal aid for their water developments. When I say this, I am not including the three-quarter billion dollars asked for to be used for flood control in the State of California—none of which is repayable to the Government.

As for the other part of the third item concerning the so-called interest cost of the central Arizona project, I need make no comment other than what I said in an extension of my own in the Appendix of the RECORD on August 8. I said then regarding the two billion in interest problem, that it would be just as logical to say the Secretary of the Interior claims that Jefferson imposed on the American taxpayers an interest cost of $5,250,000,000 to date in his purchase of Louisiana. Both assertions would make about the same sense—or lack of it.

Under the fourth point of his statement Congressman POULSON says: "Our State engineer has said that California's water supplies are sufficient, and that the State does not have to go beyond its boundaries for more water. The Colorado River water awarded to southern California in Federal Government contracts, and other available supplies, are sufficient to meet the foreseeable needs of that area." The second quoted sentence gives me a lot of comfort and must give the citizens of Los Angeles and the inhabitants of southern California a lot of assurance. I think the first quoted sentence, standing alone, is substantially correct and that the State engineer is right about California's water supply being sufficient; especially is that true of southern California. However, that calls for a fuller discussion which I want to make in a later extension in the RECORD.

If you will let me change one word in the Congressman's last quoted sentence, I will agree with him fully and with the California State engineer that the statement is entirely correct. Let us change the word "contracts" to the word "laws", thus making the sentence read: "The Colorado River water awarded to southern California in Federal Government laws, and other available supplies, are sufficient to meet the foreseeable needs of that area." Let me repeat, I am convinced that southern California with all of her other water resources and water rights, together with that volume of Colorado River water furnished southern California by undisputed law, is sufficient for all present needs and for any foreseeable future. We have on the record expert engineering testimony and data to prove the truth of my last statement.

Why suggest changing the word "contracts" in the foregoing to the word "laws"? Well surely it occurs to anyone that California's water rights under laws are more secure than her rights under contracts, for if the contracts are not in conformity with law they are defective. Now, what is the difference in amounts under each of the two terms? If a Californian familiar with the subject should be asked: "What is the total of California's contract rights to Colorado River water?" He would probably answer: "The amount is 5,362,000 acre-feet annually, which is the total of the several contracts which the water agencies of southern California have with the Government, signed by Ray Lyman Wilbur, the Secretary of the Interior in 1932." If I am asked: "What are California's rights under law to water from the Colorado River?" I would reply: "The law of the river establishes the amount not to exceed 4,400,000 acre-feet of water apportioned under subsection (a) of article III of the Colorado River Compact, plus one-half of the undivided surplus to which no firm contract can attach prior to the year 1963."

How much difference is there between these two amounts? We cannot specify the exact difference in acre-feet by merely subtracting 4,400,000 from 5,362,000 because there is that indefinite 50 percent of surplus. I am thoroughly convinced that that indefinite "plus one-half" is nowhere like as much for California as the numerical difference of 962,000 would indicate for California.

The contracts which Mr. POULSON speaks of are not firm contracts but the Californians speak of them as such and are trying to firm them up through a fantastic and questionable private interpretation of the law. Therefore, the exact amount, I am convinced, which California may take from the Colorado will be nearer 4,400,000 acre-feet than 5,362,000 acre-feet annually. The law is clear enough to any disinterested layman's mind, but since Los Angeles' lawyers say it is something else probably only the highest court of the land can determine it authoritatively. That is what I am anxious to have done in such a way as it can actually be decided quickly by the Supreme Court, because time is of the essence, or more than 1,000,000 acre-feet will be lost to Arizona and to the United States.

There were seven points in Congressman POULSON'S statement of August 17, and I have commented on only four in my two statements of yesterday and today. Permission granted, I shall discuss the other points in a future extension to round out the discussion to the full. This editorial debate is not entered into for any other purpose than to bring out all or nearly all of the pertinent facts of a complicated situation in the controversy between Arizona and California which is so vital to the entire Nation.

North American Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GARRETT L. WITHERS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I desire to have an address by Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton, delivered to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, in Toronto, on May 25, 1950, appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.

General McNaughton was appointed Chief of the General Staff, National Defense Headquarters, Ottawa; adviser, Canadian Delegation to Imperial Conference, London, England; member of Committee on Civil Aviation; adviser, Canadian Delegation to Conference for Limitation of Armaments, Geneva, Switzerland; member of Committee on Trans-Atlantic Air Service, Imperial Economic Conference, Ottawa, Ontario; president, National Research Council. He was appointed chairman, Canadian section, Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defense. Appointed Canadian representative, United Nations Atomic Energy Commission. President, Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada. Permanent delegate of Canada to the United Nations, and the representative of Canada on the Security Council, and is now Commissioner, Canadian section, International Joint Commission. General McNaughton has held numerous places of honor and distinction, and I hope that his speech will be read by many of the Senators.

The Public Printer advises me that the manuscript is estimated to make approximately 3 pages of the RECORD, at a cost of $246.

In this address General McNaughton advises closer cooperation and coordination between Canada and the United States for their mutual defense. For that reason I believe the address to have national importance. I have faith enough in what is contained in it to believe it will be worth printing, and I ask that, in spite of the cost, it be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

I count it a great honor as well as a great pleasure to have the privilege of addressing the members of this group of leaders of the business world of the United States and of Canada. The subject on which I am to speak is North American Security, and I welcome this opportunity to make a few observations on a question which is of fundamental importance to the peoples of both our countries. In doing so I will endeavor to bring before you some of the basic considerations which need to be taken into account in the present international situation, and I hope that in the course of my remarks I may indicate not only the very substantial progress which has been achieved between Canada and the United States within the wider grouping of the North Atlantic Treaty in translating ideas and sentiments into specific arrangements, but also that I may bring before you some aspects of these matters on which we have not as yet been able to arrive at arrangements which will provide that measure of effective cooperation which clearly is required.

At the present time the need for North American security arises from one cause only, and that is the clear evidence that unless we make adequate defense preparations the masters of the Soviet Union will continue to hold to their purpose of eventual world conquest and, whenever they deem the situation propitious for their purpose, will turn to war as a means of achieving their ends. This being so, it becomes most important for the nations who are threatened to bring themselves into close association so that, through mutual cooperation, they may create a deterrent which will check the evil designs of those who plan the disruptive policy of the Soviet Union.

In the circumstances which exist the initiative for war must continue to lie with the Soviets, for, by reason of our adherence to the principles of democracy, we cannot even contemplate a so-called preventive war for which a date might be set in advance to simplify planning and conserve resources. On the contrary, we must take our guidance from the wise old saying that "The strong man who continues to be armed keepeth the peace." As a consequence, and not having a point in time on which to focus, our preparations for defense must of necessity be at a level which we are physically capable of sustaining year in and year out. For that very reason, if our preparations are to prove effective in the brief time of warning likely to be available, our preparatory arrangements must be more comprehensive and costly than the preparations of those who plan to a specific date; and our effort may have to be long-continued.

Thus the capacity for endurance has become a prime consideration, and we must be very careful to guard against overstrain, whether it be in our military organization or in our social, economic, or industrial fabric.

It is a happy circumstance that Canada and the United States, as two countries of North America, have come to realize the great interests which they hold in common; after the experience of two world wars, our peoples have learned the necessity for close cooperation in defense. We have learned also that the habit of cooperation is one which grows in intimacy with practice and so today, as we look out at a deeply troubled world, we can say not only do we understand one another's assessment of the dangers, but our views are in close accord as to how the various contingencies should be provided for.

Most fortunately, I think, the leaders of our Governments, and of public opinion, both in Canada and in the United States, have clearly recognized that an insular military defense, even if continental in scope and however elaborate, is by itself not enough to make us safe. On the contrary, to be effective our military plans must be supported in the economic, the social, and the moral spheres, and all these measures must be amplified by association with like-minded nations elsewhere who believe with us in the fundamental principles of democracy and in the freedom of the individual in contradistinction to the pagan tenets of Soviet communism which have submerged so many fine peoples under the crushing heel of totalitarian despotism.

Every nation which has gone down before the onset of Soviet communism is not only a loss to us but a gain to the dark forces which oppose us. In consequence, not the least of our endeavors, in our own interest as well as that of common charity must be to put an end to this process of engulfment of peoples. It is only by generous help to others in distress and in need and by the extension of our own endeavors that we can hope to solve the problems of our own defense and gain that enduring security we seek.

In the study of military defense it is most important to realize the very remarkable progress which has come about, particularly since the close of World War I in the application of science and engineering to war. Today, for those who are suitably prepared and equipped, distance has largely lost its former attenuating effect on the conduct of military operations. We must remember not only that continents are now within aircraft range of one another, but that with every new development, already shrunken space continues to shrink still further. Thus we have now become closer to Europe, both in terms of the reinforcements we can give to our friends, and also in relation to the repercussions on this continent which would be the consequence of any enemy success there. We have become closer to Europe both in terms of the magnitude on which military operations might be conducted, and also as regards the reduction of the time elements involved.

We have to contemplate the possibility of aircraft at supersonic speed and intercontinental radius of action, of guided missiles of great range; of the application of virulent bacteriological and chemical poisons; and most important, of uranium and perhaps of hydrogen atomic bombs of catastrophic power. We must realize that already these forms of bombardment may be rapidly followed up by considerable forces; airborne or seaborne in special types of vessels capable of landing on beaches without the use of established ports. Moreover, these airborne and seaborne forces will be capable of operating with great speed and effectiveness on the ground, even in the face of widespread destruction and contamination which will have resulted from the long-range high explosive, bacteriological, chemical, or atomic bombardment.

With the increased range of action and of rapidity in transit of modern military forces, continents today have already become the smallest geographical units on the basis of which questions of defense can properly be studied; consequently, effective arrangements for the defense of the territory of one nation have become matters of vital concern to all other nations of that continent. Further, the particular anxieties which concern us as a result of present policies behind the iron curtain have necessitated an extension of association in defense beyond the continent of North America to include both the nations of North America and of western Europe in order that we may create an adequate balance or counterpoise.

Perhaps I might refer to this matter first because, within the last year, the answer to these problems has been given in most convincing fashion in the Atlantic Treaty through which Canada and the United States are being brought into association with other nations of the North Atlantic community in western Europe.

Through the organization which this treaty provides we may expect that the democratic countries of western Europe and of North America combined will be able to muster an overwhelming preponderance in military, economic, and moral resources in opposition to any aggressor, and we may reasonably hope that, by the manifest intention of all concerned to make proper preparation for the discharge of the responsibilities they have assumed, there will be created an effective deterrent to any nation or group of nations which might be tempted to launch an armed attack against any of the treaty signatories.

As the Prime Minister of Canada has said:

"This treaty is to preserve the peace of the world by making it clear to any aggressor that if he were so unwise as to resort to war, he would be apt to finish with the Kaiser and Hitler and Mussolini."

And to quote Mr. Pearson, our Secretary of State for External Affairs:

"For the people of the North Atlantic community the treaty is a new beginning. It carries the promise of a greater security and fuller cooperation amongst the nations."

Such is the nature of the plan which has been made in order to chart a course of action for Canada and the United States which associates us in defense with like-minded peoples overseas so that, all together, we may be so strong that our freedom will not be challenged—so strong that the leaders of those who may have contemplated aggressive action by armed force will be induced to turn, while yet they may, to cooperation in the great objectives for the benefit of all peoples, their own included, which may be achieved through the United Nations.

For the peoples of North America, arrangements in relation to defense collaboration with western Europe, however comprehensive, are in themselves not enough. From the very nature of the contingencies which may have to be dealt with and by reason of the locations of our resources in raw materials, manpower, economic facilities and manufacturing capacity, this North American Continent has become literally the arsenal of democracy. It would present therefore a prize objective to attack, should the possibility for this be left open—and we are no longer immune by reason of distance from other continents.

Not only, therefore, is it necessary for us to join in defense arrangements for the protection of the North Atlantic community as a whole but, in view of our special problems in North America, it is also necessary to continue the intimate cooperation which presently exists between the United States and Canada in matters pertaining to the local defense of this continent; and if this cooperation is to be efficient—as it must be—it requires that we work closely together in all defense matters from the elementary planning for civil defense through the development of weapons and resources; in standardization and manufacture of equipments; in organization and training, on land, at sea and in the air—it calls for intimate association in all these matters right up to and including the employment of our forces in war, if that unhappy eventuality should come.

Such, then, is the vista of close collaboration between Canada and the United States of America in defense at home and overseas which extends before us, and I think you may be particularly interested in some account of the methods which have been evolved by which we, in Canada, a relatively small nation, are enabled to make our due and proper contribution to the security of this continent without any sense of being overwhelmed or dominated by the circumstance that, in numbers and in the physical measure of defense resources, we stand to our mighty neighbor in a ratio no greater than perhaps of 1 in 12.

The post World War I period was marked by two very important transitions in Canada. The first was the transition from a state of colonial dependency in defense and international affairs to national responsibility under which we have assumed complete authority for the conduct of our affairs. It is one of the remarkable achievements of the age that this change has come about without any impairment of our association with the other nations of the commonwealth.

The second transition was from an attitude toward the United States which I can only characterize as one of some anxiety, developing to that full measure of mutual confidence which now exists. Today in Canada there are very few who will question that in seeking the security of our homeland we need to give first place to a continuance of friendly relations with the United States.

As far as I can determine, the transition from the negative conception of Canada and the United States as two nations whose interests were separated by a frontier to a recognition of a need for positive association in defense was first expressed publicly in Mr. Roosevelt's declaration in August 1938 that "the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened," and in Mr. King's reply that "We, too, have our obligations as a good, friendly neighbor and one of them is to see that, at our own insistence, our country is made as immune from attack or possible invasion as we can reasonably be expected to make it, and that, should the occasion ever arise, enemy forces should not be able to pursue their way, either by land, sea, or air, to the United States across Canadian territory."

As the former Prime Minister of Canada has said, these statements marked the first public recognition by both countries of their reciprocity in defense based on mutual interest in one another's security.

This being the situation, when war broke out with Germany in 1939 there was no occasion for any anxiety as to the attitude of the United States in the event of an attack on Canada and we could base our arrangements on the confident expectation that we would receive, as we did, every possible measure of help that it was open to the United States of America to give.

Again in 1939, as in 1914, Canada went to war when the United Kingdom became involved in the European conflagration. In 1914 the British declaration of war was sufficient to embrace all the Dominions and dependencies of the Empire. In 1939 the situation was different. Our own declaration of war was made of our own volition as the result of action by our own Parliament. While the procedure was different the effect was the same, and in each case, in a matter of weeks, a division, together with other units, was embarked for overseas to be followed by others in fairly rapid succession. In 1939, in addition to the Army, very large naval and air programs were undertaken. During the war the total enlistment in all armed forces, men and women, was 1,087,000 out of a population of about 12,000,000.

In supplement to the great effort of the armed forces there were many tens of thousands of men and women who were engaged on the farms, in the forests and mines, and in industry. It is very satisfactory in reviewing these matters in retrospect to realize from the record that the arduous work of our civil population was marked by that same high spirit of grim determination and devotion as that which characterized our armed services, and in the result and despite the recruitment of personnel, the volume of production of all kinds was markedly increased. For example, Canadian war industry, which was organized and controlled by a department of the Canadian Government, produced over twice as much for our allies as for ourselves, and its output embraced most of the articles and materials, raw and manufactured, which were wanted in quantity over the whole range of the requirements of the armed forces. Our Canadian war industry was distinguished by the excellence of the product, by the improvement in weapons, explosives, motor transport, tanks, and other equipment introduced, and by the low costs in man-hours of labor which were achieved. This immense effort was organized and financed by Canada herself and the product was made available to our allies in such a manner as to contribute most effectively to winning the war. Under our Mutual Aid Act, which was the Canadian equivalent of United States lend-lease, strategical necessity was the guiding consideration and no payment was required.

Canadian industrial performance in World War II stands out in marked contrast to World War I where the output mostly took the form of raw materials or of such simple articles as shells and ammunition to sealed patterns designed elsewhere. Not a single gun or novel major piece of military equipment was made in Canada in World War I, and the whole of the industrial organization which was then set up was under the direction of the Imperial Munitions Board, an organization directed and financed from London.

In World War II it was shown conclusively that we need not doubt our ability to invent, develop, and produce any article of war short of the larger battlecraft which were, in size, beyond the capacity of our plants. We did not undertake to make everything, because this would have been uneconomic in the case of supplies of satisfactory types otherwise available in sufficient quantities.

We are in no doubt that we must again endeavor to balance our industrial efforts with those of our other allies and particularly with the United States in order to gain the best over-all advantage. This, as you know, is a matter which is under discussion between the countries.

I should now like to turn for a moment to the Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defense, the body set up by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada in August 1940, with terms of reference to undertake studies relating in the broad sense to the defense of the north half of the Western Hemisphere in order to insure the continued safety of our two countries.

The Permanent Joint Board is not a combined staff, and likewise, in its national sections, it is not a rival to the military staffs in Washington or in Ottawa. Its strength for its special task lies in the fact that it has not been clothed with any executive responsibility. The board's procedure provides for the comprehensive interchange of information and its free discussion, and the board has the duty constantly to review the situation, and if any of its suggestions have not been acted upon it can draw this situation to the attention of the President and the Prime Minister. In practice this has proved to be ample authority.

During the war it was under the auspices of the Permanent Joint Board that the basic plans for the defense of Canada and Alaska were drawn up and that arrangements were made for such important defense undertakings as the Alaska Highway, the Northwest Staging Route for ferrying aircraft to Russia and China, the Crimson Route across Hudson Bay, Baffin Land, Greenland, etc., to Europe, etc.

It was at the instance of the board also that toward the end of the war in the immediate and postwar period, steps were taken to transform the international character of the various installations of these joint undertakings to insure that full ownership and clear title to all establishments in Canadian territory should vest in Canada. Large sums were, of course, paid by Canada to the United States in this process of liquidation.

Since then the Board has concerned itself with the future. At an early meeting the Board recognized the need for wider interchange of officers and specialists, including those concerned with the design of new weapons, with a view to eventual standardization; for joint tests of new equipment and methods; and for the interchange of observers on military exercises, etc.

The result of these discussions was made known in a statement given simultaneously on February 13, 1948, in Ottawa to Parliament by the Prime Minister, and in Washington by the Secretary of State. This statement defined the measure of agreement which had been reached for cooperation in our defense policies and I think that everything which is essential for the closest military cooperation was included; thus, through this declaration, there is provided a comprehensive basis on which either country may bring forward any defense matters which it may wish.

I think that it is particularly advantageous to Canada that we are enabled to make the very significant contribution of which I believe our engineers and scientists are capable in the fields of weapon development and research. It has been our concern to insure that in this section of the nucleus of our war organization we are specially well-equipped and staffed and, in addition, we have available also the great facilities and experience of our National Research Council.

At the present time, as has been announced by Mr. Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Defense, in major items of equipment the attention of our technical staffs has been concentrated on naval craft for antisubmarine duties, on the Canadian high power turbo-jet aircraft engine for military purposes and on a new all-weather fighter which will have our new engine, and which has been especially designed to meet the conditions of air defense in our northern territories, or anywhere that a long-distance interceptor of high performance is required. These undertakings, in all of which Canada has had a long background of related experiences, are turning out very satisfactorily and, as a result, important items of new defense equipment are reaching the stage where we think that, in addition to meeting our own requirements, we can with advantage also supply the needs of our allies in exchange for items of war equipment of their manufacture which we need and which, having regard to the characteristics of mass production industry, they are able to produce more economically.

The next step in the orderly development of defense arrangements between Canada and the United States was announced on April 12, 1949, with the setting up of a Joint United States-Canada Industrial Mobilization Planning Committee whose duty it is to exchange information and work toward the coordination of the views of the two governments in connection with planning for industrial mobilization in the event of an emergency.

This is an aspect of cooperation, the principles of which were thoroughly worked out during the last war between the Canadian Mutual Aid Board and the United States Lend-Lease Administration, and, as a result, Canada was able to make many scores of millions of dollars' worth of equipment available to the armed forces of the allies.

In both Canada and the United States what needs to be done now to regain this facility is well understood, and we are beginning to evolve procedures which we may expect will operate practically under peacetime conditions.

As is well known, Canada buys on ordinary account very much more from the United States than the United States buys from Canada. We have to make up the difference from our favorable balances with other countries or by making restrictions on the freedom of our people to travel in the United States or to purchase from there other than essential commodities. Even at the best of times the stability of these arrangements is precarious and it certainly would not be practicable to superimpose any large program of military items on the top of our ordinary Canadian purchases.

Leaders of thought in Canada in government and industry have already emphasized the advantage of a renewal of something like the Hyde Park arrangements under which we would contemplate balancing the trade in arms between Canada and the United States outside our trade on ordinary account. As matters stand in the dangerous situation which exists it would not be sensible to consider trade in arms from the point of view of revenue. Rather we must look at it primarily for the purpose of promptly providing both of our countries and also our allies with the most modern, standardized weapons of the highest efficiency. Having regard to this and to the mutually advantageous result which is sought as a contribution to the security of North America and of the other countries of the North Atlantic community, it seems to me that it is not unreasonable to expect the removal of legislative restrictions which introduce other considerations and so stand in the way of efficient organization and procedures. At least it would seem sensible that these restrictions should be confined in their incidence to our trade on ordinary account.

Until recently experience has shown that the principal barriers to progress toward making our defense arrangements has been of the character I have indicated and it is of the first importance that the situation should be corrected, or otherwise we, in Canada, would be compelled to spread our resources over the whole field of our requirements for weapons rather than that we should concentrate on those items which we can best produce, and use our surplus to exchange for equipments which can be produced more advantageously in the United States or by our allies in Europe. Once the difficulties of the moment are widely understood it would seem only reasonable to expect that appropriate remedial legislative action would be taken without delay. With the present widespread discussion of these matters I think we have reason to hope for early correction.

In this connection I would like to refer to the hopeful statement made by Mr. Claxton, Minister of National Defense, on May 19, when he announced a beginning of trade in military equipment between Canada and the United States on a reciprocal basis which is expected to amount this year to somewhere between fifteen and twenty-five million dollars. This is a promising beginning of great value, as Mr. Claxton has said, not only to the defense potential of this continent but also to the over-all defense arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty.

There are two other factors in industrial preparedness for defense which may be more difficult to correct because of the long time required for translation of needs into plans, and of plans into the finished work or facility. The facilities which fall into this category, which require conceptions and effective plans which may have to be a decade or more ahead of the current needs of industry are, first and foremost, transportation. We need to foresee the immense requirement for the movement of bulk commodities within North America for processing, and of finished military and other supplies for export. In an emergency these movements must be capable of taking place immediately, as required, and with a high degree of speed. Also, we must foresee and prepare against the increased menace of the submarine so that we may not repeat our unfortunate experiences of the last war on the Atlantic seaboard.

The preparation for the early delivery of large blacks of electric power additional to the ordinary demands of industry is also an essential.

Equally essential is the advancement of preparations so that we can be certain of meeting our vast war requirements for iron ore. It seems to me that all these important categories of requirements show the best promise of timely satisfaction through the St. Lawrence project for power and for navigation and through the new power developments envisaged at Niagara, which are embodied in treaties which now await ratification.

Here again it would seem reasonable to expect that, when the vast portent of these treaties in their relation to the immediate needs of Canada and the United States, particularly for power and vital defense requirements, is widely understood by the peoples of North America, we may expect that they will insist on completion and prompt implementation.

The factors which make for military strength have varied from country to country and from age to age. Sometimes it has been possession and skill in the use of a particular weapon, sometimes an advantage in movement or in communications; sometimes, though not often in history, it has been sheer numbers that have given advantage.

Today the military strength of North America rests on very special circumstances which exist on a scale presently unmatched elsewhere throughout the world.

Our young people, on whom the future depends, are most highly educated; they have been familiar since their earliest years with mechanism in all its forms and uses; they have shown inventive abilities of the highest order, and capabilities in research which are unexcelled; there is discipline when the occasion requires, and courage in action and capacity to endure adversity that have been proved beyond dispute.

Behind these priceless human and moral resources which are notable characteristics of the people of the Atlantic region, the United States and Canada between them in North America possess the most comprehensive mass production industry in the world. We are particularly fortunate that, if we have to meet an emergency, we start from the satisfactory position that in the standards, in the methods, and in the techniques of industry there is wide interchangeability between us. We have, or can have, ample supplies of most key materials required for peace, or for war; and, for any potential shortages, there is capacity to develop acceptable substitutes; capacity, too, for perfecting and rapidly producing the newer and better weapons of war as the occasion may require them for purposes of defense.

It is not on numbers in the Armed Forces that we in the North Atlantic community depend for defense against any possible aggression, though these must be sufficient. We depend in fact on the more highly skilled and perfectly equipped forces by sea and land and in the air which our special advantages make possible—hard-hitting forces which can be mobile, far reaching, long enduring, and as matters stand, decisive in their power against any aggressor.

It is clear that if we are ever attacked, it is on quality forces and on quality weapons and equipment that we should place reliance. It is important that this be well remembered down the years and particularly by those who have to do with the planning and conduct of industrial mobilization.

I think that in the period between World War I and World War II, both in Canada and in the United States, we learned the bitter lesson that unilateral disarmament is a delusion—a very expensive delusion that brought us very near to disaster and that cost us very dear in the lives of our young people. Just such a bitter delusion would be the surrender of any of the special weapons of great power, with which I include those based on atomic energy, until we have acceptable assurance through mutually applicable safeguards and an effective international system of inspection and control which carries our confidence that they, or their like, will not be used against us.

On the contrary, as the situation stands, it is of the first importance that we give our closest attention and maximum effort to extending the margin of superiority which we now possess in these special weapons and in facilities for their manufacture and in insuring that we shall be able to use them effectively should the occasion require.

In these matters, the advantage of safeguards now possessed by the people of North America and indeed by the whole of the free world is not something which we could retain if we ceased to progress; if we allowed our high capacity for invention and our industrial efficiencies to decline, then most certainly we would soon be overtaken and surpassed. The best protection for the countries of North America and western Europe, as well as for the rest of the world, would be an effective universal organization of security under the United Nations but, until this can be brought about, the continued production and further improvement of all our weapons and the maintenance of industrial efficiency and preparedness are vital to the prevention of aggression by making impossible any prospect of its success.

I conclude these remarks on North American security by saying that, until we secure the effective disarmament which we seek, and until the aspirations of all nations can be harmonized by peaceful means, we will continue to need our Armed Forces and all the resources which our industry can provide both as a deterrent to attack against ourselves and as an assurance to the nations of western Europe and to all other peace-loving nations, who think with us, that the peoples of North America remain strong and well able to help them.

Address by Representative Wesley A. D'Ewart Before the Republican State Convention at Helena, Mont.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Hon WESLEY A. D'EWART, Representative in Congress from the Second District of Montana, before the Republican State convention at Helena on August 19, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE WESLEY A. D'EWART, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, SECOND DISTRICT, MONTANA, BEFORE THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION HELD AT HELENA

Republican friends, as we gather here today to take part in one of the basic functions on our republican form of government, we find that once again our men are fighting and dying on foreign battlefields to protect and preserve the American way of life.

As we address ourselves to these duties of citizenship, let us firmly resolve, as individuals and as members of the Republican Party, that we will guard vigilantly here at home the freedoms and liberties for which these men are fighting overseas. It is our duty and our obligation as citizens and as members of the minority party to make certain this Nation does not succumb to totalitarianism at home while our soldiers are fighting communism in strange and far-away lands.

Further than that, let us reaffirm that our every effort will be devoted to the support of our fighting men. We shall insist that they are promptly and properly armed and supplied with the best we can produce. We shall support every possible measure to guard their health, to sustain their morale, to care for the wounded, the widows and orphans and dependents. And most of all, as I have said, we shall preserve for their return the kind of America for which they fight.

Their sacrifices shall spur our unending efforts to find a lasting and durable peace with honor.

The war in Korea, and the threats of future conflict, have increased the responsibilities of the Republican Party.

The events of the past 2 months have tragically demonstrated that the present Democrat administration is morally and intellectually unfit to lead the United States of America.

As in 1916 and in 1940 the Democratic Party in 1948 appealed to the voters on a platform of peace—of keeping us out of war. As in 1918 and in 1944, the Democratic Party in 1950 seeks reelection on the slogan, "Don't change horses in the middle of the stream." Three times in our lifetime the Democratic Party has taken this Nation into war. Each time there has been this campaign to confuse the voters into thinking that support of the administration is the same as support of the war effort. It becomes our duty to demonstrate the cynical duplicity of such an appeal. It is our duty and our obligation to do everything in our power to make certain that the mistakes which brought us into this crisis are not repeated in the future on an even larger scale.

WHO LOST THE PEACE?

Why is it that within 5 years after the end of hostilities in World War II, the peace has been lost in new warfare?

Why is it that thousands of our men have been killed and wounded in battles they were unequipped and unprepared to fight?

Who is responsible for the set-backs our men have suffered in Korea? If we are going to fight this war through to victory, as we most certainly are, the American people must have the answers to these questions. They must have the assurance that the future of our country will be in wiser and better hands.

Where did we lose the peace? Who lost it?

It was not the GI of World War II who fought so valiantly all over the world. He didn't even know what was going on. The American people did not know what was going on. The Republican Party did not know what was going on, for not one of our leaders was invited to the conferences at Yalta, at Tehran, and at Potsdam, where secret agreements paved the way for Communist conquest of eastern Europe and Asia.

While the American forces were still fighting the enemy, their Commander in Chief had agreed to Russian proposals which made it possible for communism to take over the little nations of eastern Europe, to take over eastern Germany, to cage us in Berlin without a road to get in or out, to harass Greece, Turkey, Iran, India, and Burma, to arm the North Koreans, to complete the Communist conquest of China. All of these things—all of them adding to the inevitability of yet another conflict—were secretly and silently agreed to, in defiance of the American tradition of open covenants openly arrived at, while our men were still fighting to win the Second World War.

The victories of our soldiers on the field of battle were thrown away by our diplomats at the conference table.

Even then we might have been able to save the peace.

MORE APPEASEMENT

It was not too late in 1946 to end the policy of appeasement and to take decisive action which might have prevented new conflicts.

In two of the world's trouble spots—in Greece and in Berlin—we stood firm. In these two spots the Communist aggression was halted.

Had we shown similar firmness in Asia, the present fighting might have been prevented. Instead, our Asia policy, which the President has now completely reversed, has made the present conflict inevitable.

It was bad enough to turn our back on the Government of China—our wartime ally—and secretly, without even letting the Chinese know, to agree to Russian domination of Manchuria, of North Korea, and of strategic offshore islands. These agreements constituted the same kind of duplicity we deplore when the Russians break faith with their friends.

But we failed even more miserably when the administration not only refused to assist the Chinese Government against the Communist aggressors but actually sent emissaries from the President to insist that the Chinese Government embrace these traitors and make them a part of the Government.

Our diplomats pointed out to us the dangers in European nations when Communists entered the cabinet. Yet they demanded that China follow the same suicidal policy.

INVITATION TO KOREA

The State Department said we would not take part in a civil war in China.

The State Department said we would not defend Formosa.

The State Department said the American line of defense was to be based upon Japan, the Philippines, and Okinawa, but not Korea or Formosa.

The State Department would not permit shipments of arms to South Korea, for fear the South Koreans would attack the North.

The State Department said we would wait for the dust to settle in Asia.

Is it any wonder, then, that the Russians and the North Koreans thought that we would not defend Korea, that we would not intervene in a civil war in Korea, and that they could overrun the country, could kick up a little more Asiatic dust, without fear of opposition?

Thus the peace was lost, and the administration who lost it did not even see it go. Just 5 days before Korea exploded, Mr. Truman thought, or said that he thought, peace was nearer at hand than ever before. Just 5 days before the Truman policy was completely discredited by its author, in one of the most complete reversals we have ever witnessed.

The President's own action is proof enough that the Democratic administration's pro-Soviet fellow travelers, for the past 18 years, have been leading the people from one sell-out to another, from one catastrophe to another, behind false slogans, false programs, and false promises, down the road of secret diplomacy and appeasement to the battlefields of Korea.

THE REPUBLICAN POSITION

The position of the Republican Party throughout these trying years has been completely vindicated. As soon as we learned of the terms of Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam we denounced them. From that moment on we demanded that the secret agreements be revealed, that the appeasement policy be repudiated, that sound steps be taken to insure the maintenance of friendly regimes in strategic lands, particularly in the Asiatic heartland, China.

President Truman scoffed when Senator TAFT pointed out the strategic importance of Formosa. He said it was of no importance. Had he followed the Senator's advice, Formosa now would be safe. Instead he waited for months, until the Communist Chinese are in the most advantageous position for attack, before declaring that our fleet would defend the island.

Though it may be some comfort to have the administration admitting now that we were right in the first place, it is small comfort indeed when men must fight and die because of the political short-sightness that dictated this policy and its sudden reversal.

The record shows the Republican position has been right. The people know that only in the Republican Party can there be hope of honest, clear-cut, straightforward policy which can in the long run bring true peace to our Nation and the world.

SUBVERSIVES IN GOVERNMENT

The people know that the Republican Party would not even tolerate the kind of traitors and fellow travelers to whom the Fair Deal administration has looked for advice.

We have no Communists in our party. We never will have.

A Republican President would not have taken Alger Hiss half across the globe as his most trusted adviser in international affairs.

No Republican administration would appoint to the Cabinet the kind of man whose friendship to a convicted spy and traitor outweighs his loyalty to his job.

The cynical Owen Lattimore, whose far-eastern policy and political philosophy is best summed up in his advice on Korea—"let Korea fall, but don't let it look like we pushed her"—would never have been relied upon in a State Department our party administered.

We have none of the Coplons, Wadleighs, Marzanis, and Remingtons—the subversives and the perverts numbered in the hundreds—which this administration recruited, raised to high places, and shielded, and refused to prosecute long after their treachery became known to all of the world.

The American people are fed up with this boring from within, this pampering of "pinks" and "pansies." They know they will not be afflicted with such people in the Republican Party. They can look to us for leadership with confidence and safety.

WHY WERE WE UNPREPARED?

Now, how about preparedness? Are we prepared for the present conflict—following upon the heels of these mistakes in foreign policy?

The South Koreans were not prepared because the foreign-policy experts refused to permit expenditure of the millions Congress appropriated for giving them arms and munitions.

Our own Defense Department was not prepared because up until the 25th day of June they had been assured that Korea was not a part of our defense position.

Beyond that how well prepared are we for the possible extensions of the conflict which has followed upon the President's decisions?

The Air Force is ordering swiftly as many new planes as American plants are capable of producing. The wraps are off and we are going to have a 70-group Air Force. The American people may remember that this 70-group Air Force was authorized several years ago and funds appropriated to begin it by the Republican Eightieth Congress. Why, then, do we have fewer planes than ever before? Simply because the President, in defiance of the expressed will of the elected representatives of the people in Congress, impounded the money we provide for 70 air groups and directed that the force be reduced even below the levels of 1947-48. We enter the present conflict with a skeleton Air Force, and another decision of the President's must be reversed.

What about the Marines? We here in Montana are acutely aware of the speed with which the Marines have been rebuilding their forces. Another policy of the executive departments is being reversed. The Eightieth Congress saved the Marines from destruction—destruction which was proposed in the administration unification bill—and we made it clear that a large, strong, and active Marine Corps was a fundamental part of our Armed Forces. But despite this clear expression, and once again in defiance of the Congress, the Defense Department has whittled away at the Marines—reducing the effectiveness of the very arm of defense which has traditionally been called upon to handle emergencies such as the Korean crisis.

With the Navy the executive department has a similar record. Construction is now beginning again on a new aircraft carrier. Congress authorized the construction years ago, and appropriated money for it. The carrier actually was started. Then an executive edict stopped construction, impounded the money, and left us in this branch of the service, as in others, unprepared. Republicans in the Eighty-first Congress called attention to the administration's undermining of the Navy, and you will remember that long hearings were conducted after which the administration was whitewashed and the men who had dared to speak their minds—speak the truth—were dismissed from the service.

The Army has fared little better. In all, the President and his Secretary of Defense refused to spend nearly two billion dollars appropriated for specific defense projects which would have been of inestimable value now. They have spent $95,000,000,000 in the past 5 years, however, with what effectiveness all of us now can judge.

How little might have been the dislocation of our economy had the administration followed the sensible program of maintaining an alert and prepared defense force.

How much more will it cost now, both in dollars and in hardship, to build with the emergency already upon us.

How much confidence can the American people have in leaders whose foreign and security policies have led us to this sorry plight?

The American people are united to fight this war to victory. All of us are going to work at it and fight at it to the limit of our strength. But this does not mean that we must accept the continued leadership of those who have failed us in the past, who have, in fact, brought about our calamity. Unity requires that the people have all the facts, that the bewilderment and confusion produced by this betrayal be replaced by confidence that under honest and courageous leadership, the leadership the Republican Party can and will provide, the mistakes of the past will not be repeated.

I have dealt thus at length with the problems of foreign policy and security which are of such great importance to us.

GUARD LIBERTY AT HOME

It is exceedingly important, and I want to emphasize this, that we guard and preserve on the home front the freedom and liberty, the principles of self-reliance, initiative and individual responsibility which are the cornerstones of the American system.

All of us are familiar with the aims of the present administration for the future of America.

The same sympathizers with foreign ideologies who have been so largely responsible for our betrayal in world affairs, are responsible for the domestic policies of the Truman administration.

Many of us have read the book, The Road Ahead. It discusses in some detail the method of the Fabian Socialists in Great Britain who, under other names, by infiltration of an existing party, and ultimately by using the late war itself as an instrument for their political aims have turned Great Britain into a Socialist nation with hardly a mention of the word socialism.

The President's message opening the Eighty-first Congress set forth a complete program for the socialization of the United States. Never once was the word used. Never once was the relationship explained between the various programs he endorsed and urged upon us. But a listing of them shows, as you well know, that their enactment would spell the end of the American system of free enterprise.

It was hoped that the President would withdraw his demands for these programs during the present war emergency. If he is truly interested in a unified nation, he will do so. However, he has not done so, but has in fact reiterated his demands.

He has not ceased to press for the socialization of medicine.

He has not ceased to press for authority regimentation over our natural resources in the Columbia and Missouri Basins.

He has not revised his reciprocal trade policy of permitting foreign nations to undersell American labor, industry, and agriculture.

He has not withdrawn his requests for billions of dollars of spending programs not connected with the war effort.

He has, in fact, boldly demanded under the guise of the war effort new and greater powers than any President of the United States ever enjoyed in peace or war.

These new powers were requested on the heels of his deceptive message to the American people July 19, wherein he gave no intimation of his intention to make himself the economic dictator of our land.

THE FAIR DEAL AT WAR

The President asked for power to requisition any factory, farm, tool, machine, automobile, or anything else he believes is necessary for the war, other programs, or, mind you, for our foreign policy objectives. Who can say what limits there may be on such a request, when nobody, least of all the President, knows what our foreign policy objectives may be for the next 24 hours, or what is involved in other programs.

Further than that, he wanted the power to set up Government corporations to buy or sell any minerals, metals, or raw materials, and the power to build any kind of factory he feels may be necessary to augment the production of private enterprise plants.

The bill he presented is the Spence bill of peacetime, drawn by the same men who seek to foist socialism upon us under some other name—Fair Deal, New Deal, raw deal—it matters not.

To grant such powers to any American President, no matter how honest and well-intentioned he might be, would be to abdicate the rightful powers of the people of the United States, reserved to themselves and to their representatives in Congress, under our Constitution.

To grant them to an administration which has shielded under its wing General Vaughan and his deep freezers, little Johnny Maragon, who was convicted for his intrigue, the Pendergast machines, the Pauleys, the Curleys, and all of the others, would be to invite disaster.

To grant them to an administration which has had the avowed intention of socializing this Nation would be simple folly.

The House last week refused to grant this blank-check authority.

We debated the President's bill and substitute proposals for more than a week. As a result of repeated Republican demands, we passed a measure much more nearly in line with the needs of the emergency. The Republican Members supported fully the priorities and allocations necessary to the war effort, but made it clear that they would not approve unlimited executive powers. We are going to insist that the controls we grant are properly administered. We promise the American people that we will get rid of wartime controls and allocations just as soon as the necessity for them has ceased to exist.

THE REPUBLICAN PLEDGE

The American people may accept that pledge with full assurance that it will be made good. The records show our past performance. We said that we would get rid of the controls of World War II and in the Republican Eightieth Congress we did.

The point is that the administration now in power, to advance its socialistic designs, wants and must have these controls and allocations all of the time—in peace or war—and if kept in control of the Congress it may succeed as the British Socialists have in making war powers permanent.

The Republican Party will insist upon revision of the tax structure to provide a more fair and equitable distribution of the load, and we will insist that the costs of this conflict be paid for currently to the greatest extent possible. This means higher taxes, and they cannot be avoided.

The administration wants to increase them for war, and keep them increased in peace. The Republicans, however, pledge that they will be reduced as quickly as a sound fiscal policy will permit.

Again the American people may rely completely upon this pledge. We promised to decrease taxes after the last war, and we did so, over the veto of the President, giving the greatest relief to those in the low-income brackets.

The war also will require that the budget will be unbalanced until we can end hostilities and have better assurance of peace. But the administration believes in unbalanced budgets in peacetime as in wartime. They cannot carry out their wasteful spending policies except with deficit spending.

We will balance the budget at the earliest possible moment after we get out of this war, and on the basis of our past performance, the American people may have complete assurance that this pledge, too, will be fulfilled. In the Eightieth Congress the Republicans balanced the budget for the only time since the first New Deal administration entered office, 20 years ago.

THE ISSUE IN 1950

To my mind, the issue in 1950 is clear.

On the one hand we have the Truman administration, harboring in high places a motley crew of Communists, fellow travelers, cynical politicians, and incompetents, responsible solely and completely for plunging us again into war, for the fact that we are unprepared for war, and endeavoring in war as in peace to bring a foreign socialism to our shores in place of our present form of government.

On the other we offer the honest, sincere, enlightened leadership of the Republican Party, true to the ideals of the American system, the only resource of a people who search for confidence and integrity in their leaders, for strength in world affairs, for victory in this conflict, and for enduring peace.

In Montana and in the Nation we can begin the hard task of restoring American leadership in 1950 by electing a Republican majority in the National Congress and in the State legislature. We can be certain that the honest and efficient men and women on the Republican ticket, for county, State, and national office recognize the needs of the hour and are prepared to meet them.

In this fight we will have the support, I am confident, of many Democrats who recognize that the name of their party has been stolen by a gang which has no conception of or faith in the teachings of Thomas Jefferson, the traditional founder of that party.

We will also have the support of many unaffiliated voters who recognize that they cannot go along with a political machine that destroys independent thought and action and that has no claim on their confidence.

We will have the support of young men and women who must recognize now more than ever before that the future of the country they are inheriting depends upon their active and intelligent participation in political affairs.

We have a great work to do here in Montana as in all the States of the Union. The safe, sound, and sure future of the Nation depends upon the Republican Party. Let us seize this opportunity as such and every one of us do our part to place our country on the road to a sound, stable, honest government that will guide us to a lasting peace.

Duty of Banks to Depositors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Tell Your Depositors," delivered by Orval W. Adams, executive vice president of the Utah First National Bank, of Salt Lake City, before the annual district conference of the fifth district of the National Association of Supervisors of State Funds, held in Salt Lake City, June 7, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TELL YOUR DEPOSITORS

In a normal world your concern and the concern of the banker would be the same—to see that the bank remains in position to return to its depositors on demand the moneys deposited by them with it.

In this abnormal world you gentlemen have ably performed the duties entrusted to you. Under your supervision the ability of a bank to return the number of dollars deposited with it is taken for granted.

But the banker is, or should be, concerned as well in seeing to it that the dollars you make sure he can return to his depositor are dollars of equal value with those deposited.

It is indeed fortunate that you gentlemen have so ably performed the duties entrusted to you and have ensured the return of the number of dollars deposited for when we look to the other side of the equation, to the value of the dollars deposited, the story is quite different.

NO SUCH THING AS GOVERNMENT MONEY

There is no such thing as "Government money." Until that statement has become part of our subconsciousness, a premise upon which we act and react instinctively, it will be possible for those in control of Government to perpetuate themselves in office by returning some of the money they take from us and labeling it "Government money."

Until it is so understood, that every dollar spent by government comes from the taxpayers and might otherwise have been spent by them as they elected and without the overhead cost of the millions employed by Government to spend the taxpayers' moneys, it will remain true, as our last president, Heber J. Grant, said some years ago, that "you can't beat Santa Claus." Pull off the old gentleman's whiskers, and you will find the wolf revealed.

The necessary functions of government benefit all of us, and we rightly and willingly contribute to their cost, but, strange as it may seem, bureaucracies have a tendency to grow and to perpetuate themselves; functions initially exercised for proper reasons are continued for improper reasons, and their cost increases.

Let me illustrate by directing your attention to the matter of subsidies:

Subsidies start by taking from Peter to pay Paul. They are continued to rob Peter in order to bribe Paul.

During the war, and for a period thereafter, in order to insure the production of necessary commodities, and to minimize inflation, it was necessary to pay subsidies, and such subsidies were rightly paid.

To pay a subsidy to get needed production of an essential commodity is one thing; to pay a subsidy to get unneeded production of something when produced must be destroyed is quite another thing.

Today the farmer is in the spotlight; he is getting back more than he contributes to government. He is expected to pay for this with his vote; to sell his liberty for some temporary financial advantage.

But not all farmers are fooled; both as individuals and in their organizations they are calling for justice and not favoritism. They recognize that unwarranted subsidies may mean the death of needed subsidies. And they know that tomorrow some other group will be in the spotlight, and that they will be footing the bill.

I believe that we, as individual bankers, have a responsibility and an obligation to inform citizens and our depositors to the best of our ability in regard to money, credit, and the elements of sound public finance upon which rests to so great a degree the banking structure and consequently the safety and earning power of the funds entrusted to our care.

OUR FIRST DUTY IS TO OUR DEPOSITORS

Our first duty is to our depositors. Upon this we will all agree. But just what is the extent of this duty? Is our obligation to our depositors fulfilled by merely so managing our banks as in the ordinary course of events to insure the return to them of the moneys deposited by them, or do we not owe a further duty? Are we not charged with the responsibility of doing what we can to make their deposits worth having, to see that they earn something substantial, and to see to it that when repaid they are repaid in dollars of real value?

The depositor is the very backbone of this Nation—the man who is self-supporting, who saves, who bears the brunt of taxation, who supports the people and the Government. Without him life would be primitive indeed. Without him the man on relief would soon find himself in the position of being obliged to rely upon his own efforts for a livelihood. This is so obviously true that one wonders there should be resentment among these classes of the community when a word is said in defense of the depositor, a word which in effect means no more than a warning to these interests not to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Today a word uttered in defense of the depositor is often met with the cry of partisanship, and I am just a bit afraid that in attempting to avoid any feeling or appearance of partisanship we, as bankers, may have unwittingly become partisans in the very worst sense. You cannot avoid partisanship by keeping silent when one party desires that you keep silent, and partisanship in disregard of your duty, to the injury and peril of your depositor, is the worst sort of partisanship.

MUST NOT KEEP SILENT ON PRINCIPLES

We cannot be justified in keeping silent when it is our duty to speak, by any plea that we must avoid partisanship.

First. We must manage our own banks. Our depositors are entitled to know in whom is vested the management of the institutions in which they deposit their funds. If we are obliged to surrender the management of our banks in whole or in part to some other person, persons, or agencies, I believe it is our duty to inform our depositors of that fact.

Second. It is our duty to manage our banks in the light of experience, and to the best of our ability, with a view to safeguarding the funds entrusted to us. If we are obliged to abandon practices which in the past have proven necessary to the security of our institutions and our depositors, we should inform our depositors of that fact. Diversification in investments and loans, limitation in the amounts of loans, insistence upon the self-liquidating character of loans accepted by us, the preservation of liquidity, all these must be continued or our depositors be informed that we propose to venture their funds in disregard of some one or more of these principles.

Third. It is our duty to use our best efforts to insure to our depositors a fair return on the funds entrusted to us, and when such a return is rendered increasingly impossible by reason of conditions beyond our immediate control, to inform our depositors of such facts in order that they may intelligently act for their own protection.

Fourth. It is our duty to do everything in our power to make it possible for us to return to our depositors when demanded by them dollars not depreciated by Government fiat or by excessive Government borrowing. Merely to give back the same number of counters would be to fulfill but a legal, not a moral, obligation. When we observe forces beyond our control tending to render impossible the return of sound dollars to our depositors, it again is our duty to inform them of such facts in order that they may act in their own protection.

We know that the politician will do all in his power to prevent the people becoming tax conscious, that he will do this by borrowing instead of paying as we go, by raising revenues through indirect taxes whenever possible instead of through direct taxes. We know that the continuance of the present spending and borrowing policies of Government can lead to but one end, the destruction of the savings of our depositors. It is our duty to do what we can to make the people tax conscious, to show our depositors that visible taxes are but a trifling portion of the real tax burden, to show them not only the extent to which invisible taxes cut into their earnings and their savings, but also to show them how they are further taxed as truly as though such impositions were called taxes by the low interest policies of Government and by competition of Government with banks.

Have we made it clear to our depositors that the reduction of more than one-half in the returns paid on their savings deposits has necessarily and directly resulted from the low-interest policies of Government, together with the fact that Government is today the chief customer for the accumulated funds of our depositors? The average depositor should know that the Government has become the banker's main customer as a result of the accumulated effects of the experimental policies of the administration, of continued threats to industry, and of the consequent destruction of confidence in the future.

Does the average depositor understand that continued borrowing and continued unbalanced budgets lead to the one inevitable end of uncontrolled inflation? Do our depositors understand that they are the creditors and the banks the debtors? Do they understand that when the Government reduces its own debts by inflating the currency, it also reduces the debts of the banks to the depositors, renders impossible return by the banks to the depositors of such dollars as were entrusted by the depositors to the banks, destroys not only the earning value of the deposits but destroys also in large part the principal of the deposits?

Do our depositors understand that the seemingly plump and wholesome condition of the banks does not reflect health but bloat, that excess reserves represent in principal part the purchase of the obligations of Government and the credits created in favor of Government upon such purchases?

They do not, and it is our duty to endeavor to the best of our ability to make these facts clear to them. We banks have failed in that duty.

Does the average depositor understand that by insuring deposits in the FDIC, what the Government has really done is tantamount to insuring itself against threatened lack of funds, to discourage the depositors of America from resorting to the old practice of hiding their savings in a wool sock, to coax out this money from its hiding place and bring it into the vaults of the banks where it can be made easily accessible to the Federal Government? The FDIC cannot insure against loss of earnings through unavoidable reductions in interest rates, nor against loss of principal through inflation.

Does the average depositor realize that with increased centralization of power has come a loss of the proper sense of responsibility for spending the moneys of the people; that history is repeating itself and a group securing control of a one-time democracy are entrenching themselves in power by subsidizing a portion of the electorate?

Does the average depositor realize that the administration is steadily engaged in making permanent that which was originated to meet a war and depression emergency, and that instead of reducing expenses or balancing budgets or encouraging a revival of industry, further and greater charges are placed upon industry?

Some things we can do. We can go to our depositors with the facts. We have their names and addresses, many of them we know personally. We can and should give them the whole story. Why don't we and why haven't we told them that the Federal Government has been enabled to indulge in its wild orgy of spending, because the bankers of America have loaned it the money that was placed with us for safety and sound investment by the wage earners, the professional men, the clerks, the widows, the domestics, the farmers, and all others who live within their means and save? Why don't we and why haven't we told them that the Federal Government came direct to us and got the money and got it upon the Government's own terms? Why didn't we remind them that it wasn't the banker's money but the peoples' money? Why didn't we explain to them our reasons for making such loans?

You need not be told that private enterprise cannot compete with tax supported governmental agencies; that the existence of such agencies restricts the field for private enterprise; that you cannot loan money in competition with Government.

A BALANCED BUDGET AND RESTORATION OF THE GOLD STANDARD

We know today that only in a balanced budget and the restoration of the gold standard lies the possibility of a true recovery. But do our depositors appreciate this? Can we not help them to a correct understanding of this basic truth?

With the banks stuffed with the obligations of government, with their operations fortified by the resources of the Federal Reserve banks, which in turn are likewise loaded with such obligations, with their deposits insured by the FDIC the resources of which consist almost entirely of obligations of the Government, is not the situation one which should be brought to the knowledge of the man who must foot the bill? Can we justify danger, can we even excuse ourselves for delaying in using every faculty and every power at our command to bring these facts to the knowledge of our depositors? To my mind there can be but one answer.

Fundamentally, this country is sound. Our troubles are self-made. We are simply off balance. We are ignoring the balances set up by the Constitution. We are ignoring the balance that comes from free interplay of ideas and independent action in business. We are substituting for all this the ideas of a small group of men to whom are entrusted the powers heretofore exercised by the many.

This is what is called "planned economy," perhaps the oldest thing in government, and the escape from which has been the boast of English-speaking peoples, and particularly of Americans.

Those in authority in government assume today that a part is greater than the whole, that some few men can better direct the affairs of the whole people that can the whole people. They assume that the lessons of history are meaningless or else misleading. They are convinced that initiative is vicious, except when exhibited by an elected officer or an appointed bureaucrat.

They affirm day by day that the very idea of local self-government, whether in public or private affairs was wrong. They affirm that organization should be from the top down and not from the bottom up. They believe that nothing can be too big or too powerful provided it be conceived and controlled by the Federal Government, but that otherwise size is vicious, growth must be prevented. Today they are trying to do two things. They are trying to restore industry, to get business functioning normally and employing the usual percentage of the people and at the same time they are trying to bring about what they call reforms.

They are demanding that business exhibit confidence in the future, assume further obligations, employ more men, and so "relieve" the Federal Government. At the same time they are adding to the numbers on the public payroll, wrapping more and more red tape about industry, demanding more and more that it be guided not by trained management, but by public officials.

CONCENTRATION OF POWER ALWAYS DANGEROUS

Experience demonstrated that in private life, as in public life, too great a concentration of power was dangerous to individual freedom of action, and consequently there were enacted laws imposing necessary regulations and restrictions upon large aggregations of capital.

So far back as history records, those in control of government credited themselves with a superior wisdom and endeavored to regulate the affairs of the people. The further back you go in history the greater this control, the greater "planned economy." The history of the English-speaking peoples is the story of the fight to escape from this control and to render impossible its recurrence, to permit the individual the fullest possible freedom of action to develop himself. Experience taught our ancestors that you could not have this independence if you had too great a concentration of powers in government. That is what brought about the division of the powers of government between the executive, legislative and judicial. That is what brought about the separation of church and state.

Experience also taught our ancestors that effective organization, organization which served the people and which did not dominate the people, had to come from the bottom up and not from the top down. That is what established our local governments, our State governments, and our Federal Government. The Federal Government did not set up the States, the counties, the cities, the towns; on the contrary, the people established these units, restricting and limiting the powers entrusted to them as they progressed, from the smallest to the largest, and leaving to the latter, or believing that they had left to the latter, only those matters of true national concern.

Now, whatever we may think of all this, we cannot avoid recognizing that it worked better than any planned economy ever worked. It brought about a standard of living higher than had ever been known upon this earth before. It made possible to the common man comforts of life unknown to the rulers of kingdoms of but a few generations ago.

If banking is to become a government monopoly let it be because we have determined that that is best for the country. Do not let it happen because we shut our eyes to the successive steps taken by certain men in the government to bring about this result. Let us clearly recognize that just as State rights are being destroyed by encroachments of the Federal Government, by what amounts to coercion and by unjustifiable gratuities, just so are the foundations of independent banking being sapped by the successive encroachments of government upon the functions of the banker and the increasing control by the Federal Government of the operations of the banks.

Let us not forget that when the borrower dicates the policies of the lender the business of the lender will be conducted in the interests of the borrower and not in the interests of the lender.

We know that it is not too late to act. The power to shape our course, to put an end to the evils that beset us, still lies with the depositors of America. They are our finest citizens and constitute the strength and backbone of our country. Give them the facts, and you may trust to the soundness of their heads and hearts.

Opportunity for unusual service comes only in great crises. Leadership at such times calls for both wisdom and courage. Not in our lifetime has there been such opportunity for service by we bankers as now exists. The danger is grave and imminent, yet the people can be trusted to act rightly in their own interests if we give them the facts.

Let us not make it possible for history to record that in this supreme hour the bankers of America, out of silence induced by fear of reprisals, failed both their depositors and their country. When the future of the Nation and the welfare of its people are involved, mere party politics sink into insignificance. The issue is no longer one of mere partisanship, but of simple honesty and patriotism.

The ballot box is the last best hope of our commonwealth. Use it to save what's left.

The Position of Labor in Our Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and interesting discussion of the position of labor in our economy. This discussion was inspired by an article in a recent issue of the American magazine, entitled "Is Labor Riding for a Fall?" and was held over the American Forum of the Air, under the direction of Theodore Granik, its founder, at the NBC Theater in Washington, D. C., Saturday, August 12, 1950.

This discussion was participated in by the well-know industrialist, James F. Lincoln, president of the Lincoln Electric Co.; and Mr. James B. Carey, one of America's foremost leaders of labor and secretary-treasurer of the CIO.

I am advised by the Public Printer that this material is estimated to make 2⅔ pages in the RECORD at a cost of $218.68.

There being no objection, the discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS LABOR RIDING FOR A FALL?

ANNOUNCER. What is ahead for labor? How can labor hold its gains? Is labor riding for a fall?

The National Broadcasting Co. presents the American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik, and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the NBC Theater in Washington, D. C.

Now, here is your moderator, Theodore Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. There has been a great deal of discussion in business and labor circles concerning a vital article which appeared in a recent issue of American Magazine, entitled, "Is Labor Riding for a Fall?" Its authority, James F. Lincoln, president of the Lincoln Electric Co., poses this important question, and I quote:

"Can labor hold its place in the sun during the second half of the century, or will working folk gradually lose the great gains they have made and slip back toward the conditions from which they rose—back toward poverty, wage serfdom, slavery?"

Then his article continues:

"That is perhaps the most important question of our times, but it is one which no one can answer but labor itself."

So the American Forum of the Air has invited one of the Nation's foremost labor leaders, James B. Carey, secretary-treasurer of the CIO, to give us the answer; and we are equally happy to have Mr. Lincoln here today to give us his views.

Now, Mr. Carey, is labor riding for a fall?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Granik, in my opinion the answer is "no." Mr. Lincoln seems to have a fear about the future of our Nation. It is important that we maintain strength on the part of the people in order to maintain the strength of our Nation, but we have the most productive Nation in the world. It is a Nation that has developed work habits among the people that produced beyond anything imagined by any other group, and if labor can bring the employers to realize that the sales of their products depend on the consuming power of all of the people, and can share the profits of employers with the consumers and workers, this Nation will continue to gain in strength.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. Mr. Carey overlooks one fundamental fact in his statement, and that is that the cost of product, which is the thing that determines how much of it will be sold, depends upon the efficiency of manufacture. That, at the present time, is at a very low ebb, in spite of the fact that labor-saving machinery has gone way beyond anything we have ever seen before in the history of the world, and yet the manufacturing efficiencies are very low, largely because of the interference of the labor union and labor leadership with the functions of management.

Chairman GRANIK. How about that interference?

Mr. CAREY. We are both electrical workers, and we come from the electrical industry, and let us discuss specifically the industry that we are most familiar with.

The largest corporation has been very productive, it is very profitable, and in fact, from a report just recently issued, the president of that corporation—and I won't tell you the name, and for the purpose of discussion we will just call it the "Generous Electric Co."—the largest producer in the entire industry, and he said:

"In the 6 months ended June 30, General Electric and its consolidated affiliates earned a net profit of $77,445,000, an increase of 66 percent over the $46,553,000 earned in the corresponding period of a year ago."

Now, let me remind you, the period of a year ago was the highest, most profitable year in the history of that concern, and now this year, the first half is 66 percent higher. And what does that do? In the second quarter of this year, the consolidated earnings totaled $40,587,000, compared with $19,850,000 earned in the corresponding quarter of 1949.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. It is perfectly obvious that every manufacturing organization is bound to make money. If they don't, they go out of business. Obviously, again, the price that they must charge is a price in which they will make a profit.

The point I make, and which it seems to me is the most important, is this, that the cost of the product is the important thing, and it will be the determining factor as to how much of the product is going to be sold over a long period of time. It is true at the present time that manufactured products in general are selling for about three times what they were a matter of 12 years ago. That is because of the fact that the efficiency of production has gone steadily down, when every effort that management can make has been to increase the efficiency of production by better producing tools. In spite of that, there has been a continual reduction in the efficiency of production.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, let us talk facts, now.

Mr. LINCOLN. That is fact.

Mr. CAREY. In the first 6 months of this year, the Generous Electric Co. produced $881,000,000 worth of goods. That is 10 percent more than the first half of last year. For the quarter ending June 30, sales amounted to $402,600,000, an increase of 19 percent over the second quarter of 1949, and they did it with fewer workers.

Now, Mr. Lincoln, if you can produce more goods with fewer workers, does that mean that the productivity is going down, or does it mean that the productivity is going up?

Mr. LINCOLN. The unfortunate thing about your figures, Mr. Carey, is this: that if you double the price, you will double the number of dollars for the same amount of material, the same amount of product. The point I have made now twice is the fact that the price has gone up, and gone up rapidly, because of the continual reduction in the efficiency of the operation. Obviously, if they were to double the price again, they would have twice as much product as they had.

Mr. CAREY. Who doubles the price, Mr. Lincoln, the labor unions? And here is the profit. Mr. Lincoln, I asked you a question.

Mr. LINCOLN. The labor union doubles the price.

Mr. CAREY. The question is: Does the labor union have control of the price policy?

Mr. LINCOLN. Of course they do.

Mr. CAREY. Well, now, these figures that you question are the figures of the president of the corporation, and I assume that they are truthful.

Mr. LINCOLN. I haven't questioned the figures.

Mr. CAREY. This company contends that they have reduced the prices, and I think in this respect the company is correct. They should have reduced the prices far beyond anything that they did, and they should share this tremendous profit. It amounts, in the first half of 1950, to 30 percent; that is 30 percent profit on the invested capital in that corporation.

Mr. LINCOLN. What has that got to do with it? Again I say if you have to double the price of a product in order to make up for the inefficiency of manufacture, you will increase the dollars of output, but the point I have made, and made all along, is the one fact that the efficiency of production has gone steadily down.

Chairman GRANIK. Let me ask a question. In your article you say your workers produce as much as they can and are paid accordingly. Suppose there is a decline in orders, then what happens?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is perfectly simple. In the first place, what would occur would be this: First, we would reduce hours, and because of that the amount of output would be reduced in accordance with the hours, the efficiency remaining the same.

We have over the last 20 years—and that goes back to 1932 when there was a very great reduction in business generally—we have been able to keep all of the people in the organization employed. It is true, in shorter hours, at certain times, but they have all been employed.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Carey?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, when you reduce the hours of the workers, does that reduce their income?

Mr. LINCOLN. Would it reduce their income?

Mr. CAREY. Yes.

Mr. LINCOLN. I would guess it would.

Mr. CAREY. Wouldn't it be proper to say that the first thing you do is cut the pay, the earnings of workers? And that is one of the important questions that we have. If the workers get enough money, they can buy back the products that they make in such abundance, and when the workers don't get enough money, due to the corporation's taking off such exorbitant profits, then, of course, the workers have worked themselves out of jobs.

Now here we have a corporation, the Generous Electric Corp., that not only took these exorbitant profits but, according to a statement on the part of its president, they increased the number of plants in recent years from 61 plants to 115 plants. They increase, of course, their productivity, and they expand their plants, and the company's net worth is more than double what it was; and in addition to that, they paid profits to the stockholders double what they did. The salaries of the executives are double. And during that same period, the workers lost the profit-sharing arrangement that that corporation had in operation at one time, and they didn't take it all the way out——

Mr. LINCOLN. What has this to do with what we are talking about?

Mr. CAREY. "Is labor heading for a fall?"

Mr. LINCOLN. Fine.

Mr. CAREY And we are talking about: Is labor more productive today than it ever has been; and we are talking about: Are employers willing to share?

Chairman GRANIK. May I ask a question?

Mr. LINCOLN. What has that got to do with it?

Mr. CAREY. If employers don't share the increased productivity of workers, then we are not going to have sufficient consuming power to keep these tremendous plants in operation. It is not just the plants we had in operation, but the many expanded plants that we built.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Carey, are labor unions for or against the use of profit-sharing and incentive plans?

Mr. CAREY. Certainly.

Mr. LINCOLN. Certainly what?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, in your article——

Mr. LINCOLN. What do you mean, certainly what? Are they for or against it?

Mr. CAREY. We asked this particular company just last week to reinstitute the profit-sharing plan that they had in operation. And sure, we are in favor of sharing profits with the workers, Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. LINCOLN. Will you talk to the rest of your labor leaders? They say that they are not in favor of it?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, we are very much in favor of sharing the profits.

Mr. LINCOLN. Will you let the rest of the people in the labor leadership know about that?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; through the medium of Ted Granik's broadcast, we say to the employers, and to the workers, that the labor leaders are in favor of sharing the profits that the employers take in large quantities to themselves.

Chairman GRANIK. How do they feel about piecework systems?

Mr. CAREY. This piecework system generally is one method of providing rewards. There are some complicated piecework systems that the workers cannot understand, and I doubt if some managements understand, that are merely made complicated to disguise that management wants increased efforts and increased production without increased earnings going to the workers.

Any system that provides for increased pay for increased efforts is a good system, unless there are some complications or gimmicks in it in which case it is merely another way of fooling the working people.

Mr. LINCOLN. May I ask the question: Is the labor leadership for piecework, yes or no?

Mr. CAREY. In some cases, yes; and in other cases, no. It is according to the piecework system. And now, let us speak specifically.

Mr. LINCOLN. It is according to the labor leader, because there are a number of labor leaders who say they are not for piecework.

Mr. CAREY. There may be some labor leaders who are not for some kinds of piecework.

Mr. LINCOLN. It isn't "some kind of piecework." They say definitely that they are not for piecework.

Mr. CAREY. Well, we asked in General Electric just last week—pardon me, the Generous Electric Company—just last week——

Mr. LINCOLN. That is the same one that you are speaking about all of the time?

Chairman GRANIK. You have been a pioneer in incentive pay for workers. Would you care to discuss your plan?

Mr. LINCOLN. I should be very glad to. It illustrates, too, the mistake in the thinking that Mr. Carey has regarding this whole matter.

Fundamentally, don't forget that labor is paid, not by management and not by the company; labor is paid by the consumer. The consumer pays every dollar of wages, of taxes, of the profit, and everything else that the manufacturer gets.

Now, with this plan that we have, we go to the worker and say this: "Our job is to build a better product at a lower price. If we do that, the consumer will be very grateful and he will be very glad, indeed, to pay you larger for that." Because of that, we have been able to increase enormously the cooperation between labor and management, because labor and management are the same, and we have been able to increase enormously the efficiency of our operation. Over the last 17 years we have reduced the number of man-hours to produce a product, or to produce our product, by more than 85 percent. During that time, the consumer has been so grateful that he has increased the average earnings of the hourly worker to over $6,500 a year. Try that on your labor union.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Carey?

Mr. CAREY. Let us try it now. How many employees do you have, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. About one thousand.

Mr. CAREY. Did a labor union oppose the system you put into operation?

Mr. LINCOLN. Some of your leaders do. One of them, for instance, is this man at General Motors.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, I happen to be president of the union in your industry, and now speak specifically, Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. LINCOLN. I am talking of one who does object to it.

Mr. CAREY In our industry, Mr. Lincoln?

Mr. LINCOLN. What industry do you mean?

Mr. CAREY. The electrical industry, the industry you are a part of. Did a union ever condemn or oppose your particular system?

Mr. LINCOLN. The union has always been very quickly kicked out when they came into our set-up.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Lincoln, I don't think the union in our industry is particularly concerned about whether they get kicked out or whether they don't. They are awfully persistent.

Mr. LINCOLN. I just don't know. I am trying to answer your question.

Mr. CAREY. I am the chairman of that union, Mr. Lincoln, and did you ever hear any remarks of criticism or did you ever kick our union out of your plant?

Mr. LINCOLN I never kicked any union out of any plant. That was taken care of by our men.

Mr. CAREY. Now, Mr Lincoln, if the workers wanted to have a union in your plant, would you deal with them according to the law?

Mr. LINCOLN. Well, wouldn't you have to?

Mr. CAREY. I think so.

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, that is my understanding, too.

Chairman GRANIK. Shall we take a question from the audience? Do you have a question, please?

Mr. MCCLAIR. I am Howard McClair, of the American Institute of Cooperation, and this question is for Mr. Lincoln. Is the cost-of-living formula a sound basis of wage determination?

Mr. LINCOLN. In our estimation it is. We use it and have used it over the last 15 years. As the cost of living changes, the wage rates themselves change in the same proportion. It has worked out very successfully. Now, remember that is entirely aside from the bonus which over the last 10 years has been more than wages

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Carey?

Mr. CAREY. We asked this General Electric Co. if they would agree to reinstitute the cost-of-living bonus that they put into operation and then took out, and their answer was "No." They contend that it is not a proper way. Now, as the spokesman of American industry here, especially for the electrical industry, who has said that some labor unions influence the worker, I ask Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Lincoln, do you think that you can have any influence on an associate of yours, the General Electric Co., to reinstitute some of these things that you advocate here?

Mr. LINCOLN. You understand that the General Electric Co. is a bitter opponent of ours, and while I resent the idea of your calling it the "Generous Electric Co," I still say that we are competitors, and as such would fight to the death.

Mr. CAREY Do you mean there are warfares and jurisdictional disputes going on in American industry?

Mr. LINCOLN. Haven't you heard of them?

Mr. CAREY. I have; but I haven't read about them in Westbrook Pegler's column. You only read about disputes within the ranks of labor, and there is nothing in your article, Mr. Lincoln, about these patent disputes and these other kinds of disputes that go on with American employers.

Mr. LINCOLN. What has that got to do with the subject?

Mr. CAREY. The subject is, "Is labor riding for a fall?"

Chairman GRANIK. Let me see if a gentleman in the audience has a question pertaining to that question?

Mr. KAUFMAN. My name is Joseph W. Kaufman, counsel to the House Small Business Committee, headed by WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas. We receive a lot of complaints from small business organizations that labor isn't giving small business a fair break. Some of them say it is. I would like to ask Mr. Carey whether he thinks labor unions are giving small business a fair break, and if they are not, whether that may contribute to the downfall of labor?

Mr. CAREY. Well, labor is primarily concerned with those corporations that determine the wage scales for all workers. Leading concerns like General Electric and Westinghouse include the United States Steel and Bethlehem, International Harvester, and the others. If labor has a purpose to serve in the interests of the whole community, it will serve the purpose of the small-business man by requiring these corporations, these large corporations, to share their tremendous profits with the consumers, and with the workers, as well as with management and with the stockholders. It is important that labor render that service to our whole society because if the General Electric Corp. can expand from having the few plants it had a few years ago, 66 in number, to one hundred and some in number today, and gain these great profits and not reduce prices and not increase wages, then the General Electric Corp. can gobble up the Lincoln Electric Co. and all of the other concerns in the industry.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. LINCOLN. Please don't say things like that, because you know it isn't the truth. And in the second place, if it were true, that is one of the things which the present laws on the statute books covering such matters would take care of. Now then, as a matter of fact, small business is going forward more rapidly now than large business proportionately, and please don't say over and over again that these are enormous profits. Because remember you people in the labor unions have been able to so far reduce the efficiency of labor that you have more than doubled the cost of the products which they produce.

Mr. CAREY. Is that true in the electrical industry?

Mr. LINCOLN. Wait a minute. And because of that it is necessary to run the price up on the consuming public, including yourselves, to a point where your dollar is worth less than half of what it was worth some 15 years ago. And that is going on and on and on, and that is one of the things which you are going to be held accountable for by the fellow who pays the wages and pays these profits and also pays the taxes.

Mr. CAREY. Do I understand you, Mr. Lincoln, to say that you don't have concern about these large corporations gobbling up small business, that the latter is going ahead faster than it ever has?

Mr. LINCOLN. It is going ahead at the present time faster than it ever has because of the fact that we had a war, because of the fact that there are shortages which that war caused; but as far as the actual proportions of small to large business, it is greater now both in number and in productivity than was true 15 or 20 or 30 or 40 years ago.

Mr. CAREY. If small business is going ahead greater than it ever did and if large business is going ahead greater than it ever did, and if labor unions are more influential today than they have ever been, I would say that that might be a splendid answer to the question that is raised. Then the labor unions growing in strength result in having the small businessmen grow in strength and prosperity and the large business interests as well. Now, all we ask, Mr. Lincoln, is this: Wouldn't you agree that these large corporations should reduce the prices that they have been requiring for their products, and share these tremendous profits with their consumers and their workers? Now, General Electric for the ——

Chairman GRANIK. Let him answer the question.

Mr. CAREY. I ask this specifically. They have made profits which if they were shared with their consumers they could reduce prices by 10 percent, and they could give every worker 18 cents an hour more in wages, and have the highest profits that they have ever had in the entire history of their concern?

Chairman GRANIK. Let him answer the question.

Mr. LINCOLN. In the first place, you are talking about something that isn't true; and in the second place, you are forgetting and you are overlooking this fact, that because of the inflation which the present program has forced on the country, you have to have profits twice as large in dollars to have the same amount of profit, and you also have to have them three times as large in order to build these plants that you are talking about in order to give work to those people. Now, don't forget this also, that you are entirely overlooking the fact that the fellow that pays these wages, that pays these profits, that is the fellow that we as management and also as labor have to look out for—the consumer. He is the fellow that is being legislated against.

CHAIRMAN GRANIK. Can I take a question?

Mr. JAQUET. My name is George Jaquet. I happen to be a management analyst and I would like to ask this question of you, Mr. Lincoln, if you will. This refers to the worker. How does the so-called Lincoln plan that you have developed, and that you advocate, differ in its benefits to the worker from the plan employed by Jack and Heintz during the last war where very liberal bonuses and other striking advantages were enjoyed by the employees?

Mr. LINCOLN. The differences between the two—and please remember that I am not completely advised as to this Jack & Heintz program—but I think that I can safely say the difference comes from this: That in our case the man earns the money he gets. In the case of Jack & Heintz it certainly was true in some cases that he got money that he didn't earn. Now, the great difference between the two is the fact that in our case the man feels the responsibility to his boss, the consumer, and in the case of Jack & Heintz I don't think that he did to the same extent. I do know that Jack & Heintz have been in trouble since the last war stopped, financially.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Carey?

Mr. CAREY. I don't care particularly to comment on that question, but I am still trying to get from Mr. Lincoln an answer to the question: Shouldn't the American employers where they can as in the case of General Electric, reduce the prices of their product to the consumer and raise the wages and take only enough profits to make it possible for them to expand and pay their investors a reasonable return on their investment?

Mr. LINCOLN. That is all that they are doing at the present time. The only place you can get money is from the profit of the company at the present time. Therefore, if you are going to expand you must do it by the profit that you make.

Chairman GRANIK. It is time for summaries. Mr. Carey, your summary, please.

Mr. CAREY. I don't think labor is heading for a fall. If you look upon labor as an important part of America, there may be someone who would like to see labor head for a fall, but as long as labor adopts policies and carries out programs in the interests of the whole country labor is not heading for a fall. It may be true that we have shortcomings within the ranks of labor. I am certain that we have. We may have shortcomings among labor leaders. But today the policies of the labor movement are to help strengthen our Nation. We advocate supporting our Government in its foreign policy, and we advocate stopping the Communists in their tracks and removing the cause of communism. We advocate reducing prices, increasing the consuming power of the purchasers, and we ask that employers adopt similar policies, to stop the gouging of the public with their exorbitant prices, and to share their profits with their consumers and their workers, and we will continue to build a strong Nation, a model for the rest of the world.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you. And your summary, Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. LINCOLN. The thing that we have missed here entirely is the fact of the definite responsibility that labor and management both have to the consumer. There is no war, there can be no war such as has been set up between labor and management. They are both responsible to the consumer, because the consumer is the man who hires them. Every dollar that everybody gets in this industry, both labor and the management, comes from the consumer. We have entirely overlooked that. We think that labor should fight and continue to fight with management to get more money out of management. The only money that management has is what it has to take from the consumer, and the only way that labor can get more money is by taking it from the consumer. It is that which is causing the resentment in the minds of the consumer, and which will, if continued, mean that labor is riding for a fall. That would be the most terrible thing that could happen to the economy, but happen it will unless we change.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you.

Lack of Preparation by the United States for the War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, the August 18, 1950, column of David Lawrence presents a serious analysis that is worthy of consideration by all of us. I ask unanimous consent that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY UNITED STATES NOT BETTER PREPARED FOR WAR—TODAY IN WASHINGTON

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, August 18.—Unwittingly the headlines in American newspapers in the last 48 hours have told why America hasn't been better prepared to fight the war in Korea.

The dramatic story of the mass flight of B-29's which dropped 850 tons of bombs over a 26-square-mile area in Korea was immediately given here the same kind of acceptance that has heretofore caused strategic bombing to dominate the whole American defense program.

It reads persuasively now, as it did to Congress these last 4 years. It appears now, as it did then, to many superficial observers to be the simple, inexpensive way to defeat an enemy—just drop tons upon tons of bombs from miles up, no matter where they hit and not matter how indiscriminate the operation necessarily must be from high altitudes—and there will not be much need of a ground Army or a Navy.

But this actual demonstration is being conducted at a time when the dispatches must necessarily tell what happened the next day. It is no disparagement of the B-29's or of the decision to send them on this mission to point out that this was a supplementary and psychological operation and by no means a primary role for the heavy bombers.

The B-29's undoubtedly had a terrorizing effect and probably were very much more useful in striking at army concentrations than in combing over the relatively few targets for strategic bombing operations in North Korea. Yet the mission must be judged by what its immediate and direct effects on enemy operations really were. The next day's dispatches from the United Press correspondent in the war zone said:

"The strength of the sudden Communist push from the north indicated that the North Koreans may have shifted some of the four to six divisions they had massed on the west bank of the Naktong River northwest of Waegwan to the northern sector before American B-29's dropped 850 tons of bombs on the west bank yesterday.

"Reconnaissance planes which flew over the blasted and burning 26-square-mile target area northwest of Waegwan today could find no sign of the 40,000 to 60,000 troops believed there."

Then came from the Associated Press correspondent in the same zone a dispatch a little later telling of a drive by 30,000 North Koreans and adding:

"The Communists poured out of the area hit by B-29 bombers west of the Naktong River. They jumped off from an area between Waegwan and Kunwi."

What this means, of course, is that high-level bombing did not disorganize the troops of the enemy or prevent them from realigning their divisions in time to make a concentrated attack the next day.

Strategic bombers were never designed to do such a job. What the United States needed this week on the central Korean front was several units of low-level bombers, the kind that dive close to the target and really see what they are aiming at. These units, often called "tactical aviation," are very scarce nowadays in the United States Army because most of the money and the manpower has been used to develop a program of high-level bombing for use in Europe. The idea that planes could fly across oceans and attack with atom bombs was sold to the American people as an inexpensive substitute for almost everything else, though top-level commanders will deny they intended any such thing. Yet a re-reading now of the publicity given strategic bombing these last few years will confirm the impression that the three armed services were not treated as co-ordinate branches and each given a chance to build up what it needed. That kind of autonomy was lost in the passion for "unification" which has turned out to be an allocation of most of the money to a single concept of strategy—the high-flying bombers of the United States Air Force—while the Navy was largely put aside and the Army was deprived of men and equipment, tanks and planes.

In the last 24 hours the American people were told that there has been moved across the Pacific by the Navy since the Korean invasion started a total of 40,000 American Army, Air Force, Marines, and Navy men; 2,000,000 barrels of petroleum, 1,500,000 tons of cargo. In addition a big Navy carrier ferried across, on its broad deck, 170 planes for the United States Air Force and, below deck, 1,000 Air Force personnel and 1,000 tons of necessary cargo.

The strategic bombers of the United States Air Force are vital, the Army foot soldier is vital, tactical aviation is vital, the Marines are vital, and the Navy is vital. The wonder is that anyone in top command—civilian or military—was ever able to say that navies were obsolete, carriers should not be modernized because they were going in mothballs anyway, and that the Marines—with the only trained units of tactical aviation in support of ground troops—should be deprived of their identity, and reduced in size, and that tanks and ground armies were secondary. But that's what has happened within 18 months, beginning in January 1949—and mostly because strategic bombing is exciting, spectacular and theoretically destructive enough to win a war. It hasn't happened that way in Korea.

Tariffs Can Wait

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD L. LEAHY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial entitled "Tariffs Can Wait" from the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of August 19.

The editorial is well reasoned and its tone is such as to appeal to fair-minded persons. Far from attacking the principle of reciprocal trade agreements, it assumes the soundness of the system. It gives well-merited praise to my colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], for his suggestion that the Reciprocal Tariff Conference scheduled for next month at Torquay, England, be postponed or canceled. The editorial states the issue with great clarity and correctly concludes that my colleague has performed a public service by his suggestion for postponement.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TARIFFS CAN WAIT

Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN'S conviction that this is no time to readjust reciprocal tariffs is soundly based. His suggestion that the scheduled September conference for this purpose at Torquay, England, should be either postponed or canceled should be heeded.

Even as late as 1947, when the Geneva international agreement on reciprocal tariff policy was adopted and the first negotiations between the signatory governments were begun, there was strong hope that the trade world would soon achieve a substantial measure of stability. If it did not, the concessions and counterconcessions on which the workability of the reciprocal trade program rests could easily lose their justification

By last year, when representatives of the signatory governments met at Annecy, France, to negotiate on additional items for which reciprocal treatment might be granted, the strong hope of 1947 for stability had markedly dimmed. Among various delegations there was a noticeable loss of enthusiasm to offer concessions by the countries they represented. Nevertheless, despite the growing concern regarding lack of stability in international economic relationships, conspicuously apparent in foreign exchange complicated by dollar shortages, American leadership prodded the conference into making a substantial number of new reciprocal concessions.

Today, however, the situation is vastly changed. There is no telling whether such concessions as any government might consider feasible in September would have any economic justification a year later, or perhaps sooner. The Korean war and related events have made even day-to-day international commercial transactions often risky at best. When the economic world is in this degree of flux, it would be foolhardy to attempt to make fixed commitments for an indefinite and highly uncertain future.

The fact that such conditions exist, however, should not be regarded in any quarter as invalidating the sound principle on which the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act rests. When international economic circumstances are more propitious, the task of making specific agreements can be resumed. Meanwhile Senator GREEN, himself a stanch advocate of the reciprocal system, has rendered a public service in asking for suspension of further effort toward new agreements. Tariff tinkering now simply does not make sense.

Fortified Villages of North Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial entitled "Fortified Villages of North Dakota." This appeared in the Washington Evening Star newspaper, August 19, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORTIFIED VILLAGES OF NORTH DAKOTA

The Smithsonian Institution has announced that a party of archeologists under the leadership of G. Ellis Burcaw is excavating an earth lodge village site at the Garrison Reservoir in North Dakota. There were a fairly large number of such settlements in pre-Columbian times, and examination of them should add greatly to modern knowledge of the Indians of the Missouri Valley. The standard pattern of the communities was peculiar. Most of the villages were fortified. They also were encircled by water. In effect, they were moated.

This means that the men who designed and built them had engineering skill. Only rarely, if at all, did they take advantage of a natural island and rest content with the protection which the river itself afforded. They dug their own trenches. Further, they constructed stockades on packed earth walls for defensive purposes. In these fortifications they set up watchtowers at frequent intervals. The Smithsonian authorities say: "They are strikingly similar * * * to European fortified villages of the Middle Ages."

But the moat-surrounded villages of North Dakota likewise resemble far older devices. They have much in common with the stone circles of ancient Britain. Stonehenge stood indeed still stands—above an encircling ditch which was made by human enterprise. The notion that it was a temple in prehistoric days is contradicted by the obvious evidence that it was intended to withstand siege. More probably it was a parliamentary center, a seat of government, subject to attack by enemies intending its capture and despoilment.

The same logic is manifest at Garrison Reservoir. Whatever tribe or nation created the earth lodge village now being uncovered there had property to guard, a civilization to preserve. To the best of its group-capacity it prepared to survive potential disaster. Five hundred or a thousand years later we are attempting the same defense of what is precious to us. But moats and stockades will not serve our need. We require a more dynamic system of security. Failing to achieve it, we must pass, as the North Dakota Indians did, and be merely a riddle for the archeologists of another age.

Molly Yard Wins Meade Apology

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article entitled "Molly Yard Wins Meade Apology," which appeared in the Philadelphia Bulletin of Wednesday, July 26, 1950, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOLLY YARD WINS MEADE APOLOGY—EX-CHAIRMAN RETRACTS CHARGE OF COMMUNISM

Mrs. Molly Yard Garrett has accepted a settlement of $1,000 out of court in her libel suit against William F. Meade and the Republican city committee for calling her a Communist.

She also won a public retraction from Meade, who as GOP city chairman made the charges during last fall's county election campaign.

The settlement was announced this afternoon in the offices of Abraham L. Freedman, Mrs. Garrett's attorney, in the Packard Building. Mrs. Garrett, who flew here from California for the settlement, was present.

STATEMENT BY MEADE

Meade's retraction, as released by Freedman said:

"During the 1949 political campaign for row offices in Philadelphia, I made certain statements on the radio regarding Molly Yard. I called her a Communist and this charge was rebroadcast on the radio and received wide publicity ir the press.

"I made the charge on the basis of information which I thought at the time was reliable. It now turns out that there was no evidence to justify the charge.

"I regret that in the heat of a political campaign I was led to make the charge. Since it was unfounded, I hope that all those who heard it will now learn of this, my public retraction."

WIFE OF TEACHER

Mrs. Garrett is the wife of Sylvester Garrett, who was chairman of the Third Regional War Labor Board here and now is a law professor at Stanford University.

She filed suit for $25,000 about two weeks after Meade made his charge in an attack on the Americans for Democratic Action, of which she was a founding member in this city. Meade said the ADA was Communist-infiltrated.

He referred to Mrs. Garrett as a bustling little Communist worker who got around.

Today, as she smilingly accepted the award, Mrs. Garrett said:

REPREHENSIBLE

"I undertook the unpleasant job of suing Meade because he had done a reprehensible thing.

"I feel very strongly that free elections following free discussion of public issues is the basic foundation of our democratic form of government. Meade debased the democratic process of free elections by making the fear-inspiring charge of communism.

"I feel the best answer to the whole thing was the election. And, boy, was I proud of the Northeast, where I helped do the organizing."

Belated Awakening—Is It Real?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GLENN R. DAVIS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there is a real and apparent need for legislation to curb the activities of subversives in this country. For too long, until just recently, has the House Committee on Un-American Activities been the whipping boy for the self-styled liberals of this country. Too many people in too high places have referred to the efforts to root subversives out of the Government as "red herrings."

Three weeks ago 14 of my colleagues and I issued a joint statement in which we said:

Communists should be required to register at once, and the Government authorized to place restrictions upon their movements. Increased penalties for sabotage and espionage should be immediately enacted into law. It is folly of the highest order to draft Americans for combat against communism abroad and at the same time to permit Communists unlimited freedom of action at home.

Legislation should be enacted immediately by Congress which will insure adequate public knowledge of Communists and their activities.

The President has sent us a message on this subject which will perhaps now, at this late hour, cause administration leaders to bestir themselves. So far their efforts have definitely been on the "milk toast and water" side. They seem to want to make it appear that they are presenting a Mundt-Nixon bill without actually doing so. I doubt if the American people will be fooled. Certainly Ray Hansen, editor of the Daily Jefferson County Union, published at Fort Atkinson, Wis., has not been fooled, and neither has Wheeler McMillen, writing in the current issue of Pathfinder magazine. Their editorials are well worth reading:

OUR ANTI-ANTI-COMMUNISTS

It is no longer fashionable in some circles to be either outright anti-American or pro-Soviet. A new species is developing—an insidious species because it dwells in the shadow-gray between the forthright pro and con.

The anti-anti-Communists call witch-hunting and Red-baiting any attempts by serious Americans to safeguard strategic Government agencies from Communist infiltration. They make spectacular peace gestures, as if our country were guilty in any controversy, hot or cold. They believe our country should always give in on such issues as the blockade of Berlin, Russian boycott of the United Nations, Russian demands to seat Red China.

They consider anyone openly opposed to communism as lacking in objectivity or a little hysterical. They represent communism as a good idea gone wrong but a trend of the future.

They look upon the bright side, ignoring the oppressiveness, of the Soviet satellite regimes in Europe and the Far East. They play down the hostility of such regimes to the United States. Their influence is to be reckoned with. Not being outright pros and cons, they are well protected by their enmeshment of fallacy and half-truth. Their viewpoint is entrenched in some very respectable places. Republicans believe it is always fashionable to be an American.

UNWASHED POLITICS

(By Wheeler McMillen)

The common sense of Americans has long recognized that every Communist inside the United States contemplates treason. At every opportunity the people have expressed their alarm at the Government's softness toward these agents of alien interests.

Public pressure has built increasing support for the Mundt-Ferguson bill. Developed over a period of 2 years, the Mundt-Ferguson bill supplies the Government with adequate powers to identify and restrain those guilty of espionage and anti-American activities and to punish those found guilty. It gives the Federal Bureau of Investigation a legal basis for dealing with Communists. Senator FERGUSON, an outstanding lawyer, has taken pains to make certain that the purposes may be attained without violating constitutional rights of citizens.

Several weeks ago, when it was becoming clear that the people were demanding this measure, the Senate's Democratic policy committee considered it. Their decision was that to permit so important and popular a bill to be enacted with Republican Senators' names on it would be bad politics. Upon hearing of this decision, Senator MUNDT and Senator FERGUSON offered to withdraw their names and to permit Democratic Senators to sponsor the legislation. This offer was spurned, perhaps as not being sufficiently deceptive.

Last week the President demanded legislation to bring the internal activities of hostile spies under control. In no important detail did he call for accomplishing anything not covered in the Mundt-Ferguson bill. Some generalities on civil rights were set forth, though most persons consider such rights fully protected in the bill already before the Senate.

In other words, the President has been pushed by public opinion into acknowledging that Communist agents must be watched and made punishable. He admits that stronger legislation must be adopted. But he wants it passed under a Democratic label. Few will be deceived by this maneuver. The public will recognize in it a familiar brand of unwashed politics.

Some gratification, however, may be derived from the fact that the same President who called the Alger Hiss affair a "Red herring" now admits that many of these queer fish are actually dangerous snakes in the American grass. The recognition comes late, however, to an administration that has tolerated Communists and their left-wing assistants in the Government itself.

One must expect, even in times of crisis, that men in political office will play a certain amount of politics. The people have a right to expect, nevertheless, that occasionally a man in high office will rise above politics.

For political gain, the Truman administration and its predecessor have appeased the left-wing elements in the country. They have been too kind to Communists, and to those who have played the Communist tunes.

This is not a left-wing country. Despite confusion and faltering by parts of the public when deceived by unscrupulous leaders, the great majority wants to preserve the American fundamentals of individual freedom and personal responsibility. Yet, because enough have been confused by the strident leftish voices, it has been politically profitable to cater to the confused groups. Both parties have been guilty.

The primary elections this summer have booted a fair number of the leftish Members of Congress into retirement. Perhaps these events will signal the preference of most people for plain Americans. Voters will have another chance at the Congressional elections in November to say that they do not want either safety of the Nation or the integrity of American principles subjected to cheap political treatment.

What party designation is attached to a law to bring treasonable communism under control makes little difference. When the Nation needs fighters to risk their lives, no one asks the boys who are being drafted what party they belong to.

United Nations Watchdog Commissions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, one of the most sensible and timely editorials I have read in a long while appeared in the Bismarck Tribune, published at Bismarck, N. Dak., under date of August 15, 1950. The editorial is entitled "Watchdogs To Spot Aggressor."

I take particular pleasure in asking for its insertion in the RECORD since it is written by my former administrative assistant, John O. Hjelle, who is now editor of the Bismarck Tribune.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATCHDOGS TO SPOT AGGRESSOR

The United Nations could wisely adopt a proposal by a church group that watchdog commissions be placed in trouble spots all around the world.

The suggestion comes from the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs. Its leadership includes John Foster Dulles, Republican adviser to the State Department; Francis B. Sayre, United States delegate to the UN Trusteeship Council; Arnold Toynbee, British historian; Charles Malik, Lebanon minister to the United States, and several other prominent figures.

It's perhaps doubtful whether such watchdog commissions would act, as the group declares, as a "deterrent to aggression and a third world war." After all, a UN observer commission was in Korea June 24 and before, but it didn't stop the North Koreans from marching.

But such commissions can perform one vital service: carefully assessing the political and military situation in each of the critical areas, and establishing the truth about aggression if and when it occurs.

We need only listen to the prattling of Russia's representative on the UN Security Council, Jacob Malik, to realize that any aggressive move anywhere by Russia or her satellites will be twisted into a peaceful gesture if the world's observers are not there to prove otherwise.

According to Moscow's version, it was the South Koreans who started things in Korea. The North Koreans are merely counter-attacking. And of course the United States, too, is held to be guilty of aggression against the Korean people.

But thanks to the UN Korean Commission, the world knows exactly what the facts were when the invasion began. By that date, the North Koreans already had sliced across the thirty-eighth parallel bordering South Korea at several points. These salients, designed to give the northerners tactical advantage, were never wiped out by the defenders.

Furthermore, authenticated reports made clear that the North Koreans were massing men and armor and were clearing civilians out of the border zones from which an attack would be launched.

In contrast, the South Korean constabulary army was doing little or nothing. Not only was it not deploying for an assault, it wasn't even placing itself wisely for defense. More than that, as we now know all too well, it wasn't equipped for more than internal police action.

All these facts are documented and in the UN's hands because a commission was on the scene to establish them quickly. The information actually was in the UN's possession when the Security Council met to try to end the aggression.

Russia being what it is, we will get this same fantastic inversion of the truth everywhere she threatens. Perhaps many millions of westerners, including Americans, have long since discounted anything the Soviet propagandists say. But we have to remember that in Asia and some other places the west is trusted little more than the Russians.

So it's important to unity of world action against aggression that the real facts be known to all nations beyond any shadow of doubt. Let's put watchdogs in Indochina, Malaya, Iran, Turkey, Yugoslavia, and Germany.

Refugees: Pawn of German Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, Americans have always shown sympathy for the problems and sufferings of the refugees and the homeless. This sympathy has gone out to all peoples regardless of national origin.

For the past 5 years, tremendous efforts have been made by the United States to alleviate the lot of these homeless people and rightly so, too. But must the problem of the German expellees who became refugees in western Germany become a political football?

Evidence available shows that the German authorities not only exaggerated the figures regarding the number of their refugees but that they have also been trying to make political capital of their expellee problem.

According to the London Economist, the unemployment situation in Germany is being exploited by the Germans "as a political lever against the Western Powers." The Economist goes so far as to say that the Bonn government "does not object to having a pool of unemployment at present."

I submit that it is in the American tradition to do our best to help these refugees, but that we have a right to expect the Germans to make every effort to help themselves. In a recent article published by the Society for the Prevention of world war III, dealing with the agricultural problem in Germany, it was pointed out that the proper land reform could go a long way not only toward the resettling of refugee Germans, but also toward solving the German food situation. It is patently clear that had the land reform, as originally planned by the Allied authorities, been carried out by the Germans, about 2,000,000 German expellees could have been resettled and taken care of.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Germans should not be encouraged to play power politics with human misery. That this has been the case is amply demonstrated in the article published in the magazine, Prevent World War III, summer issue, published by the Society for the Prevention of World War III, 515 Madison Avenue, New York City, entitled "Refugees: Pawn of German Politics." The article follows:

REFUGEES: PAWN OF GERMAN POLITICS

Ever since the end of the war, the Germans have displayed a singular talent as propagandists. To some extent, their present success can be traced back to the falling out among the victorious Allies. In addition, it should be borne in mind that the Goebbels school of propaganda has made a deep imprint on German methods in dealing with their neighbors.

It will be recalled that immediately following the cessation of hostilities, a great hue and cry went up about the starving Germans. The noise was intended to drown out the pleas of those who were starving in the lands ravaged by the German war machine. The food-for-Germany campaign built on a tissue of distortion and half truths, cracked the common front of the Allied peoples and was the wedge through which the deliberate undermining of Allied power was initiated. Since then, the Germans have continued their tactic of grabbing on to an issue and exploiting it for all that it is worth. In 1945 it was food. In 1947 it was reparations. Today it appears to be the refugee problem.

The refugee problem is being played up by the Germans in every possible way. It is being used to assault every remaining safeguard against the resurgence of pan-Germanism and neo-nazism. It is employed as a weapon to discredit and injure Allied prestige. It is manipulated as a lightning rod to shift the responsibility of the present unemployment situation in Germany onto the backs of the Allied Powers; and last but certainly not least, the refugee problem is utilized to bolster Germany's case for the rebuilding of her industrial might far above prewar levels. It is, therefore, a very potent and dangerous weapon which can easily fool the gullible and pervert whatever needs to be done to resolve the problem of the refugees in western Germany.

Recently the London Economist published a penetrating article in the German refugee problem and its relation to unemployment in Germany. In speaking about the number of refugees in western Germany, the Economist revealed that:

"Varied and exaggerated figures regarding the number of expelled Germans are bandied about in public speeches. In the rather more objective columns of the official statistical returns, the total is given as 7,750,000. Guesswork places the number who have come from Soviet Germany as 1,000,000. The total population is said to have risen from 39,300,000 in 1936 to 47,700,000 today. There has, however, been no census since 1946."

Thus, the Germans are not only confusing the picture by exaggerations and guesswork designed for political purposes, but there has been no official counting of the population in western Germany for the last 4 years. Therefore, how can we talk intelligently about a problem which has been turned into a political football by the Germans?

From the evidence presented by the London Economist it appears that the Germans are not very anxious to get at the elemental facts.

On the contrary, they are building up the problem of the refugees as though it were the cause for every ill afflicting the Germans today. They have declared that the refugees are creating unemployment, and have blamed the Allied Powers. But as the London Economist declares, the unemployment situation is being used by the Germans as a political lever against the western powers. For these reasons, German statistical assertions are likely to be unreliable.

Undoubtedly there is a refugee problem in western Germany. It is also true that unemployment has been increased by the influx of these Germans from the East. But are the German bigwigs really and truly anxious to tackle it? Let the facts speak for themselves.

It is well-known that hundreds of thousands of these refugees are efficient farmers but they are landless because the German officials have sabotaged all land reforms with the tacit approval and in some cases active collaboration of the Allied authorities.

In the United States zone alone, 1,235,000 acres are owned by 700 individuals and organizations. This huge territory was supposed to be broken up under the land reform law passed more than 3 years ago. But as of April 1949, only 71,000 acres were redistributed.

But that is not all. In the spring of this year the Allies abandoned all direct intervention in land reform and turned the entire program over to the Germans. The land reform law was originally intended to make room for German refugees, rationalize agricultural production and diminish the economic and political power of the landed nobility in the West. It was estimated that 2,000,000 German refugees could be resettled and taken care of economically on the available lands. Now the program is turned over to the very same people who have in the first place blocked its implementation since 1946.

The importance of land to these German refugees is not exaggerated Indeed, when it was announced that the Allies had given up this program, many of these refugees announced that they would take matters in their own hands. One group wired John J. McCloy that they were considering the seizure of farm land without authority and added, "Don't force us to follow the example of the Italian agricultural workers."

If the German officials were so anxious to help these refugees, they would see to it that German agriculture was democratized. The London Economist however, reveals that the Germans are not very anxious to help their brothers from the east. They weep for them in public but privately they have uttered contempt for them.

This is also indirectly implied by Mr. Guy J. Swope, Chief of the Displaced Population Division in the Office of the American High Commissioner. Writing in the March 1950 issue of Information Bulletin, published by the High Commissioner's office, Mr. Swope noted that:

"If the German leadership resolutely took the position that the refugees, who are, it must be remembered, of German blood, and therefore should be easily assimilable on that score, can be converted into a strong asset through establishing conditions under which they can add to the German production, it would be an indication of sound and sensible planning."

The Bonn politicians have other ideas. They regard these refugees as pawns in their long range policies which have nothing in common with security or a peacetime German economy. But why do Allied officials continue to play along?

Speaking about the unemployment situation in Germany which is supposed to be aggravated by the refugees, the London Economist declares that the Bonn Government "does not object to having a pool of unemployment at present. * * *" Why? Because this pool keeps wages low and therefore enables German exporters to undercut competition on the world market. German industrialists are not enthusiastic about creating new jobs because, according to the London Economist, home industries "reduce the volume of credit available for financing the present boom in imports and trade in consumer goods."

On the other hand, the Bonn Government argues that to employ these refugees and hundreds of thousands of other unemployed would endanger the currency. Why? Because as the London Economist says, "If the unemployed were given jobs * * * they would spend more."

A pool of unemployment increased by the refusal to solve the German refugee problem is viewed by the Germans as a very effective economic weapon against their competitors. Furthermore, these refugees are regarded by the Bonn Government as reliable reserves for future eventualities. The character of many of these German refugees is described by the London Economist as follows: "The worst factors are rather that the refugees became penniless and that many of them are officials of the Nazi state or party and dispossessed farmers for whom no jobs can be found. These are the men who represent a dangerous hotbed of nationalist ideas."

The refugee problem and unemployment in Germany cannot be attributed to the disinterestedness of the Allies who have poured billions into Germany since the end of the war. It is true that we have failed to take firm action and have allowed the Germans to block every decent program to alleviate the distress.

But the facts also show that the Germans have no intention of solving this problem. Just as they engineered inflation after World War II to avoid reparations payments, so they are now employing the refugee and unemployment situation as an economic and political instrument to extort more and more concessions from the American taxpayer.

Marion Donhoff, political editor of the German newspaper, Die Zeit, writing in Foreign Affairs, April 1950, gives a frank estimate of the extortion which may be expected. Miss Donhoff calculated that if these unemployed, including the German refugees, were put to work, "about $2,000 must be invested in order to employ one worker productively."

Multiply $2,000 by her own estimate of 9,000,000 refugees and it becomes clear that the Germans are waiting for a couple of more billion dollars to add to the jackpot they have already extracted from the United States Treasury. This is how the refugee and unemployment problem is shaping up in Germany today.

The American taxpayers would be more than justified in insisting that no more funds be handed over to the Germans until there is a proper allied accounting of what the Germans have done to date on their own. The aid we have given Germany is unprecedented in the annals of history. We have handed over billions to a former enemy who ravaged a substantial part of the continent of Europe and who would have destroyed us too if they could.

We have given those billions as though the taxpayers were obliged to do so without auditing Germany's reserves to find what they themselves could achieve without handouts from abroad.

No other country in the world has received such a blank check from the United States. How long will the American taxpayers be willing to put up with this scandal?

American Medical Association Called To Task for Killing Bill To Help Medical Colleges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, as most of you know, the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee recently tabled Federal aid to medical education legislation. I have repeatedly emphasized the importance of that legislation. Now that the bill has been scuttled by the blind, stubborn, selfish opposition of the American Medical Association, a good many others are beginning to understand just how important Federal aid to medical education is to our national health and security.

I attach two important pieces of evidence, both from distinguished, independent newspapers. The first is an article from the New York Times of August 20 in which Brig. Gen. James S. Simmons, retired, dean of the Harvard University School of Public Health, is reported as protesting the tabling action as a tragic mistake. I call to your special attention this paragraph from his telegram to President Truman:

I am confident that if the American people realized what a crippling blow this negative action has dealt to the Nation's military and civil preparedness program they would demand that the tragic mistake be rectified. Health of American fighting men and industrial workers must be conserved by a strong national program of public health and military preventative medicine to guard against diseases as deadly and disabling as bombs and bullets.

The second is an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of August 19, which concludes significantly:

If the AMA stubbornly keeps trying to sit on the lid, there is bound to be an explosion.

The articles follow:

[From the New York Times of August 20, 1950]

MEDICAL BILL LOSS IS TERMED TRAGIC—HARVARD HEALTH SCHOOL HEAD TELLS TRUMAN HOUSE UNIT'S ACTION HURTS DEFENSE

BOSTON, August 19.—President Truman today was told that the House Commerce Committee's tabling of the bill for Federal aid to medical and public health schools has dealt a crippling blow to the preparedness program.

In a telegram to the President, Brig. Gen. James S. Simmons, retired, dean of the Harvard University School of Public Health, termed the action "a tragic mistake." General Simmons was Chief of Preventive Medicine for the Army during World War II and is president of the Association of Schools of Public Health.

He said the bill is endorsed by the deans of all 10 accredited schools of public health in this country and by about 75 percent of the deans of medical schools.

AMA IS BLAMED

Proponents of the measure blame opposition of the American Medical Association for failure to pass the bill. The bill sponsored by Representative ANDREW BIEMILLER, Democrat of Wisconsin, would provide $250,000,000 in Federal funds to pay student tuition and to expand training facilities of schools of medicine, public health, dentistry, and nursing.

It was passed by the Senate and the President has termed it "the most vital health legislation before Congress." President Truman insisted on action after the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had deferred the bill. It was reviewed by the committee, which tabled it August 16 by a 9 to 8 vote.

The 10 accredited public health schools urging the bill are at Harvard, Yale, Johns Hopkins, Columbia, University of North Carolina, University of Michigan, University of California, University of Minnesota, Tulane University, and University of Puerto Rico.

In his telegram to the President, General Simmons said:

"The shocking news that the House Commerce Committee has tabled the bill for Federal aid to medical and public-health schools moves me as president of the Association of Schools of Public Health to appeal directly to you.

"I am confident that if the American people realized what a crippling blow this negative action has dealt to the Nation's military and civil preparedness program they would demand that the tragic mistake be rectified. Health of American fighting men and industrial workers must be conserved by a strong national program of public health and military preventative medicine to guard against diseases as deadly and disabling as bombs and bullets.

CITES NEEDS OF SPECIALISTS

Many highly trained specialists will be required. Their postgraduate training is available only in the 10 accredited schools of public health in this country. The financial plight of the 10 schools is such that their total output of specialists is now only one-fifth of the number needed to operate the Nation's peacetime health program. Surely the Korean crisis and threat of another global war must make it evident to all that an already critical situation has now become more perilous.

Without added funds the schools are helpless to fulfill their obligation to the Nation. It is obvious that they need emergency financial aid. This is the kind of aid that would be provided by the Federal aid to medical education bill already passed by the Senate and now tabled in the House Committee.

I am convinced that one of the most important responsibilities now facing the Congress and the country is to act immediately to insure the training of an adequate and continuing supply of experts in the prevention of disease and conservation of health among our workers and military forces.

It is my earnest belief that the need for swift passage of the bill for Federal aid to medical education is imperative. Its cost compared to enormous outlays necessary for armaments is relatively minor, yet the need it would serve is of major importance to the maintenance of our national strength.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of August 19, 1950]

DEANS JAB AT THE AMA

For a long time the American Medical Association has been denying that there is any real doctor shortage in the United States. The AMA jumped on anyone, medical men included, who dared say that there was such a shortage.

The AMA has come up with its own figures which are supposed to provide that there is an ample supply of doctors and that medical schools are providing all the necessary replacements. On that premise, the AMA has been steadfastly opposing the Biemiller bill to extend Federal aid to medical schools so that they can train more physicians.

Deans of leading medical schools, who should know something about the real demand and supply situation, met in Washington the other day and swung some real "haymakers" at the AMA. The deans are convinced that there is a critical doctor shortage, more acute as many physicians are called again for military service.

The deans believe that the medical schools must be allowed to train more doctors. Because medical education is so expensive, the deans look with much more favor, therefore, on Federal aid in providing for expansion of staff, plant, and student bodies.

Even the dean who is the chairman of the AMA committee on medical education, according to news dispatches, took a crack at the AMA for its attitude.

Whether the AMA wants to admit it or not, millions of people who want medical services believe that more doctors are needed, particularly in the poorer and more remote communities. Whether the AMA likes it or not, there is a growing public demand for the training of more doctors.

If the AMA stubbornly keeps trying to sit on the lid, there is bound to be an explosion.

Wanted: A Military Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, David Lawrence, in the August 25 issue of United States News and World Report has written a thought-provoking editorial which I commend to the Members of this body:

WANTED: A MILITARY POLICY
(By David Lawrence)

The American people have been surprised at the setbacks in Korea—surprised at our lack of preparation. They have been, moreover, surprised at the seeming unawareness of our top planners or policy makers that the Pacific Ocean could be a trouble area where a sizable fleet in being should be stationed, together with marines ready for instant action.

We may go further and say that everyone throughout the world who has really studied military and naval history is likewise surprised. For the lessons of history have taught that it is not only necessary to have a mobile force in being but to have it stationed close to the area where hostilities may break out.

Back in 1887, Alfred Thayer Mahan, of the United States Navy—a great prophet—started lecturing and writing on naval strategy and the influence of sea power. He was for years unappreciated in his own country, but later was accepted in all countries as the foremost authority on world strategy. His books and lectures of a half-century ago read today as if they were written yesterday.

One principle that Mahan taught is that, to understand naval strategy, it is vital to study land strategy, and that, to understand military policy, it is essential to examine political policy. Significant, for example, is this passage from a 1909 lecture:

"In the Seven Years' War the strength of the British action lay in the fact that one great man, the elder Pitt, controlled the naval, military, and diplomatic factors. The several conditions were thus weighed, and were harmonized into a common action, to which all contributed their utmost influence in mutual support. The desirability of the result must fix our eyes upon the fact that in our country it will never be attained through one man, but only by the cooperation of several. Those several will be statesmen, military men, and naval men; and, in order that their cooperation may be adequate, each must understand the conditions by which the others are controlled. * * *

"The often failure of conjoint military and naval operations has been due less to mean jealousy than to lack of such mutual understanding; and for a due grasp of preparation for war, and for planning war, military men of both services need to be imbued with knowledge of international relations."

We thought in America that by establishing a National Security Council we were reaching for just such a unification of planning. We thought in setting up a Defense Department we were unifying the operations of the three armed services. But the Security Council has existed mostly on paper, being composed of officials preoccupied with other tasks. They rarely met. The Defense Department disregarded the lessons of history and the international factors that make it desirable to have a Navy in being and an Army in being, as well as an Air Force in being.

For the United States today has no fleet. This is the first time since the Republic was founded that we have virtually abolished the fleet in being—and this at a time when global responsibilities impose upon us problems of transportation as well as the need for adequate seapower on the seven seas.

Who abolished the fleet in being? Who abolished the Army in being? Who told Congress it could fight wars cheaply with an Air Force in being—a few intercontinental bombers carrying the atom bomb? These decisions stemmed from misguided policy makers and their organs of publicity controlled and directed by our own Defense Department. These blunders have unwittingly brought us to the brink of disaster.

Small wonder that the Nation would like to see new faces in the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Small wonder that the Nation looks askance at President Truman's unexplained failure to set up the National Security Council on a proper basis until the Korean war.

Small wonder that the American people feel so helpless and frustrated now as they look back at the spectacle of selfish politicians giving casual attention to defense problems and concentrating on domestic issues of far less importance to our ultimate survival. Nobody can say there was no warning. The testimony before the House Armed Services Committee in 1949 foretold the tragedy of 1950.

We need now what we have lacked—a national military policy. We cannot depend on the United Nations alone, for it is a loose federation of governments with conflicting interests. We cannot depend on air power or atom bombs alone. We must have armies with armored divisions and tactical aviation of their own. We must have a fleet in being—big enough to care for contingencies in both the Pacific and the Atlantic as well as in the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf.

We must apply the draft law so that we can have a standing supply of manpower for all services and introduce military training as a supplement.

But, above all, we must coordinate our diplomatic policies with our military preparation. It is time to recognize the lessons of history.

Communism Versus Christianity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include a very timely radio address by the Reverend Clay A. Cooper, Spokane's radio pastor.

Reverend Cooper is one of a group who feels that we should have a day of prayer for victory over communism here in the Nation's Capital. Certainly the facts pointed out in Reverend Cooper's radio address are very much to the point. If we are ever to win this world-wide fight with communism, we must recognize that the ethics and morals which have made this Nation great are founded in Christianity.

COMMUNISM VERSUS CHRISTIANITY

"Communists in every country have only one flag, that is the Red flag," states Mr. William Foster, No. 1 American Communist. The hammer and sickle insignia knows no national boundaries. It is the rallying banner for the foreign-flavored, materialistic atheism which is sweeping across the world. It is the ensign of the anti-God, anti-Christ, anti-Christian, anti-Bible, antimorals, antihome band of ruthless, international brigands who seek primarily the overthrow of the Christian and the democratic way of life.

"Religion is an opiate of the people," avers the Christless Kremlin crowd, "and we carry on propaganda for the liquidation of these prejudices." The church of Christ in general, and the believer in Christ in particular must be annihilated. The Calvary, blood-stained banner must be hauled down from the masthead as the emblem of Communism continues to unfurl. There you have in a nutshell the philosophy and the aims of the giant Red octopus whose deadly tentacles in less than a generation, have encircled the globe.

Christianity and communism, each diametrically opposed to the other, are making a bid for a world of individuals. One is divine, the other is demonic. The first sets forth the dignity of the individual, the other holds that man is a vassal of the state. One preaches the sanctity of the home, the other maintains "the hallowed corelationship of parent and child is 'claptrap' and disgusting." Family loyalties must be abolished and children "transformed into simple articles of commerce and instruments of labor." The former teaches the immortality of the soul, the fact of God, the Saviourhood of Christ, the authenticity of the Bible—the latter cries out against the "treacherous influences of such myths and illusions." One stands for morality, the other boasts, "we expose all fables about morality." One proclaims spiritual regeneration and forgiveness of sins through faith in Christ's atoning death, the other counters, "a change of heart is but the substitution of one set of illusions for another." One advocates respect for the Lord's day and the Lord's house, the other disregards Sundays and warns that "people who get married in church or maintain religious beliefs will either soon get rid of them or be put out of the party." One dates its time (A. D., Anno Domini) the year of our Lord, the calendar of the other starts with the Red revolution. The salute of the one is a bent knee and of the other a clenched first raised heavenward. The one worshipfully sings, "The light of the world is Jesus," the other blatantly blasphemes in parody, "The blight of the world is Jesus." Says J. Edgar Hoover, "The Godless, truthless way of life that Communists would force on America can mean only tyranny and oppression if they succeed. It is a movement of terror, debauchery, corruption, and barbarity."

The choice of the individual is the casting of the die. As go individuals, so go nations and so goes the world. The choice is just as real and just as personal as when Pilate faced the dilemma of choosing between Christ and Barabbas. Fate hung in the balance. The most eventful question of his life was (as is ours), "What shall I do with Jesus?" Failure on the part of any person to radically ally himself to Jesus Christ is to automatically takes sides with mankind's enemy number one. No honest person can be neutral. Businessmen, to whom merchandise alone has meaning; legislators primarily concerned with social security, wages, and hours; industrialists who eat, sleep, and drink iron, steel, uranium, stocks, and bonds; these all are unconsciously falling into the trap of Red materialism and are helping set the stage philosophically, psychologically for a communistic coup in this Nation.

It's high time we get back to the faith of our fathers, to the God of our mothers, and to the Saviour-Christ-Redeemer of the old-fashioned home with prayer at its family altar, worship in its family pew, grace at its family table, and a Christian atmosphere around its family fireside. Spiritual values must be restored if we are to survive the horrible monstrosity of materialism of the twentieth century. "Christ or Communism" is no mere rabble-rousing couplet. He is the individual's only Saviour, and in consequence, America's and the world's only hope.

Address of Hon. John M. Vorys, of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, one of the most respected Members of this House, a most constructive member of the minority and a leader in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is my Ohio colleague JOHN VORYS, who has ably represented the Twelfth District these many years.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and include therein a speech made by him before the State convention of the Minnesota Young Republican League on May 20, 1950:

SPEECH BY REPRESENTATIVE JOHN M. VORYS, OF OHIO, BEFORE STATE CONVENTION OF MINNESOTA YOUNG REPUBLICAN LEAGUE

Fellow taxpayers, I appreciate the opportunity of taking part in your convention. I have heard of the aggressive and progressive Young Republican League of Minnesota, of your enthusiasm and your clear thinking. Coming as I do from the weary, dreary, and confused atmosphere of Fair Deal Washington, my visit here is an inspiration to me, and I realize I shall take from this meeting more than I can possibly give to it.

Minneapolis, however, is a long way from Washington. I came here because I was asked by your Congressman, Honorable WALTER H. JUDD, my great friend, and a statesman of national and international stature. His farseeing statesmanship for Asia has had great support among the people and in Congress, and failure to follow the course he urged has resulted in the disaster he foretold.

In Congress, WALTER JUDD occupies a unique position of distinction. A profound student, an effective speaker, high minded, and hard working in committee and on the floor, a fearless fighter for high Republican principles, he is a tower of strength to our party, but nevertheless commands the respect and affection of both parties. He is now on an important international mission at Geneva, appointed by this administration. In announcing this appointment, Judge KEE, the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said of Dr. JUDD, author of the original World Health Organization law, "The selection of Dr. JUDD to serve as a congressional adviser at the Third World Health Assembly is of particular advantage to the United States because in addition to being thoroughly familiar with the objectives of the organization, he brings to this assignment an outstanding background of combined legislative and medical experience."

I come from Washington to talk to you with a deep sense of humility. As I think about what is going on there, I realize the older generation has made sort of a mess of things.

THE NEED FOR TWO-PARTY GOVERNMENT

One thing is clear: Two party government is necessary to protect the freedom of the individual all over the world. One party government will not do it and having a lot of parties will not work. Effective opposition to power is necessary to prevent the abuse of power.

The trend in this country under the Democratic Party is toward one-party government. They have it in the South, and in their great city strongholds in the North. They have been in power in the national administration longer than any party in our history. They like this and will never get out voluntarily. They must be thrown out by the voters or they will stay in power forever.

WHAT IS A POLITICAL PARTY?

The Communist Party all over the world is an exclusive minority organization with limited membership and strict discipline. In this country the two historic parties are voluntary organizations of free people. They are inclusive, rather than exclusive. Since our system is based on majority rule, both parties are constantly seeking more members and seeking the votes of nonmembers.

You cannot always tell what a party is by what it officially says about itself. Henry Wallace's party, early in 1948, adopted the slogan "Peace and prosperity." Both the Republicans and the Democrats came along later and said, "Me, too, but we can do it better." At present, the most promising party is the Democratic Party; they promise anything and everything, to anybody and everybody. In President Truman's speeches on his nonpolitical trip across the country, he promised everything for everybody, then wound up in Chicago by daring the Republicans to come out for something he hadn't promised. He said, "They can't be against everything." What the people need to realize is that the Fair Deal can't be for everything.

They not only promise everything; they take credit for everything. The President in his Chicago speech painted a picture of the present temporary prosperity of the country and, of course, took complete credit for it. Then he gave a long list of the police state measures he has advocated since the fall of 1945, which have not been enacted and which he wants to use as a campaign platform for the Eighty-second Congress next fall. The plain facts are that the country's present prosperity was achieved without these measures and because of, not in spite of, the obstruction of these measures by the Republicans and a few Democrats.

Thus we find the Democrats proclaiming, in addition to whatever else they proclaim, that they seek the same goals that the Republicans seek, a higher standard of living, greater freedom for the individual, and expanding private enterprise. In view of some of the other things they stand for, they either don't understand it or don't mean it when they say these things, but it is a tribute to the fundamental unity of the American people that their political parties make similar claims in seeking their support. In weighing the validity of party promises, the American people, however, will have to be smart; they will have to remember that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; they will need to bear in mind that President Truman follows Lincoln two-thirds of the way and then stops. Truman says you can fool all of the people some of the time and some of the people all of the time, and that is all the Fair Deal needs to win an election.

BIPARTISANSHIP

We have in action, however, a number of bipartisan policies. For instance, reclamation is a bipartisan policy founded by Republicans, in spite of the President's attempt to appropriate it as he rededicated projects through the West. The National Science Foundation bill was a bipartisan product. The increase in the minimum wage to 75 cents, the public-housing program, and the hospital-construction program were put through the Eighty-first Congress because the Republican leadership supported them. Our present farm price support legislation had bipartisan support, although its maladministration is obviously the responsibility of the Executive.

We hear a good deal of talk about a bipartisan foreign policy, whether we have one or ought to have one. The Republican Eightieth Congress passed the Greek-Turkish law, launched the ECA legislation, initiated the idea of the Atlantic Pact, and passed laws strengthening our support of the United Nations. These have been bipartisan foreign policies. The shameful agreements at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, and the disastrous China defeat, which have resulted in placing over half a billion of the people of the world under the Soviets, and which have made the cold war what it is, are strictly Democratic policies. Republicans had no part in their inception and have no responsibility for their failure. We have had a bipartisan China policy on Capitol Hill since 1947, and it is written into law in the China Aid Act of 1948, largely through the work of your Congressman JUDD, and that act is still the law, but it has not been carried out by the Executive. Instead, it has been evaded and misconstrued and action delayed by those charged with making it effective.

We need a world-wide review and reform of our foreign policy. We need unity, but in this perilous period between peace and war, it is more important for our country to be right than to be united. History is strewn with the wrecks of nations whose people were united in the wrong course. In order to have a bipartisan foreign policy on which we can safely unite, we will need reform in some policies and politics here at home. Politics must stop at the water's edge, not only in the spring when bills are on Capitol Hill, but in the fall during presidential and congressional campaigns. This will require three things:

1. Bipartisan consultation before the policy is determined and the country committed;
2. Cooperation during the committee and floor consideration of legislation; and
3. Proper credit given both parties for the formulation and implementation of the policies.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE PARTIES

In spite of apparent similarity in goals, in spite of bipartisan action on some of our foreign and domestic problems, there is a wide and real difference between the parties, based on principles, personalities, and practices. President Hoover said recently that the difference was based on a world-wide division of people between the right and the left. In this struggle we are on the right and in the right. Your Republican national and congressional committees have boiled these differences down to a 90-word program, as follows:

DIGEST OF STATEMENT OF REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES AND OBJECTIVES, FEBRUARY 6, 1950, SUPPLEMENTING 1948 REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

The Republican Party stands for:

1. Reducing taxes.
2. Balancing budget.
3. Eliminating Government waste, especially along lines of Hoover Commission reports.
4. Fighting communism here instead of condoning it.
5. Providing fair market prices on farm products aided by price supports—cooperative marketing, soil conservation, reclamation, rural electrification—no Brannan plan.

6. Continuing and improving Taft-Hartley law to protect public from excessive power of labor and management.

7. Developing an adequate social-security system that does not limit opportunity nor discourage initiative and saving.

8. Protecting rights of veterans and minorities.

9. Developing a united American foreign policy for peace—world trade without undermining American living standards.

10. Safeguarding liberty against socialism.

The New Jersey Republican convention adopted this as their creed: "America can be saved from Communists and bankruptcy. America's problems can be solved by her great people without loss of their liberties. We dedicate ourselves to this purpose."

Young Republicans are doubtless adopting a platform which presents your statement of this difference. I think the key to the difference between the parties now is this: The Democrats are in and want to stay in; they are the old party of the status quo; they are so far to the left that no further reform can come from that direction. Any shift to the left of the Fair Deal would be revolution, not reform. We, the Republicans, are now the party of reform; we stand for reform from the right. Reform is a job for young people. Here is where you come in—as Republican reformers.

REPUBLICAN REFORMS

Here are some of the reforms we should carry out:

1. We are for reform in bureaucracy. The creaking, sprawling machinery of the Federal Government, with its 1,815 separate agencies and 2,000,000 employees, must be overhauled and streamlined for modern efficiency, under the principles laid down by the Hoover Commission, created by the Republican Eightieth Congress. The bureaucrats are fighting a skillful rear-guard delaying action against these plans; the President gives lip service, but sends down to Congress one reorganization after another, to further his own pet political theories, while postponing the painful recommendations that will mean cutting the payroll. For efficiency in Government, Republicans are needed to carry out these Republican-sponsored reforms.

2. We are for reform in Federal spending. We know that deficit spending is causing inflation, constantly rising prices that no spiral of wage increases can keep up with very long. A 60-cent dollar robs those who work, and robs doubly those who try to live on saved-up dollars.

Here is what is happening. We have a budget of $43,000,000,000, a tax take of $37,000,000,000. But let's not talk of billions. Let's divide by 10,000,000. Suppose a family has an income of $3,700 a year, and wants to spend $4,300. Where will they get the $600? Why, they will borrow it. But suppose they already owe $25,600. What will happen when they try to borrow $600 this year, and next year, for running expenses? They will find out about family inflation in a hurry. Suppose they say "We only owe it to ourselves," and try to borrow from each other? How much will their I O U's be worth among themselves? Some of them will say "How are we going to pay ourselves back if we keep this up?"

President Truman talks about an average family income of $4,000 in 5 years. That will be easy under the present deficit spending system, but what will the $4,000 buy? In China just before their collapse, coolies were earning $4,000 a day. In Germany in 1923, a worker got a basket of marks for a day's work, but it took all of the marks to pay for the basket. We Republicans want an increase in family income that comes from increased production, not inflation, an increase that will buy something after the family gets it.

The President wants the Brannan plan to cost $5,000,000,000 more and socialized medicine to cost $6,000,000,000 on top of that. Where will that $11,000,000,000 come from? Why, from more borrowing or more taxes. Then he wants the Spence bill, to control prices, wages, everything—but remember, even in a dictatorship, inflation breeds controls, and controls breed more inflation.

The Fair Deal wants to raise taxes to soak the rich corporations. Well, generally speaking, they have to pass those taxes on or go out of business. That is why there is about a 20-percent tax load on everything you buy, in addition to the excise taxes on train rides, telephone calls, baby oils, etc.

We Republicans know that freedom to spend your own money and get value received for it is a very precious freedom. We know that the hand-out state is also the hand-in state. We want to lower taxes, cut the budget, cut the national debt. The only time this has happened for 20 years was under the Republican Eightieth Congress. We have learned this year that a minority of Republicans cannot do this in the face of a spending administration. We are for welfare programs, but they must be soundly financed. This Republic needs fiscal reform, spending reform, and it will take another Republican Congress to do it.

3. We are for labor-law reform. The Republican Party sponsored the Sherman antitrust laws to regulate big business in the public interest. We believe that big unions and labor-management disputes should not be above the law, or outside the law, but should be regulated under law in the public interest.

4. We are for foreign-policy reform. I have spoken of this. Even though we develop a united bipartisan reformed foreign policy, those who execute it at home and abroad will need to be unswervingly loyal to our country and to its policies before we can win the peace.

"What about McCARTHY and his charges?" Here are my answers to the questions people are asking, "Why don't you Republicans make Senator McCARTHY be more tactful or more skillful or more quiet?"

The Republican Party is a voluntary organization, and no one has the right to make Senator McCARTHY do or say anything.

"What about Communists and fellow travelers in Government?"

We don't know. After the Hiss case, and the Amerasia case, and some other cases that were hushed up, clearance by people inside the administration doesn't mean much. A callous red-herring attitude toward such cases, calling McCARTHY an asset of the Kremlin, does not inspire confidence. This is still a hot issue. Where there was so much fire, there is bound to be smoke.

"Why don't you Republicans investigate and settle it?"

We are not in control of the investigating machinery on Capitol Hill or in the executive departments. The danger now is another Pearl Harbor whitewash which President Truman wound up by saying: "The country is as much to blame as any individual."

"Why do you do anything such an administration asks?"

We have got to help keep the Republic going, in a perilous period, based on the best information we can get from all sources, but what we need is reform in foreign policy and policy makers.

5. We are for moral reform. We have got to revive in the public conscience a capacity for moral indignation which has been lost. When our first citizen has publicly defended Tom Pendergast after his conviction, when his Department of Justice quietly lets the time go by to prosecute vote frauds and ballot stealing in Kansas City, when his official family accepts gifts from John Maragon, the friend of Harry Vaughan, in return for favors, when he publicly curses Vaughan's critics, when his Bureau of Internal Revenue makes contributions to Democratic political rallies tax-free—when these things can happen in America, there has been a moral let-down from the top down.

The people have grown cynical and indifferent, or perhaps they feel "The king can do no wrong." Last Sunday this Democratic ad appeared in a Chicago paper: "For the biggest Sunday of your life, see and hear Vice President BARKLEY." This caused Rev. H. R. Anderson, chaplain of the 1944 Democratic Convention, to thunder from his pulpit, "God gave us that day and told us to keep it holy—when the State becomes a god, morals go." He said, President Truman should "quit playing with the truth." We must lead in moral reform, in private conscience and public conduct.

In this Republic the people not only have to be smart to keep free; they have to be good to deserve to be free; they have to demand goodness from their public servants, to keep them from becoming their masters; the alternative to state control is self-control.

The good future for this Republic lies in the hands of the Republicans, and particularly you young Republicans. The struggle will be hard. The vested political interests are against us. Our own money, tax money, will be used against us, and crass appeals to mob selfishness. But no Patrick Henry ever said "Give me security or give me death." The vital issue is freedom—liberty under law. A dazzling future of unbelievable riches in human values, material and spiritual, lies ahead, if only we can behave ourselves, and lead. We must here highly resolve that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom. We must say to our Republic, "Reform—and forward march."

Report to the District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives I have made regular reports to the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Oregon, which I represent. A weekly Letter from Washington is sent to the newspapers in the district and is regularly printed by more than 20 of them. During this term of Congress I have also participated in a discussion program which has been broadcast each week by most of the radio stations in the district. As I have done before at the conclusion of a term of Congress, I have prepared a summary or report on the Eighty-first Congress, including a statement of my own activities, which I now present to the House and which I shall circulate as widely as possible in the congressional district which I represent.

THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

This Congress has been controlled in both the House and the Senate by the same political party which controls the executive branch of our Government. In the House of Representatives, with a total membership of 435, the Democratic Party has a majority of 90. That party names the chairmen of all committees and effectively controls the legislative program of the House. The program under these conditions is spelled out for Congress by the President in his State of the Union message—required by the Constitution—by his budget message, and by other messages sent to Congress from time to time.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM

In his messages to Congress the President has urged continuation of our program of foreign aid at a high level. He has demanded the repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1946—the Taft-Hartley law—the expansion of a socialized public-housing program, production payments to farmers—the Brannan farm plan—establish socialized medicine—compulsory health insurance—Federal aid to education, establish great and powerful valley authorities, and he asked for authority to build and operate steel mills. He also gave approval to the so-called Spence economic-control bill which was nothing more nor less than the old OPA. He urged that Congress make no deep cuts in spending. Then he submitted a budget asking for appropriations which would create a deficit of five billions or more per year.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

A majority of the Members of this Congress refused to approve more than a small part of the President's program which they thought pointed dangerously toward total Government control or what is generally called socialism. The so-called Brannan farm plan was rejected. The Taft-Hartley law was not repealed but the Administration succeeded in blocking the passage of needed amendments which were approved by labor. Socialized medicine was not considered. Aid to education became tangled up in committee. The Columbia Valley Authority bill was given only brief hearings in committee. The Spence economic-control bill and the request for authority to build Government-owned and operated steel mills were not considered.

Foreign aid was continued practically as requested, including world-wide aid to industry known as the point 4 program. Federal housing was approved in the first session, supposedly as an emergency measure to relieve the national shortage of houses, but no houses were built or even started during the first 12 months after the Housing Act was passed. Meanwhile people have built a record-breaking number of homes for themselves.

MISCELLANEOUS LEGISLATION

More than 12,000 different pieces of legislation, bills and resolutions, have been introduced in the Eighty-first Congress. Several hundred have come to the floor of the House for action.

As each bill, resolution, or motion is presented for consideration and action I study it carefully and vote as my best judgment dictates. I strive to vote for the good of the country and all the people, regardless of the threats or pleadings of special groups or interests which seek legislation favorable only to themselves.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY MESS

As the result of amazing military ability, production and financial strength displayed in World War II, the United States emerged as undisputed world leader. We became the hope, the rallying point and the strength of the free peoples of the world. We could have enforced peace on the earth. We could have enlarged the territorial boundaries of freedom.

Instead our President and our State Department committed us clandestinely to the unmoral contract known as the Yalta agreement. Later, as if the betrayal of freedom and our friends at Yalta were not enough our officials supinely stepped into the Potsdam agreement bear trap.

Directly and indirectly as the result of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements 600,000,000 people have lost what freedom they had and are now under the heel of the Russian Communist dictator. At the end of World War II the Russian Government controlled less than 200,000,000 people. Now it controls 800,000,000.

Instead of peace the blundering administration which controls the foreign policy of the United States, and so the destiny of all free people, has brought us again to war.

In voicing these harsh opinions of the manner in which the Truman administration has conducted the foreign policy of our country I do so with considerable knowledge of the record and the facts. I am convinced that future written history of the past 5 years will more than bear out the comments I make here.

KOREA

Whatever the outcome of present United Nations military operations in Korea—of which we are carrying almost the entire load—the action represents something positive and determined. We have shown the Russian Government and the free world that we will sacrifice and fight to prevent further Communist aggression against weak countries in accordance with our United Nations pledge. We have thus served notice that we will vacate no more seats in the Russian theater of world conquest. We will not back away when the Russian wants to move in. The Truman administration has been retreating from this decision for 5 years. The retreat has been horribly costly. It has multiplied the cost of stopping the march of Soviet dictatorship—if indeed we now have the power in the UN to stop it.

HOOVER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

The Eightieth Congress enacted the legislation creating the now famous Hoover Commission. Its purpose was to study the organization and operation of the executive branch of the Federal Government and make recommendations for reorganization to gain greater efficiency and economy. The report of the Commission and its recommendations came before the Eighty-first Congress early in 1949. Legislation authorizing the President to prepare and submit reorganization plans was promptly passed. This act provided that plans submitted to Congress become effective within 60 days unless disapproved by one House of Congress. It was specified that such disapproval must be voted by a majority of the total membership in either House.

The President has submitted a total of 35 reorganization plans. Of them nine have been disapproved. The remainder are in effect. Most of those plans rejected by Congress were plans which did not in fact carry out the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. Less than one-third of the improvement in the operation of the executive branch of the Government envisioned by the Hoover Commission report has been accomplished.

MY PERSONAL ACTIVITIES

The ensuing paragraphs of this report will detail some of my individual work as Representative in Congress of the Fourth District of Oregon.

APPROPRIATIONS

The Federal Government is engaged in many activities in the Fourth District. Ours is an area of great natural resources. More than one-half of our area is owned by the Federal Government. Funds are required to develop and protect these lands and resources. Our long coast line has several harbors requiring development and maintenance. Our rivers are available for recreation, power, and irrigation. I believe that the investment of Federal money in western Oregon not only creates additional wealth for all the people of the country, but many such appropriations, particularly those for forest roads, fire protection, power, and research are actually yielding cash returns to the Federal Treasury to an extent that will show a substantial profit from them in the years to come. I appear each year before the Appropriations Committee subcommittees and present information for their use in consideration of Federal expenditures to be made in Oregon. I am pleased to report that Oregon's needs have generally received fair and reasonable treatment.

FEDERAL ACTIVITIES IN DISTRICT

In addition to Federal Government activity which is State-wide in nature, such as forest-fire protection, pest control, research, and cooperation in highway building, certain specific activities and projects are in progress in each of the seven counties of the Fourth Congressional District.

In Linn County the Bureau of Mines laboratory is an important institution. The Willamette Valley flood-control project is of vital importance to Linn County with construction on the Detroit Dam going ahead rapidly. Other dams on the Santiam are in the planning stage.

In Lane County the Cottage Grove, Dorena, and Fern Ridge Dams of the Willamette Valley project have been completed and the Meridian or Lookout Point Dam is under construction. Funds have also been appropriated for the Amazon flood-control project in the Eugene area. The alcohol plant at Springfield is an important wood-utilization project.

In Douglas County flood-control surveys are being made for all of the Umpqua watershed and flood-control work has been done on the lower Umpqua. The harbor project at the mouth of the Umpqua has had one portion brought almost to completion, and other work is planned. The Veterans' Administration hospital in Roseburg is operating to capacity, and I am hoping that an expansion of that facility will ultimately be approved.

The Coos Bay harbor project which will provide a 30-foot inner harbor channel with a depth of 40 feet on the bar, and which was authorized during my second term in Congress, is nearing completion. The harbor at Bandon has received attention and flood control work on the Coquille River has been surveyed and some work already completed. Bonneville power lines have been extended to the coastal areas of Lane, Coos, and Curry Counties.

In Josephine and Jackson Counties a comprehensive flood control, power, and irrigation survey has been completed and is awaiting final action by the Secretary of Interior. The fine Army hospital at Camp White near Medford has been converted into a permanent domiciliary home for veterans.

Most of the work mentioned has either been started or substantially carried forward during the time I have represented the Fourth Congressional District. I am especially pleased to be able to list the following recent developments for which I have been responsible insofar as the approval of the House of Representatives is concerned:

Willamette Valley flood control: During this Congress this project has received approximately $50,000,000.

Charleston Inlet: Authorization of this project provides for a protected moorage basin and a channel for small boats. Funds are now available for construction of this project this year.

Grants Pass irrigation district: Loan funds for building a permanent river crossing for the Northwest Unit Pipeline were secured last year.

Spruce budworm control: In recent years this pest has become perhaps the most serious threat to our forests. An emergency appropriation for fighting that pest by means of dusting from the air during the summer months of this year was passed early in this session.

Chetco River: A project providing for a small boat harbor by the construction of jetties and dredging has been authorized.

Rogue River: The Army engineers are completing a survey report on a proposed harbor development at the mouth of the Rogue River. I have also requested the development of a project for providing a 3-foot boat channel from the mouth of the Rogue to Agness.

BONNEVILLE POWER LINES

The passage by the House of my motion to restore appropriations for Bonneville power lines in an appropriations bill after they had been stricken from the bill by House conferees was a pleasing personal victory in a floor battle. My motion was opposed by the entire Appropriations Committee but carried by a roll call vote of 182 to 186. Since that time obtaining appropriations for the completion of the Bonneville system have not been so difficult to obtain. The result of that successful effort was the extension of high power transmission lines from Eugene to the coast, down the coast to Coos Bay and ultimately on south through Curry County.

MINING AND MINERAL DEVELOPMENT

Mining is a very important industry in the Northwest and is far more important in the Fourth Congressional District than most people realize. Nearly 3,000,000 acres of land are now available for mineral entry and exploration with the passage of my bill early in this Congress which opened the O. & C. land-grant lands to prospecting and mining.

I am proud to have had a very active part in the establishment of the great electrometallurgical laboratory of the Bureau of Mines at Albany. I have continued to support the passage of appropriations necessary to its operation. The laboratory not only does analysis work and performs other services vital to the prospectors and miners but is engaged in some research projects important to national defense.

It is worth noting, I think, that a large-scale pilot plant at the Albany laboratory is actually manufacturing an important rare metal for the Atomic Energy Commission. The saving to the Government as the result of obtaining this needed metal from the laboratory will ultimately amount to more than the cost of operating the institution.

FORESTRY

The first speech I made in the House was during World War II, and was made for the purpose of informing the Congress that alcohol, a scarce commodity much needed for war, could be obtained from sawdust and other wood waste. Finally, I was able to attract so much attention to the idea that the War Production Board built a plant at Springfield to produce alcohol from sawdust. The plant was not completed in time to produce for that war. It is now being operated, however, and will doubtless soon begin to serve the purpose for which the Government built it.

At my request the Granger subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture recently held hearings on the bill to authorize appropriations for access forest roads. I have repeatedly urged action on this bill. I testified at some length in calling the attention of the committee to the need for an adequate access road program to carry out a proper forest conservation and sustained yield program.

As a matter of fact, I have appeared numerous times before Appropriations Subcommittees urging adequate forest road money and adequate fire protection and pest-control funds.

CAMP WHITE HOSPITAL

When the Veterans' Administration definitely refused to make use of the splendid Army hospital at Camp White—near Medford—I introduced a bill in the House to direct the VA to use the hospital as a domiciliary center. The bill was incorporated with a similar Senate bill which included a hospital in Iowa. The bill was passed and the Camp White Domiciliary Center is in operation. The occupancy of that facility should be increased from 500 to 1,000 members. I am endeavoring to have that done, and am hopeful that the increase will be made in the near future because the additional beds are badly needed by veterans who are in need of domiciliary care.

FREIGHT-CAR SHORTAGE

The whole country is now suffering from one of the most severe car shortages ever experienced in railroad history. A car shortage is nothing new in our area. I am well aware of the fact that periods of car shortage have been doing serious damage to employment and industry in Oregon for many years.

Since the disastrous shortage in 1948 I have been working on this problem but the truth is that the Government does not now actually have much power to prevent a car shortage. In January of this year I succeeded in prevailing upon the Transportation Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to hold hearings on the problem. This was done, with the result that the committee heard the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and others state that the total number of cars owned by the railroads is not enough to meet the peak or emergency transportation needs of the country.

The Bureau of Service of the ICC has the power to order railroads to improve their service. I appealed to the ICC and the Bureau only to learn that it did not have inspectors and other manpower enough to do the job. This meant they need more money so I then appealed to the Appropriations Committee to provide necessary funds.

We have been plagued by the car-shortage problem for 40 years. It must be solved permanently. Accordingly I have introduced a bill in Congress which when passed will permit the Government to build and own a small fleet of freight cars. These cars can be fed into the transportation system by the ICC only for emergency relief. When so assigned to the railroads they will pay rent for the use of the cars. I think there is possibility of favorable action on the bill next year. I am certain that when that bill becomes law and goes into operation there never will be a freight-car shortage in any section of the country again.

TARIFF PROBLEMS

There is a decided tendency in this big Government of ours to discriminate against small producing industries of the West when it comes to making tariff agreements with foreign countries. Nut growers, bulb growers, fruit, plywood and other producers have been hurt. Under the present reciprocal trade agreement law about the only thing we can do is fight and talk. I have been doing a lot of that, having made appearances before the Committee on Reciprocity Information in behalf of our western producers.

OTHER LEGISLATION SPONSORED

I have introduced a number of other bills in Congress in addition to those heretofore mentioned. Several of them have been passed. Others are pending.

My bill to provide for the orderly reduction of surplus Federal employees, to improve Federal hiring procedure, and to do away with the current practice of hiring an army of new inexperienced employees at one door while at the same time releasing experienced people through another, has not yet had consideration.

For years I fought to correct certain injustices suffered by officers of the Regular Army under then existing removal procedure. After numerous hearings and the introduction of several bills, a substantial part of the corrections I sought were incorporated in a retirement bill which became law—Public Law 810, Eightieth Congress.

Minor bills include the deeding of some land from the Bureau of Mines property in Albany to the city so a street could be straightened; and a bill to establish a regular term of Federal circuit court in Eugene. A number of private bills or claims for damages against the Government have been passed. All such claims from residents of the Fourth Congressional District have been cleared to date.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

After serving on numerous minor committees I finally won assignment to the powerful House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have served on that committee 4 years and am now a senior member of it. The committee handles legislation pertaining to transportation, communications, public health, inland waterways, aviation, Federal Trade Commission, and the Department of Commerce.

At the beginning of this Congress I was elected by the members from the Pacific Northwest to represent the States of Oregon and Washington on the Republican policy committee of the House.

I have made three trips abroad with congressional committees. The first was in 1944 when buzz bombs were still falling in London. I was there when the deadly V-2 rocket bombing began. The second was in 1947 to study the European situation leading to the adoption of the Marshall plan. The third was in 1949 when our committee made a thorough study of European socialized medicine plans.

OREGON DELEGATION TEAMWORK

The Oregon delegation in Congress, two Senators and four Representatives, vote independently on legislation but we work together in closest cooperation on any problems directly concerning Oregon. In this report I have mentioned many things beneficial to our congressional district which have been accomplished since I have been its Representative. Obviously a Congressman does not do things single-handed and all by himself. Our two Senators have been unfailing in their instant response to any appeal for help or cooperation I have ever made. We four Members of the House of Representatives from Oregon have always worked together as a unit on all Oregon problems. In serving as a member of the Oregon delegation I feel that I am a member of a friendly, hard-working and effective team.

CONGRESSIONAL OFFICE SERVICE

My office, 1631 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., is well-staffed and well-equipped. I realize that the people of the Fourth District are 3,000 miles from Washington but nevertheless have many problems which can only be settled in the Nation's Capital. I am glad to be of service in any and every way possible. I welcome letters commenting upon legislation and expressing opinions. It is my policy to reply to all communications promptly.

East Says They Have Enough Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am very pleased to include a most interesting and timely editorial from the August 10 edition of the Wenatchee Daily World. It follows:

EAST SAYS THEY HAVE ENOUGH POWER

John P. Callahan, New York Times expert on utilities and power development, says: "On the basis of current demand figures, the electric utilities industry has a comfortable margin or more than 15 percent in reserve capacity—a condition that has been improving since World War II."

The Times writer then goes on to tell us that "the last war was the major impetus to the private power and light companies and it has increased kilowatt capacity by more than 40 percent since 1944." This is reassuring for we've heard so much on how the Federal Government's power policy had socialized the power industry. We had heard that private firms couldn't secure risk capital to expand their operations.

But then the Times writer talks about our Northwest and the Federal Government's program for power development. "Almost every region of the country shows heavy additions of new generating capacity. An exception is the Northwest, where the Federal Government's power facilities dominate the electric supply situation."

Strange as it may seem, Callahan is quite right. That's why today Bonneville Administration could use a total of 540,000 kilowatt-hours extra to supply 26 firms whose application for firm power has either been turned down or deferred indefinitely until power becomes available.

We have a power deficit here and there's no comfortable 15 percent reserve such as Callahan shows in his survey of the national utilities generating capacity. We need more power for aluminum, ferro-metals, Hanford Works, and aircraft building, to say nothing about the demands of expanding present industries and new business firms seeking location here in the Northwest.

Let's not worry about securing too much power from the Columbia River. It's worth remembering, we think, that it takes 50,239 kilowatt-hours per year per production worker in our State. That's an increase of 160 percent over 1939. And it's also worth remembering that "the output of 1,000,000 kilowatts means a foundation for a population base capable of supporting 1,000,000 residents."

The authority for the above statement is the Federal Power Commission.

In other words, Chief Joseph Dam when completed in December 1956, with 1,728,000 kilowatts, second largest power dam in the world, will provide 172,800 new jobs in industrial plants using power from this one dam. So let's make up our power deficit and do just what the private utilities have done since the war—inventory needs and expand by 41 percent. "Last year alone," Callahan wrote, "the private utilities spent $3,160,000,000 to produce generating plants in anticipation of increasing power demands." Hardly socialism, we think.

As to Pin-Pointing Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following timely and interesting editorial from the Evening Sun of Baltimore, as of August 18, 1950. In view of the wide public interest, not only in world conditions today, but also in the foreign policy of the United States Government, I believe this editorial will serve as a complete answer to many of the questions raised in respect to that policy. The editorial follows:

AS TO PIN-POINTING POLICY

You often hear it said these days that the American people have a right to know what is the foreign policy of their Government. That statement is fair enough if by the term "policy" is meant the general line of action which a nation intends to follow. Those who use such words usually mean, however, that every foreseeable decision ought to be spelled out in advance by the Government and that the people ought to be told what those decisions are.

A call for this kind of pin-point diplomacy was sounded in the House a few days ago by Mr FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR. While Mr. COUDERT's proposal goes far beyond any other that we have seen, his views are shared by many people and they are therefore deserving of careful study.

He declared that the administration should spell out what it would do in a detailed list of contingencies with respect to almost every country on the globe. He asked, "Is it the policy of the United States to go to war with the 450,000,000 people of Communist China in support of Formosa, Indochina, or any other Asiatic country?" He wanted to know what the United States would do "if (a) Soviet satellite forces or (b) Russians forces attack a North Atlantic pact nation" and also whether it is "intended to make unlimited commitments of American ground forces in defense of Atlantic pact nations."

He wanted to know what we would do if Russian Communists should gain control of Yugoslavia by internal revolution and what we would do if Russian forces succeeded in conquering Pakistan, and he asked a number of other questions, demanding that the administration supply the answers, and proposing that if the administration did not supply them Congress itself undertake to spell out all the answers for America and the world to see.

This kind of proposal reflects a very superficial knowledge of international affairs. Our general policy is one of steady resistance to Russian aggression or to Communist infiltration in all quarters, but for us to say in advance what we would do in certain contingencies in Pakistan, Hong Kong, Finland, Thailand, Burma, India, and so on would be the height of stupidity. Nations do not and cannot prejudge situations in advance in any such fashion.

Take the question which was quoted as to whether we intend to go to war with Communist China in support of Formosa, Indochina, or in support of any other Asiatic country. For us to answer that question with a broad "Yes" would be to undertake commitments the extent of which cannot be foreseen by any intelligent man. On the other hand, if we should answer the question with a general "No," that in itself would be a sort of come-on signal to Russia. Again, if we should answer "Yes" to Formosa and "No" as to Indochina and other Asiatic countries, we would be inviting aggression everywhere except in Formosa.

Even as to Formosa alone it is much better to stand on President Truman's statement of June 27 that he has "ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa." That does not mean we will go to war with Communist China over Formosa but it does cover what we will do in the case of a Communist attack on Formosa under present conditions. Anything more general would involve us in commitments of immeasurable magnitude.

Again look at the question about unlimited commitment of American ground forces in defense of Atlantic Pact nations. We have a treaty with Atlantic Pact nations which imposes on us as on all other signatories certain obligations. By that treaty we have agreed to consider an attack against any other of the signatories as an attack against all of them and we have further agreed to assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith individually and in concert with the other parties such action as we deem necessary, including the use of armed force to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

These sentences cover the obligation which our Government thought it wise to assume when the treaty was signed. They cover the obligation accepted by all the other signatories. For us now to answer Mr. COUDERT'S question by a formal declaration for or against unlimited commitment of our ground forces would be equivalent to an amendment of the treaty by unilateral action.

The fact is that one of the first requirements of foreign policy in a period of this kind is that we do not undertake to spell everything out over the whole face of the earth. It is sometimes dangerous even to spell things out for a limited period. In his Press Club speech last January, Secretary Acheson drew a definite security line for the United States in the Pacific area. He said that our "defensive perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and to the Ryukyus," and that it then ran to the Philippines. In the light of recent happenings, it appears that his failure to include Korea inside this line was a terrible mistake.

This instance shows how dangerous it is to draw hard-and-fast boundaries and to say what we will do within those boundaries. If we could get into so much trouble by attempting to draw a specific line in this limited area, how much more trouble would we encounter if we tried to say specifically in advance what we should do in all the contingencies stated by Mr. COUDERT. Wise men in Congress and in the administration as well will shy away from any such attempt.

One other point should be kept clearly in mind. It is that in formulating our foreign policy we must take careful account of our resources, both military and economic. We cannot scatter commitments to do this or to do that without counting the cost. Mr. COUDERT and those who share his views seem to ignore this point. They propose to declare commitments, as it were, in a vacuum.

We need to rethink and refine our foreign policy. But the starting point for this task is the understanding that a policy is a general line of action and not a rigid and detailed plan. Discussion of many of the points which Mr. COUDERT raises is desirable as a means of illuminating the general international problem which we face. But it would be dangerous in the extreme for us to draw a map and mark on it exactly what we propose to do in every country in which any difficulty is likely to arise.

One for All—All for One

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I inserted in the RECORD the address of President Arnulfo Arias, of Panama delivered to his nation on August 3. The following day the address was the subject of an important editorial in the Panama Star and Herald. The editorial reflects the attitude of the thinking people who live in our sister republic of Panama.

In these trying day, when the democratic nations of the world face such critical problems, it is encouraging and refreshing to read such expressions as the editorial which follows:

[From the Panama Star and Herald of August 4, 1950]

ONE FOR ALL—ALL FOR ONE

It was an historic message that the President of the Republic, Dr. Arnulfo Arias M., addressed to the nation last night declaring the Republic of Panama as definitely lined up on the side of the world's democracies in the struggle between the United Nations and arrogant communism that seeks the domination of the world for the masters of the Kremlin.

Dr. Arias minced no words in declaring the nation's readiness for all-out cooperation and collaboration with the United Nations now faced with the dangerous defiance of the Communists in North Korea and harassed with the cynical efforts the Russian archpriests of communism, who once more are trying to disfigure the truth so as to make it appear that the victim of aggression is in fact the aggressor.

There were no equivocations in the words of President Arias. His was a straightforward assertion that Panama places at the disposal of the United Nations any portion of her territory which the unified command of the World Organization may consider necessary or convenient for use as bases, or for the extensive production of such elements as may be needed by the UN's war machine which the possibilities of the Isthmus may be found capable of producing. And he also places at the dispostal of the United Nations troops, the use of the highways and byways of the Republic for such activities as the war effort may demand.

And above all, His Excellency offers not only the material potentials which the Republic may contribute to the common effort of the 52 non-Communist members of the United Nations to make the decisions of the UN respected and obeyed, but he offers as well, the blood of Panamanian citizens in the form of a corps of volunteers who may enlist for active duty at the fighting front.

Dr. Arias thus implements the recent actions taken against the spread of communism as an organized and militant body in this country. His placing the Republic definitely and wholeheartedly behind the cause of the United Nations, commits every citizen to anticommunism, because the Communists are today the enemies of the World Organization which was created in 1945 precisely to prevent wars such as international communism has now organized and launched on the world in Korea.

Dr. Arias upholds the democratic tradition of the Panamanian people, which has been always democratic liberalism as practiced by the great majority of the people until the contamination of the Red fungus—brought to the Isthmus from foreign shores by emigrees who sought our traditional hospitality—began to make its appearance in our political life and to contaminate certain sectors of our population.

Today, then, Panama stands squarely behind the commitments of the United Nations to beat down the defiance of international communism which has started fires which could easily spread to become the third world war with which Russian has so consistently threatened the western civilized world since 1945. Today the Panamanians are definitely identified with the struggle to preserve the democratic traditions of freedom cherished by every state which came into being under the pressure of the undeniable urge for freedom that all men of all races and all creeds experience.

Today Panama gives concrete meaning to the hemispheric motto of: One for all—all for one.

We Move in New Directions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following News Bulletin for August 21, 1950:

WE MOVE IN NEW DIRECTIONS

(By Paul O. Peters)

Reports that Federal Government spending in the fiscal year 1951 will approach or be more than $57,000,000,000, and that income and excess profits taxes will have to be raised again next year in order to bridge at least part of the gap between Federal income and Federal spending is something for every American, especially the businessman to consider.

Operating, as we still do, under the capitalistic free enterprise system, the proposed spending by the Federal Government will accelerate the inflationary trend, and the new taxes, although possibly punitive to small business, will be only a partial brake on the inflation.

The base of America's economic power, rests fundamentally on the profit system. It is the activator that motivates all human endeavor. The search for reward in the shape of profit lends vigor to industry, and adventure to business.

In authoritarian states the profit system long since has ceased to function. Business is conducted under absolute, peremptory, tyrannical, and oppressive conditions. In the Communist states there are no profits per se. Everything goes to the state, which dishes out rewards only to the faithful, and death or imprisonment to dissenters from the philosophy.

The question naturally arises—how long can the free enterprise system and the profit system continue to function when government at Federal, State, and local levels each year takes an increasing share of the profits of industry, yet assumes none of the risks incident to the operation of a free enterprise economy?

Businessmen seldom if ever run a business for fun. Neither do men work long hours just for the glory of their sweat.

Added new taxes at this time will narrow the gap between a free economy and the authoritarian system. Some economy in Federal spending possibly can and should be effected. The balanced budget will be nearer and the need for new taxes lessened. In the trying days which lie ahead, our congressional leaders need reminding that we can further deplete our critical and strategic minerals, further exhaust our soil resources, and greatly weaken our future economic power.

In spending as much as $57,000,000,000 a year, our Government moves in a new direction. It is down the road to a regimented economy and the hand-out state.

St. Lawrence Seaway Lags

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 23 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Denver Post of August 18, written by Roscoe Fleming, and entitled "The St. Lawrence Seaway Lags."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A GREEDY FEW KILL GOOD BET FOR UNITED STATES—ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY LAGS

(By Roscoe Fleming)

On looking back at the brief interval of uneasy peace after World War II, historians may decide that one of our major mistakes was in not building the St. Lawrence seaway while we could. This failure is a prize symbol of the breaking down of national unity and morale, and the concerted rush for the pork barrel, that characterized the period.

When World War II came along, we had unknowingly prepared for it better than we knew. The instant need was for power, huge power—and there stood TVA and the Grand Coulee, built against the opposition of the pessimists, and of the private Power Trust, ready with power in huge amounts.

Suppose we had first had to build the power capacity necessary for the atomics program? Power is the muscle of the modern industrial world, and war is an industrial process.

Had we failed to have big power ready in time, that failure might have prolonged the war by 6 months. It might even have lost it.

Where are the TVA's and the Grand Coulees that we shall need for war III—and is it perhaps later than we think?

Suppose, for example, we need a million kilowatts in one piece for the hydrogen bomb, or for something else. Does the main project wait until we can build the power plant? It would have to.

The private Power Trust, the pessimists, and the pork-barrel politicians started doing business at the same old stand as soon as War II was over, and so far they have prevented starting the St. Lawrence project.

Its very virtues have meant its defeat. There lie 1,600,000 unused kilowatts of the cheapest power left on the continent, running uselessly to waste; there lies undug a mighty channel which could make the Great Lakes part of the ocean highway around the world; open the iron mines of Nova Scotia and Venezuela to the steel mills of Chicago and Pittsburgh, spread useful and perhaps vital industry up through a great unused segment of our country and Canada—some of that decentralization the need of which everyone testifies to so loudly.

Not the least beneficiaries would be the farmers and other dwellers in the great plains clear to Colorado. Beside much more than paying for itself in national defense, this project would come nearer paying for itself in dollars than any new planned. It is the Panama Canal of the future.

Blockade of this great project is a symptom of the soul-sickness which possessed us between wars—the fear that someone else would gain, the dog-in-the-manger attitude that demanded we get ours first, that we keep what we have, and the country's welfare could go hang.

In other words, the coal barons, the railroads, the possessors of present seaports, the pessimists, the timid, the private power lads, all joined up in a fear bloc, and, with the pork-barrel, vote-trading politicians, they managed to kill it off.

The trouble with the St. Lawrence project is that it is too good—it promises too many benefits to two nations, looks as if it would upset too many present applecarts, hasn't enough pork in it. Let us hope that the blood on the hands of those who have so far strangled it may not prove to be our country's blood.

Make Voice of America Roar Instead of Whisper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 21, 1950:

MAKE VOICE OF AMERICA ROAR INSTEAD OF WHISPER

When 28 Senators, members of both parties, urged in a letter to President Truman that American propaganda facilities be greatly enlarged for "a psychological and spiritual offensive against the Kremlin," they prodded at one of the most serious weaknesses in our national policies.

We don't get our story—the American story, the story of freedom and democracy—to the peoples of the world. At a most critical time we do not speak with a powerful voice to millions of Asiatics who are having dinned into their ears the Communist lie that the United States is the aggressor in Korea.

Pennsylvania's Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS, in a speech at Harrisburg Saturday, declared that we must turn the Voice of America "from a whisper into a roar." The suggestion tersely expresses the unfavorable condition of American propaganda against a foe who is blaring unconscionable falsehoods about our aims, ideals, and acts to millions all over the earth

United States Delegate Warren R. Austin, in the Security Council of the United Nations, last week stated our Government's aims in Korea to be simply the preservation of that country's freedom and independence under democratic processes. How well is that being told to the people of Korea and to other peoples in Asia? Not well, we may be sure.

On the other hand, Moscow employs a vast network, using specially trained native Communists, to get its anti-American charges transmitted by every device, including word-of-mouth among the vast numbers of illiterates in Asia.

The Red propaganda reaches out among the masses, many of whom never hear what American has to say. From authentic reports it is unhappily effective.

If United States information services abroad are inadequately staffed, that must be overcome. Voice of America methods, programs and messages must be lifted to become the "roar" Mr. MYERS proposes.

Russia, according to Andrew C. Geer of the Christian Science Monitor, takes 4,000 Asiatics to Moscow annually for education and indoctrination. Mr. Geer's suggestion that the United States bring at least 6,000 to this country each year to let them see what American democracy is and how it operates for the good of all the people deserves serious consideration.

One thing is certain: The United States must organize, without delay, a tremendous campaign to backfire the propaganda pouring from Russia, and to get the truth about America told and believed everywhere, including Russia itself.

Can United States Policy Win in Asia?—Dorothy Thompson Says "No"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks, an article that appeared in the Chicago Daily News on August 14, 1950, by Miss Dorothy Thompson. It points out that we are pursuing a policy which cannot win for this country. I do not agree with all that she says about our policy but it is important enough to provoke considerable interest. I recommend it to all Members of the House. It follows:

CAN UNITED STATES POLICY WIN IN ASIA?

Those of us who believe that American foreign policy is leading us straight into catastrophe are effectively disfranchised. There is only one party, and it is a war party. There is no patriotic leadership that challenges the course on which we have embarked, or has the brains or courage to chart another.

The present course is to offer ourselves as the policeman of the world, to enforce, by the sacrifice of American lives and fortune, the court orders (as it were) of UN countries who will not or cannot themselves fight to enforce them, and to put down aggression wherever it may raise its head.

The "law against aggression," which Mr. Truman, the generals, and the majority of Republicans have committed us to "police," is no law. There is no impartial judgment to which it can be referred. The judges include the charged aggressors or their partisans. There is no international police force to execute judgment.

The United Nations, divided into two factions, sharing no common notions of civilization is, as an institution to "enforce peace," pure fiction. It is, in fact, an arena for power politics.

Stalin and company, who know this, use it for what it is and play the game supremely well, while our vacant-minded leaders appoint the American people to liberate all victims of aggression—whether they want to be liberated or not. Since the process involves the destruction of the countries liberated, enthusiasm is notably lacking. That is the lesson of Korea.

I submit that if the United States irrevocably commits herself to fighting for all who won't or can't fight for themselves, while Russia pours into the fray only her allies' resources while reserving her own, there can be but one outcome. The west will be utterly exhausted and unable to defend itself on its own ground.

Stalin's game is to involve this country in war with China. It is a war we cannot win. We cannot win it morally because no Asiatic trusts the foreign devil, no matter what banner he carries.

We cannot win it politically because we have not one ally in Asia. A policy which commands the British to get out of India and the Dutch out of Indonesia, and then decides to support the French in Indochina—which refuses to support Chiang in China, and then decides to support him in Formosa—is not a policy.

We cannot win a war involving China militarily. If there is any general who can tell us how to accomplish what Asiatic Japan could not, let that genius arise and tell us how.

We have already lost Asia. It is a loss we can acknowledge and sustain. For Stalin has not yet won Asia. He wants us to win it for him, by a war with China.

And if there is a statesman in this country with courage to lead this Nation away from certain disaster, he will be elected President. Despite the sales talk, the people are hostile and alarmed.

Foreign Trade Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT T. SECREST
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the chairman, adopted unanimously by the executive committee of the National-Labor-Management Council on Foreign Trade Policy, August 15, 1950:

The outbreak of hostilities in Korea on June 25 of this year precipitated far-reaching measures of political and military action and set in motion economic changes the full magnitude and effects of which are not yet visible.

The national and international economic implications of our military preparation and defense effort can at this time only be perceived in dim and tentative outlines. No one can foresee the extent of military operations necessary for the attainment of our objectives and no one can know how far we must go in order to fulfill our international political commitments and responsibilities.

Great changes in the course of international trade are implicit in the program that has already been launched in response to the Korean crisis. Already the dollar-gap question has lost its urgency as one of the great problems facing the world. Quite conceivably the trade-balance of the United States may be reversed in the course of the next few years. In any case, it is not known to what extent and in exactly what quarters our imports and exports will be affected.

As a step toward elimination of the dollar-gap and for other purposes, the Department of State some months before the Korean outbreak announced the opening of multilateral negotiations on September 28, 1950, in Torquay, England, to carry out a third round of tariff reductions under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

To that end public hearings were held during May on a long list of items which were to be considered for concessions. Hundreds of witnesses, speaking for the many and various industries and groups affected, appeared at these hearings to protest any further duty reductions at this time. The effects of previous concessions, particularly those made in Geneva in 1947, had only begun during the past year to make themselves felt. The war-torn countries were regaining their productive powers and the period of postwar shortages in this country had reached its end in many lines of production.

This combination of imports and growing surpluses within this country bade fair a year ago to precipitate a dangerous recession. The problem of deflation and of unemployment loomed with a growing menace on the horizon. Yet quite definitely the total potential impact of previous duty reductions upon the domestic economy had not yet delivered its total force when another round of trade agreements was announced.

Now, between the preparations for the Torquay Conference and its actual assemblage has arisen this overriding emergency, neither the end nor consequences of which are yet clearly visible. Once more normal international trade will be disrupted. Once more our domestic economy will be subject to controls. Many peacetime projects are being abandoned and others will undoubtedly be set aside. The public has given early evidence of its readiness to abandon "business as usual"—all to the end that we may be most effective in meeting our national and international responsibilities.

This Council has no desire to raise above first consideration of our country any question that is and should be subordinate thereto. We have felt constrained because of the troubled international conditions now prevailing to withhold various representations and to subordinate our interests to national considerations. The State Department should under present circumstances relinquish its own pursuits in a field where, because of vastly changed conditions in course, it has no possible way of measuring the most probable peacetime consequences of its action.

It will be recalled that this Council was formed only a few months ago in response to widespread alarm felt over the course of foreign competition in this country. The Council does not now, and did not in the beginning, object to imports if they are placed on competitive parity in this country. It is fully cognizant of, and recognizes, the function of imports in our economy. This country needs imports, it needs them in large volume, but it is not necessary that such imports should disrupt our wage standards, our employment, and our price structure in a buyer's market. It is neither necessary nor desirable that the smaller miscellaneous industries in this country be put in jeopardy as a means of maintaining an abnormal level of exports.

Convening of a tariff-cutting conference under the present circumstances cannot be justified on any ground other than the theoretical one that tariff reduction is, of itself and quite exclusive of other considerations, a desirable consummation. Business is not as usual today in the United States and it is unseasonable to treat our international trade as being as usual under such conditions. Postponement of the Torquay Conference until the present international crisis has passed would permit future consideration of the tariff at a time when more sound and accurate estimates could be made of the wisdom of particular concessions.

The full time and energies of the State Department should be devoted at this time to a solution of the international emergency.

This Council should urge the President of the United States to bring about a postponement of the Torquay Conference. It is not likely that adverse international repercussions would ensue since such action would conform closely with the dictates of universal common sense.

Respectfully submitted.

O. R. STRACKBEIN,
Chairman.

Fighting Marines Baffle Unification Brainstormers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ivan H. Peterman from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 22, 1950:

FIGHTING MARINES BAFFLE UNIFICATION BRAINSTORMERS

(By Ivan H. Peterman)

During the Naktong bridgehead reduction at Changnyong, which already classifies as the first major American victory in Korea, old-fashioned interservice rivalry is credited with helping our side. The first marines were there, and so were the Army doughs. Also the Army and Navy airmen.

Now sweet unification was supposed to have eliminated such rivalries, as one of the many wonders wrought in Washington, D. C., these days. But they persist, and as correspondents report from Changnyong, no unit was willing to let any other surpass its job on the North Korean aggressors. In their admirable zeal, they seem to have wiped out a whole Red division and shattered some of Uncle Joe's immediate plans.

Such factors may seem obscure to some citizens in our present unobtrusive mobilization, but the Korean campaign is demonstrating the good and the bad as well as the mediocrities under our new combined military system. Quite plainly, some of the good stems from red hot rivalries still existent among the services, and the retention—at least by the swashbuckling leathernecks—of proven methods. One is close air support which the Marines, in their desperate battle to survive (despite Secretary Louis Johnson's indifference to whether we kept the Marines or not), insisted on preserving. At Changnyong close air support wrecked the Commies.

I bring up these things because the First Marine Reserve 155-millimeter howitzer battalion is packing gear for camp on August 28. This is the outfit which helped blast the Japs off Guadalcanal. It is commanded now by Maj. James Coady, Philadelphia, and has been based at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, waiting word to follow the Marine Infantry Reserves into training. They are now under training at New River, N. C.

There are about 600 of the artillery reservists, including some 35 officers, and if you wonder why battalions depart separately and not as National Guard or Regular Army divisions, it's because the Marines form their reserves as battalions, mounting up regiments and divisions as they proceed toward combat areas. Unfortunately we have very few marines for the amount of population of the country, and the vastly increased spots they're supposed to guard.

Does it occur to Washington's brain trust that, with the assumption of global responsibility by the United States, the Marines actually should be tripled instead of reduced? We need more marines. But try and drill that into the current defense set-up.

Anyway, off they go, undermanned, underequipped as today's battle requirements go, but full of the old marine grit and confidence. Instead of their fourth encampment at Quantico the howitzer unit will probably land near some embarkation point out West, ready for quick integration with the Second Marine Division. It's forming up. With plenty of veterans who know their way around.

Down at the yard, where since the end of their campaigns against the Japs, the Reservists have been taking the prescribed peacetime training, there has been only exasperation at the delay, according to First Lt. John J. Maguire, Jr., reconnaissance officer with A Battery, who is also assistant executive. Jack went through Villanova learning to be an artillery officer, after a brisk session in Uncle Sam's prep school on Guadalcanal.

For the United States Marines, ever stubborn, sloughed off some of the unification stuff, and have kept the old teamwork which has never lost a battle. They still have their own fliers, own artillery, own infantry, and own hell-for-leather morale. They still dress like marines, and there was no long bleat that the officers and men must all look alike, as arose in the Army from the usual cry-baby pinkoes.

The fact is in combat everyone dresses alike except for identification. In peacetime if you want discipline—and the marines still prefer it—you require insignia and proper uniform. American service leaders generally have fallen for a lot of soft-headed guff since the Second World War, but not the United States Marines.

Unification at the top, in the supply departments, and other purchasing and spending departments was important and necessary, but unification had some senseless by-products which don't help in wartime.

The sly campaign to blunt discipline by promoting the idea the general and his corporal should "shine their boots together" has no place in a major-league Nation. There was a lot of this sloppy, sentimental, half-subversive thinking during the period we should have been preparing. We fretted over rank and uniforms, but forgot to build decent tanks. But we'll catch up to it all, and the perpetrators in due time.

So the marines and the Twenty-fourth Infantry GI's gave the Gooks a rousing wallop at Changnyong, and the winners are saying the other fellow did well. That's the best news yet from Korea. It will start more clamor from the Reserve marines: "What's keeping us out of it? Is this a private war, or can anybody get in?"

The Spirit of the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER THORNBERRY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, one of the outstanding newspapermen and commentators in Texas is Mr. Paul Bolton, of Austin, Tex. His rare and acute perception of the public thinking makes Mr. Bolton's broadcasts a daily family habit in central Texas.

Recently, Mr. Bolton devoted two broadcasts to public thinking about the Korean situation and about problems of mobilization. I believe these broadcasts, while they represent only the sentiment in one American community, can be read profitably by all of us. They show clearly how fully the people perceive the nature of the great challenge now facing us and the sentiments in these broadcasts are inspiring evidence of the public willingness to make whatever sacrifices are necessary to destroy the threat of communism. They follow:

[From the KTBC Newsroom of July 26, 1950]

In Washington today, Elder Statesman Bernard Baruch made the recommendation that everybody has been anticipating and dreading. What Baruch said was this: The situation is sufficiently grave to warrant an over-all ceiling across the entire economy. Over-all prices, wages, rents, fees, and high enough taxes to prevent profiteering.

This was much stronger than the request made by the President. To get the reaction of Austin people to this proposal, we contacted a number of representative citizens in representative businesses, and asked their reactions. Here are their statements, unadorned.

Mayor Taylor Glass, who runs an ice cream company, said he was in hope that we wouldn't have to do it this time. It's certainly the last thing he wants. In his own business, sugar is a basic commodity, and some shortage has developed locally due to scare buying; but he said he'd been telephoning elsewhere in Texas and found no shortage.

Ed Wroe, the president of Austin's American National Bank, commented on Baruch's statement like this:

"That's the correct way to do it. We have to have that to win. And if we are too slow, it could be too bad for us."

The manager of a radio station, J. C. Kellam, was equally brief: We have to do it, and we should do it as of the day before the Korean war.

The manager of a large builders' supply company, Bill Drake, who also is a city councilman, reacted in this manner: "I can't say that I think a ceiling would be wrong. It does look like there's no end to advancing prices. In our business prices advance because the supply people have to protect themselves. * * * Then on the subject of taxes, Drake added: "I'd hate to see an excess-profits tax slapped on so quickly, as it would disrupt many corporate businesses. I do believe that sort of tax should go on military contracts; and I think we must have taxes to pay for it; we can't continue to add to our deficit."

Here's a labor viewpoint: Paul Sparks, the executive secretary of the State federation of labor, reacted like this: Certainly we're susceptible to freezing wages, if they'll go all the way through. The transition period we had after the last war, I think, came about because we got the job only half done during the other war. We saw other people chiseling, and it's human nature to say, "If he can do it, I can do it."

The operator of a string of restaurants, Harry Akin, had this to say: "I hope Mr. Baruch is unduly alarmed, and that it's not necessary." But if it is necessary, everything ought to be clamped on at once. And the stronger demonstration we can make of our purpose to defeat communism, the less chance that we'll be involved in another world-wide war. If controls are the best judgment of the best people, let's have them all; let's not mess around and compromise and favor one group or another. * * * "It is," Akin said, "late. People had better start thinking about it."

The vice-president of the University of Texas, James E. Dolley, who is also a professor of banking, had this to say: "The situation is extremely grave, and I have thought so for several years * * * offhand," Dr. Dolley went on, I'd say two things should be done at once: The first is to reinstate the old Regulation W—that's the one which limits installment buying and controls credit. That would shut off the abnormal purchases of motorcars, refrigerators and the like. Then there should be an immediate crackdown on Government subsidy of new housing. This would accomplish several objectives. It would release the labor situation noticeably." * * * Dr. Dolley explained, "If we go on into war, there's going to be a considerable demand for workers in war plants. In 1941, we had a big backlog of unemployed. But if now we superimpose the war plant demand on an all-time peak production, the situation will be serious" * * * and finally, the university expert said, "Whether it's necessary at this time to revive the old OPA—well, offhand, I'm inclined to think it's a little soon for that."

The president of the Steck Co., Ernest Jackson, had this to say: "If we're ready to start being an aggressor for freedom and start to pushing the Russians instead of trying to contain them, I'm for controls; but not so long as we try to placate everybody with our foreign policy, including the pinks in this country."

Perhaps the man-on-the-street reaction was expressed by Wick G. Fowler, a war correspondent during World War II. He said, "I don't see why people are worried about sugar and bedsheets. Why in the Thirty-sixth Division in Italy, if an infantryman had one blanket he was living in luxury. I've heard too many people worrying about the economic supply instead of the blood supply. I'll bet if one of those GI's in Korea had a million dollars, he'd willingly give it all just to get a half mile further back from the front line."

And speaking of Fowler, he's now trying to make arrangements to return to the war fronts. Fowler was correspondent with the Thirty-sixth Division for the Dallas News during World War II; and this time he's attempting to work out a syndicate arrangement to represent several Texas newspapers.

That labor case which we told you about last night, which District Judge J. Harris Gardner decided, will be appealed to the civil appeals courts by the labor union.

[From the KTBC Newsroom of July 28, 1950]

He who tries to sense the spirit of the people is indeed brave. A day or so ago, I asked a number of men to express their opinion on the recommendations of Bernard Baruch for immediate mobilization. One who responded with a brief comment was Ernest Jackson, president of a large printing supply company. Then, because we have long been friends, he sent me the typescript on an article he has written—I don't know whether it's destined for publication; obviously it was done as a mental catharsis for himself. And in it he attributes to the people a great driving purpose.

Let me read you his statement in part. "So many times," he says, "I've heard the story of our power to produce material things—bathtubs, radios, automobiles, television—that I have feared for America. I have feared America was approaching the state of mind of the rich man who stored great wealth and then said, 'Soul, take thine ease.' On that day, his soul was required of him. We as a nation will experience our spiritual death—and our phyrical death—if our only reason for existence is to have more bathtubs, more automobiles, more radios."

Then Mr. Jackson continues, "We have been a nation without great driving purpose. For generations, we have had no great, unifying cause worth dying for. Men won't die for more bathtubs—nor willingly for the privilege of crowding a few more automobiles on the highways. Yet it seems that the justification for our own existence has been these material things. We have forgotten that force which brought our Nation into being—that Revolution is our father and freedom our mother. Until we again become conscious of our mission to take freedom to all the earth, we will be half convinced that what our enemies say of us is true.

"Those enemies say our aims are material and sordid. That material greed is the inspiration for our efforts, the source of our power. They accuse us of imperialism. But th y know they lie. The only imperialism we profess is the imperialism of freedom. And freedom ultimately will rule men's minds and souls throughout the earth. This is what Stalin fears. Because of this fear he will not let free people communicate with those behind the iron curtain. Stalin hates us because he fears we will be faithful to our heritage.

"No man ever committed suicide," Mr. Jackson continues, "who had a worth-while purpose in life. But without a sublime mission, the daily frustrations make the struggle seem hardly worth while. At times I have thought we as a nation are behaving like one contemplating suicide. Nationally, we have our minor frustrations, injustices, and inequities, discriminations. But they are petty compared with those in lands behind the iron curtain. More heartening, our revolutionary society holds the seeds for correcting every injustice. And we have a great purpose: To plant our revolutionary society in all the earth. When we see our mission clearly, our frustrations will appear in their true proportion.

"We have," he says, "done much vacillating the last 5 years, between the decision to suicide, or shoulder responsibility for our sublime mission. But thanks be to God, America is getting religion. It is the evangelical religion of freedom.

"Our forefathers risked their lives, their fortunes in the cause of freedom. Now the time has come for us to pledge our lives, our fortune, our sacred honor for an even greater cause of securing liberty for millions now in slavery."

And then Mr. Jackson makes his boldest statement: "Ours," he says, "is not a passive mission; it is militant. Ours is the task of taking to the enslaved of the earth the revolution of freedom. We are not going to contain communism. We are going to crush it. We are not going to just keep the Kremlin from going further. We are going to push it back. We are out to liberate Poland, and Czechoslovakia, and Albania—and the citizen slaves of the Russian tyrant. No longer are we fighting to be let alone. We are aggressors for freedom.

"America has hesitated in the past only because she hasn't been given the vision of a great cause. Her leaders have talked of radios, and bathtubs * * * when America wanted to champion the cause of freedom. At last it seems our leadership is coming to know our soils * * * and perhaps find their own. God pity any who attempt to turn to their selfish material or political advantage this fervent dedication of a great people."

And there—abbreviated only slightly—is the attempt by one man to sense the spirit of the people.

Water in Our World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include herewith the remarks of United States Commissioner of Reclamation Michael W. Straus, made before the Denver Rotary Club on the occasion of the dedication of the Reclamation Engineering Center at Denver, Colo., on July 20, 1950. Reclamation has played a vivid and vital roll in the building of our great country, and I am sure the pertinent remarks of Commissioner Straus will be of interest to Members of Congress and others having the opportunity to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Commissioner Straus' remarks follow:

WATER IN OUR WORLD

This day we pause just long enough in our ceaseless use of this Reclamation Engineering Center for a dedication that gives us a chance to lean back from our labors far enough to take stock of what we are doing here in Denver, and why.

This group of second-hand buildings—erected a decade ago to speed to victory a wasteful war of global destruction and salvaged to become a center of man's efforts through construction to build a better world in which to live—is no mere engineering office. While by law able technicians under the brilliant leadership of Reclamation's Chief Engineer, L. N. McClellan, here serve the needs of 17 arid Western States, far more flows from the drafting boards and design shops under these roofs than the plans, blueprints, and contract specifications of the giant reclamation dams on our streams which have unveiled new vistas to the West and commanded the attention of the world.

Of all the works Reclamation has brought into being history may record this center as the most important. Although Boulder conquered the Colorado and the deserts of the Southwest, Shasta preserved and expanded California's rich agricultural life, and Grand Coulee kilowatts created the industrial empire of the Pacific Northwest, it is to and from this center that ebbs and floods a tide of talent, ideas, and knowledge that spreads over this country and throughout the world, changing the way we live and helping to save and enrich our civilization.

Here to Denver have come quietly men who in their distant homelands are normally topped by turbans, fezes, or felts—all planners and builders of our future. Here have come those who walk in sabots, shoes, or sandals who are not tourists merely satisfying curiosity as to what Reclamation has built. I have talked to them by the score as they come through Washington and have seen them by the hundreds out on the jobs, so I know they are of the brotherhood who would put to use the scarce sweet water in our world. Here, though they be yellow, white, or black of complexion, or customarily clad in pants, jodhpurs, kilts, or kimonos, they have been sent by the governments of 54 nations as selected technicians to seek Reclamation's knowledge. And when they go home they leave some of their own knowledge behind here. Often they are followed by our own Reclamation men back to the far places on this planet. And all this comes to pass with a very definite purpose.

Last night half the people of the world went to bed hungry. It was nothing new to them—some starvation is normal over half the world.

This morning, 55,000 new mouths—the children born during the preceding 24 hours—showed up for breakfast throughout the world. Tomorrow there will be another 55,000—and the next day and the day after as the number increases until stopped by famine, pestilence, or war. And while these mouths cry out for food, there still remain uncounted millions of fertile acres that are sterile now for lack of fresh water, which is wasting unused to the sea, that could help feed a hungry world.

The problem exists virtually all over the globe. It is not even entirely absent in this Nation, which has the highest standard of living attained anywhere at any time. Here, where fewer are hungry and we are but half done with our task of irrigation that is limited by the water supply and not the land, we must not be fooled by a few collapses in our food distribution mechanisms. Let not today's handful of surpluses of some agricultural commodities in certain areas blind us to the fact that America's population can stay ahead of hunger only so long as we plan and develop our resources ahead of our needs.

Cold statistics warn us that we cannot feed and clothe our own growing population a quarter of a century hence unless our harvests are increased and our industrial plant expanded. To increase that plant, we must have new and nonexhaustible energy—the energy of the hydroelectrical kilowatt that is the modern byproduct of Reclamation with which the whole world seeks to lighten its labors so that today's children may not be doomed to perpetual toil.

We have no monopoly on reclamation achievement in the United States. Irrigation engineering dates back to Biblical days. Many thriving civilizations have been built upon it. Many have fallen for neglect of their water resources development. Today, the United States, which profited from all prior experience, stands in fourth place among the nations in the total amount of irrigated land, and even lower in proportion of irrigated land to total area.

But our contributions are especially geared to modern needs and modern times—to applying the knowledge men have gained over the ages. In an era of machinery, our engineers here have made the utmost use of machines and, hence, can do in 20 years or less what used to take a century. Only through the mechanization that American industry has made famous can the worldwide reclamation effort move fast enough to meet the pressing urgency of modern needs or develop to its fullest stature the resources available in the world's rivers and streams.

Through our mechanization, our wealth, and our tradition of freedom and enterprise; through our democratically responsive institutions, which make the resources of our Government available to meet the needs and problems of the people, as here in this Reclamation Center, we have been able to conceive and to carry out projects which were beyond imagination but a few decades ago.

Here in Denver were drawn the plans for Grand Coulee, up in the State of Washington, where we have built the mightiest concrete structure ever conceived by man—a dam four-fifths of a mile long whose spillway is twice as high as Niagara. Here also were drawn the first plans for the Ichang Gorge Dam on the Yangtze River, intended to produce twice as much power as Grand Coulee and to help industrialize a free China.

On the border between Arizona and Nevada, we have built, from Denver plans, Boulder—the highest dam in the world, one-seventh of a mile high, holding back enough of the Colorado River flow to put New York State under a foot of water. Here also we are checking the plans for Kosi Dam in India which will rise still higher.

In California's Central Valley, we are moving irrigation water on a large scale 500 miles—farther than man has ever before attempted mass movement of such great quantities of water. Egyptians have come to Denver for aid in working out their plans for harnessing the Nile over still longer stretches.

Here above Denver we have pierced the backbone of the Continental Divide with the world's longest irrigation tunnel, to divert water from the Pacific watershed to the Atlantic watershed. Even as we prepare to repeat that process on the Gunnison-Arkansas Project just south of here, South American engineers are likewise planning to hole through the Andes and are seeking our advice.

Grander than any of these accomplishments is the scope of the Missouri River Basin Project—the greatest reclamation development ever attempted—that spreads over one-sixth of the United States. Plans from this center for the Missouri watershed will win us 6,000,000 acres plus 3,330,000 million kilowatts of electric generating capacity. Those producing acres, gained forever by the arts of peace, are acres we have won for ourselves without robbing anyone else. In contrast to the type of expansion represented by Tojo's coprosperity sphere or Hitler's Lebensraum which leaves only ruin and desolation in its wake, the American type of conquest enriches all mankind.

We are using machinery such as the world has never seen before. We are installing the world's greatest pumps, its greatest generators, its mightiest power plants. But today's achievements are only a preview of this center's plans for tomorrow, as yesterday's were of today's.

Brigham Young began modern irrigation in America when he dug a short ditch to water his Mormon settlers' first potato patch a century ago in what is now Salt Lake City.

We get a glimpse of tomorrow in the United Western Investigations, in which we are studying the possibility of bringing surplus waters across the country a thousand miles, over valleys and mountains, from the Columbia River region, near Canada, to the Southwest regions on Mexico's border, where the growing season lasts the year round and where current civil strife is merely a symptom showing that the available nearer water is approaching exhaustion.

But, strange to say, while all this goes on, the whole United States has been rather slow to recognize these facts nationally throughout this very big and powerful country. We have a reclamation program that is the focus of world attention, but we have not yet achieved a recognizable national water policy. The engineers build dams and hurry on to build still greater ones with scarcely a pause to see what repercussions their achievements leave behind them on the economy and sociology of a community, area, or whole region or to see whether their dam was really justified in the first place. The technicians of this center, enjoying the freedom we grant scientists, have outstripped the statesmen, economists, politicians, sociologists, lawyers, and legislators to whom we deny freedom from perpetual challenge. The latter must justify to a properly inquisitive public why the engineers should be left to and financed in their expensive tasks. But in some spots we have not yet convinced the dwellers in humid areas of the value of reclamation. Perhaps, the engineers should be required to halt long enough to study, themselves, the resulting economic and sociological reverberations of their construction and then they could undertake to teach the value of reclamation to others.

The fact is, our task includes establishing that reclamation is not merely spending other people's money but is transforming it into new and more useful productive wealth.

In the 17 Western States alone—where Uncle Sam's reclamation activities provide but a quarter of the irrigation and much more is provided by non-Federal enterprise that this center also serves—a $2,000,000,000 Federal investment over a half century is now yielding (for the fourth consecutive year) over half a billion dollars each 12 months in additional crop values, plus some $32,000,000 in cash power revenues. As a taxpayer myself, I call that a good return on a taxpayer's dollar. This is not only more food and more power but new national wealth that, in turn, is taxed to bring far more back into the National Treasury than it drew out in the first place.

Towns and cities have arisen on spots which, without reclamation, would still be wasteland. Stable, thriving, producing, buying farm areas exist where formerly we had abandoned homes, deserting populations, and relief rolls that were greater than the voting register. Through the past half century of experience and progress, we have proven that in reclamation we have a tremendous instrument for meeting the needs of both the present and the future. But don't be misled by that word "future." The needs of the future are the problems of today.

Our population is growing at the rate of about a million a year. The great bulk of this increase is in the West, which this decennial census shows is growing at a phenomenal rate—much faster than the rest of the country. In 20 years, we will have about 20,000,000 more of our own citizens to feed. Even allowing for further advances in food production through more scientific agriculture, we will need many more millions of acres of farm land. We will find many of them in the West, whose arid and semiarid reaches comprise a great reservoir of unused land resources. We will need them just as fast as we can build the reclamation projects to irrigate the thirsty acres. Nowhere in the West today are we yet meeting the demands for more water and more power.

We will need not only the land and the food—we will need the power from Reclamation power for farms, homes, and industries—power that means greater production, lower costs, and better living.

The American people will find ways to obtain what they need. They always have, I believe they always will. In fact, many of our leading men believe that within our own lifetime, our standard of living can be made double what it is today.

To meet such demands and to achieve such goals, we shall need far more intensive development of our western water resources than we have ever before attempted.

We will need to put every last drop of water to work. We shall have to work it over and over again—work it as it falls through the dam; work it as it tumbles down the mountains; work it when we turn it on our fields; rework it after it runs through the faucets and sewers of our cities; and then recapture it and work it through the cycle once more, in another region, as it flows on to the sea.

This means work for this center building dams—storage dams and diversion dams and great, complex multiple-purpose dams. It means building canals and dikes, pumps and siphons, tunnels and gates and desilting beds and aqueducts and drainage systems. It means power plants, transmission lines, switchyards, and transformer stations.

It means working in mountains and canyons, on the slopes and in the deserts. It means the kind of planning and designing for this center that can coordinate a dam built in Montana in 1950 with an irrigation system still to be built in Kansas in 1965, and with all the other structures on all the streams through all the years between, so they will work together as a perfectly fitted team in opening new wealth throughout an entire river basin.

It is a challenge to every person in America—to the local people, the electric cooperatives and the water users' organizations, the farmers, and the people in the towns; to the local governments, the States, and the Federal agencies; to builders and planners and technical men and legislators.

Perhaps, most of all, it is a challenge to the engineers who are going out of the social security of the technician's ivory tower in Denver to meet the problems in the field where the citizens can have at them (and, as some of our field staffs say, "decontaminate" them from contact with Denver's perfectionists by exposing them to the practical and realistic requirements of water users). Out in the field they can teach their political, economic, legal, and legislative coworkers to use for the common good the new tools that science has fashioned.

For we're engaged in a race, and it's a more important race than any you read about in the sport pages. A reclamation project takes time. We're still working at Hoover Dam after two hot and one cold world wars, and on the expanded Yakima project after 45 years. Next year we will be near the finish of the first phase of the Central Valley project, on which construction began 13 years ago, but which has been California's dream for half a century. Further phases of that project may take another 25 years or more. Colorado-Big Thompson, right here in your own back yard, has been under way for 14 years now. And in the Missouri River Basin no person or Congress has yet dared fix a schedule on which the work should be finished.

The race is to determine whether our engineers in the field and our statesmen and legislators in their offices can keep the development of our water resources abreast of the pressing, ever-growing, ever-accelerating demands of our people for the use of those resources.

Its outcome will help to decide how well we and our children will live; whether our boasted American standard of living can be maintained and can continue to grow as it always has in this Nation of continuing dynamic expansion.

Before it is over the engineers in this Reclamation center and their colleagues in other Reclamation offices throughout the West will have done and learned things new in man's experience. And other nations, further behind in their water resource development work and facing an even more desperate race than we, will be watching what we do, and looking to us for technical help.

Following the passage by the Congress of various laws which made it national policy for this Government to cooperate with foreign nations in the exchange of various technical data and information, Reclamation was requested to cooperate in the program and was supplied with funds for this purpose. Already we have had between 300 to 800 professional visitors from abroad each year studying our irrigation practice and learning how American technology could benefit their own lands. These officials come from some 54 different countries. Last year 47 brilliant young men from 9 different countries were placed with Reclamation for prolonged training. Frequently our alumni from other lands rise to important places in their own countries. One is Minister of Public Works for Afghanistan. Another has become chairman of the Central Water Power Irrigation and Navigation Commission of India, and still another is chief designing engineer in that country.

A couple of years ago the Government of Thailand—which we used to call Siam—sent 30 young engineers for a year of in-service training with the Bureau of Reclamation to form the nucleus of an irrigation service. Now every one of those 30 is serving in the royal irrigation department of his country, applying the lessons he learned from the American reclamation program, and right among you now are another half dozen—a splendid sample of Siam's man with a future.

Fifteen governments have asked the Bureau to send experts to advise and plan with them for more and better irrigation, while 19 others have asked for and received special forms of assistance, for which foreign engineers send us up to 300 inquiries a month.

Each year we send overseas thousands of copies of technical documents, the working tools of modern technology—specifications, technical papers, manuals of practice, and so forth. Some of these have been translated by foreign governments into their own languages and some editions have sold in the multiple-thousand copies. There is a constant return flow of technical information from abroad which is put to immediate use here.

Arrangements for such help usually are made through the Department of State, the United Nations, or the ECA, and the costs are not paid for from Reclamation appropriations. As a direct result of such contacts, foreign agencies place millions of more dollars each year in order for American construction equipment for reclamation works in their own lands to be built, frequently, by Reclamation-trained American contractors.

Reclamation experts have helped to plan a project in Ceylon aimed at revi alizing the economy of that new nation. In the Near East they have helped to survey the economic rehabilitation of Mesopotamia and the Euphrates Basin. In southern Rhodesia they have helped to build earth dams; in Japan and Venezuela, to reconstruct canal systems; in Greece, to help plan an American-style, multipurpose dam and power plant. And a party of six Reclamation men in South Korea, planning the development of power sites in that land to substitute for power cut off from North Korea, got out last month just one jump ahead of the Communists.

Here in Denver the specialized knowledge acquired in designing dams to meet earthquake conditions makes it possible for us to perform the extremely complex tests for building an earthquakeproof dam in the Himalayan Mountains in far-off Nepal. Other specialized studies have been made for irrigation projects in New Zealand, Guam, Portugal, and Greece. And my own third prior predecessor, the late great Commissioner Elwood Mead, helped design the water supply system that permitted the continent of Australia to establish its capital at Canberra.

Under President Truman's point 4 program, such assistance to other lands can be increased and can be linked with technical assistance in other fields to bring American scientific skill wherever it is needed. In fact, in this Reclamation Center you behold point 4 already in operation. It has been for some years and we in America are safer and richer for it.

Naturally, our reclamation program must serve our own domestic needs first, but looking abroad we cannot successfully preach the blessings of freedom and democracy to hungry bellies. Director General Norris Dodd, of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, says that lack of food is back of most of the trouble in the Far East. Prof. E. A. Hooten, of Harvard, says that apart from competition and stupidity, the basic cause of warfare is human breeding beyond limited food resources. And Sir John Orr, former Director General of the FAO and winner of the last Nobel peace prize, has called starvation and want in the midst of potential plenty the fatal weakness of our civilization, a root cause of war.

But Lord Orr adds a word of hope. A tough and canny Scotchman who has toured the world to study how its people make their livings, he tells us flatly that there can be food for all without war; and he makes the institution of great irrigation and flood-control programs in undeveloped countries one of the fundamental means of accomplishing this end.

America has knowledge and the skill to offer. And no small part of that knowledge and skill, that know-how and show-how, arises in this engineering center we are dedicating today.

It is one of the foremost instruments of our American leadership in the free world. It helps preserve and enhance our own western strength, our domestic prosperity, and our national future; and it enables us to make decisive, constructive contributions to other free lands throughout the world.

It is truly one of the bulwarks of our freedom and of human civilization and it is dedicated to the development of water for the service of mankind.

Statement No. 3: Examining Congressman Poulson's Recent Extension of Remarks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in continuing my commentary on the extension of remarks by Congressman POULSON, found in the RECORD of August 17, I wish to touch upon the last three points covered. In my extensions of August 21 and August 22, I have commented on the first four of the seven points which he listed.

The first sentence under the fifth point of Congressman POULSON's statement of August 17, to the effect that this proposed Columbia River diversion is brought forward at this time by the Department of the Interior as an aid to the Central Arizona project, should be revised in the light of the statements made by me and others on the floor of the House yesterday in answer to the speech of Congressman HOLIFIELD. House Resolution 244 in the Eightieth Congress was voted by the Public Lands Committee on July 1, 1947, without a single "nay" vote, although the committee record of July 1, 1947, does show that some Members withheld their votes. If this issue of bringing Columbia River water to California is to be revived, or if the Bureau of Reclamation is now honoring the formal action of July 1, 1947, of the House Public Lands Committee, it is unfortunate that the official transcripts of June 23 and July 1, 1947, have not been printed so that the full sentiment of the committee could be more readily seen.

As for the remaining part of the fifth division of Congressman POULSON's extension, I totally disagree with him. Of course, there is no nefarious scheme to rob California of Colorado River water and divert the same into Arizona. However, I am watching what could be a nefarious scheme to rob lands in California and throughout all other Colorado basin States of Colorado River water in order to send such water to Mexico. If Arizona does not get her rightful share of that water, that is what will happen to it.

The sixth point in this extension by Congressman POULSON consists of only two sentences and for purposes of comment must be quoted in full. Here they are:

> Southern California has always paid its own way. The people of southern California have obligated themselves for more than half a billion dollars for water projects, and they are paying these debts with unvarying regularity.

When the statement is made that southern California has always paid its own way, that must mean with regard to all her water problems. According to my best information, the remark is true of one great feature of their water development, the Metropolitan Aqueduct from the Colorado River, but I question it with respect to another great feature, the All-American Canal and Imperial Valley development. Although there are some minor water developments in California, such as the Palo Verde Diversion and the Coachella Diversion, which no doubt are paying their own way, the main features I refer to for examination are, first, the Metropolitan Aqueduct from Lake Havasu on the Colorado River to the west coast cities, and secondly, the All-American Canal from the Imperial diversion dam on the Colorado River into Imperial Valley. Let us examine each of these to see if both have been paid for currently as the California Congressman indicates.

The Metropolitan Aqueduct is one of the greatest pieces of construction of its kind on this planet. It is a physical work in which an engineer could take the greatest pride. It is nearly 400 miles long and has a total of 91 miles of tunnel—the longest being about 13 miles. It literally has to be lifted over the mountains and every drop of water it carries westward from the Colorado River has to be pumped a total vertical lift of more than 1,600 feet. Although built to carry 1,100,000 acre-feet of water annually, this aqueduct has the usual engineering provision for an overload, and it is said to be capable of carrying 1,200,000 acre-feet yearly. It cost upward of $200,000,000. But with all this, in a sense it is a white elephant.

However, the bondholders are assured of their investment even though the aqueduct to date has not been paying its cost and upkeep. The taxpayers of Los Angeles and the Metropolitan Water District are obligated to finance the investment in that aqueduct regardless of how little water is carried through it. The sale of water during the more than 10 years of its life has not gone very far toward paying the cost. Yet it is true that southern California is paying for this great water development. Some Californians would like to center our whole attention upon that one feature to the neglect of others.

But—let us look at another part of the picture. The second phase of California's take out of the Colorado River is through the All American Canal, which includes, of course, the Imperial Diversion Dam and should rightfully include the Hoover Dam and all appurtenances. Congressman POULSON must have had in mind all the items just named—that is, the All-American Canal, Imperial Dam, and Hoover Dam—when he spoke of more than a half billion dollar investment in those water projects. Did he mean to include the Hoover Dam, and if so, did he mean to say that southern California has obligated itself to pay for the Hoover Dam? That part I question. Let us take a closer look at this so-called obligation. Would it be correct for me to say that because I occasionally ride from Washington to New York City on the Pennsylvania Railroad, that I am under obligation to pay the cost of building the Pennsylvania Railroad from Washington to New York? Certainly not, but such is very similar to what is being claimed by southern California about Hoover Dam. What exactly is southern California's obligation for the cost of Hoover Dam?

They have contracted for power, at a certain very reasonable rate, which is generated there by falling water. However, if Hoover Dam should be destroyed within an hour, nobody in southern California is obligated to pay Uncle Sam the unpaid balance of the cost in constructing that dam. A resident of Los Angeles would be no more under obligation to make up to the United States Treasury the unpaid cost, in such an event, than would be a resident of Baltimore. Californians have a queer way of talking about their half-billion dollar "obligation" which they say they are repaying currently. That part of their arithmetic is just about on a par with some of the other samples of bookkeeping which they have applied to projects they do not like. The irrigation now being carried on in Imperial Valley would not be possible without Hoover Dam, but irrigators are not paying for that dam. Power users are paying for Hoover Dam and equipment, and thousands of those users live in Arizona.

Does Congressman POULSON mean to say that the total payments on this half-billion-dollar California investment are being currently made by those who receive the lion's share of the benefits? I cannot figure it that way. The indispensable benefits of water and silt control to the Imperial irrigation district are not having their costs paid for by that district. The power users in three States are paying the total costs, but even so, they are merely purchasing hydroelectric power, a commodity which their modern life demands. Therefore, concerning the Imperial irrigation district's flood-control and silt-control benefits, it would be more correct to say such are being paid for by the power users in the three States of Arizona, California, and Nevada. I do not object to this, but merely allude to it as a fact.

Does Congressman POULSON mean to tell us that the cost of the All-American Canal, built by Uncle Sam to the tune of nearly $100,000,000, is currently being paid for by the Imperial Irrigation District? Well, perhaps that depends upon a technicality as to what is meant by "current repayment." True the Imperial irrigation district has a repayment contract with the Government signed by Secretary Ray Lyman Wilbur in 1932 providing for repayment on certain conditions. I think the terms of that contract are not wise. It is my understanding that under the terms of the contract no repayment of costs on the All-American Canal have been made by the Imperial irrigation district. Yet, in the last 10 years or so, many millions of acre-feet of water have been carried in that canal into that great garden spot known as the Imperial Valley in California, by use of which water hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of crops have been produced. Under the terms of the All-American Canal contract the repayments may be said to be current, technically, because none are due, even after 10 or more years of valuable use.

In the seventh point, as in the first, Congressman POULSON wants it known that he does not favor the idea of diverting water from the Columbia River into California. In a colloquy on the floor of the House, as I was closing my speech on August 22 and also later when he obtained the floor, it was brought out that he had some question in his mind about Chairman Welch's proposal even when it was before the committee on July 1, 1947. I can understand that he does not want to give Arizona any comfort or hope to get more Colorado River water because southern California might get water from the Columbia River. Yet, as other California Members pointed out, there is more to California than southern California south of the Tehachapi Mountains. However, it is only southern California that has any claim upon the Colorado River, which claim is in the name of the State of California.

I think it can be conclusively shown that as to water southern California is amply provided for, considering the local resources and the High Sierras, with all present and future needs of Colorado River water by the amount assigned her by law from the water apportioned by subsection (a) of article III of the Colorado River compact. That indisputable amount of "apportioned" water is a gross of 4,400,000 acre-feet annually. I believe it can be conclusively shown that with that amount of water from the Colorado, plus the Los Angeles water resources in the Owens Valley and Mono Basin area, plus the water resources of the south coastal basin of which the Los Angeles area is a part, that the Los Angeles area has ample water supply for any foreseeable future need.

I want to protect the great city of Los Angeles in her three groups of legal water rights. I am also anxious to protect the remaining part of southern California in its legal water rights for agricultural purposes. Certainly I want to protect Arizona's water rights, too, but in the absence of an authorization act such as S. 75, giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction, we are all going to lose, and nobody gains.

Farm Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, it looks as if this may be the best opportunity I shall have to discuss our farm problems with every farmer in the Fourteenth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent. I shall address this to each one personally and ask you to give me the benefit of your thinking. The quality of the work of a Congressman seems to vary directly with the extent to which he is able to learn and understand the problems and aspirations of the people in his district.

The Federal farm price support and production adjustment program was inaugurated in 1933 when farmers all over the country were in dire economic distress. It helped to pull them and the Nation out of the depression. During World War II the support program provided a price assurance to farmers that allowed them to make a wartime production record which helped to win the war and to feed a world faced with famine in the early postwar years. Supports also helped bridge the economic gap between war and peace and were probably of considerable importance in preventing the slight recession of 1949 from becoming a postwar depression.

The Eightieth Congress enacted a farm price support program called the Agricultural Act of 1948. Title II of this law was to take effect on January 1, 1950, and would have drastically lowered the levels of support for most commodities and removed from mandatory support many of the most important farm commodities produced in northern Ohio. These are commodities that are among those that have the greatest importance to the national defense effort in time of emergency.

The Eighty-first Congress—the one now in session—took cognizance of farmers' objections to the Agricultural Act of 1948 and enacted some rather important changes. Among those changes was the provision for mandatory price supports for milk, butter, and their products. This is a change of real importance to farmers in northern Ohio. This is the law under which the Department of Agriculture is currently operating. But we must now consider this legislation in light of our present mobilization effort.

Our Nation and the free world probably face at least three more generations of an ideological struggle between democracy and totalitarianism. The particular brand of totalitarianism against which we are now struggling is one which preaches, but does not practice, a glittering and attractive sort of materialism which undoubtedly has considerable appeal to disadvantaged peoples both within the United States and in the free world. The two sides in this ideological struggle are currently engaged in a partial resort to arms as a part of the struggle that may be a prelude to full-scale global war. Democracy can defeat Russian communism, if those believing in democracy have the will to win. But to gain a real victory and lasting peace, we must win both the military struggle for area supremacy and the ideological struggle for men's minds.

While making the United States and the free world strong militarily, we must also demonstrate that democracy, even under forced draft, provides the best opportunity for disadvantaged people, in the United States and in the free world, to improve their material, as well as their spiritual, lot in the world.

In a period such as the one that may be ahead of us for a great many years, there are two different kinds of farm commodity price problems for which we must have solutions. The first of these is concerned with price supports. Even in periods of limited or even full-scale mobilization, the prices of farm commodities can quickly drop below a level that is fair to farmers; witness eggs and potatoes during World War II. For this reason, price support assurances to farmers provide the economic climate within which farmers can increase their production of scarce items with assurance that temporary conditions at harvest time will not result in a disastrous drop in farm income in the midst of a rise in the prices of things farmers must buy. The second group of problems is concerned with issues related to food price ceilings and rationing.

PRICE-SUPPORT ISSUES

Some of the price-support issues are:

First. The old parity formula that has been in use since 1933 is based upon the idea of maintaining the purchasing power of individual farm commodities such as wheat, or corn, or butter at the same level in terms of things that farmers buy as it was in the period 1909 to 1914. It has been suggested by several farm organizations, and by the Secretary of Agriculture, that a more nearly current farm family purchasing power formula should be substituted for the commodity purchasing power formula.

Second. The second issue is that of the appropriate or proper level at which farm prices or farmers' incomes should be supported.

(a) Some, a minority, oppose the whole idea of a support program for farmers.

(b) Others say that such support programs should act as a protection against the loss of out-of-pocket production costs—this would be a level of between 55 and 70 percent of parity.

(c) Another group favors supports ranging between 75 and 90 percent of parity, with minimums in years of large supply close to the 75-percent level. Such a level would help prevent complete bankruptcy of those farmers who had sufficient reserves to tide themselves over several bad years in succession.

(d) Still others urge that the best interest of the entire Nation, including that of farmers, demands that farmers' incomes be maintained from year to year at a level not too far below that of immediately past years.

Third. Closely associated with the previous question is the one of what commodities should be provided with price supports.

(a) There is, of course, the sincere group that says "none."

(b) Another group would restrict price-support operations to the so-called basic commodities—cotton, corn, wheat, tobacco, rice, and peanuts.

(c) Others would extend the list to include important perishable commodities such as milk, butterfat, the meat animals, hogs and cattle, eggs, and farm chickens.

(d) Still others would urge the inclusion of important fruits and vegetables.

(e) While others would cover all bona fide farm products.

Fourth. A fourth issue is the question of the method of support. There are basically two major methods of supporting farmers' returns on the commodities they sell. One of these is the purchase method by which the Government, through direct purchase or a loan program, takes enough of the supply of the commodity off the market to bring the market price up to the support level. The other method is the payment method, whereby farmers sell their entire supply into the market, at regular supply and demand prices, and, if the resulting average market prices are below the support level, the difference would be covered in a production payment from the Government to the farmer.

The loan-and-purchase-agreement method of support seems to have worked relatively well for storable commodities and for purchases of the processed products of perishable commodities where definite outlets and use as a safety reserve are available. This has not worked a hardship upon consumers because the so-called surplus production that is taken off the market 1 year by the Government can be safely and economically stored for use in a later season or in a later year. It is only good sense to maintain an adequate safety reserve against poor weather, low yields, or other national emergency and for welfare purposes.

But for the bulk of perishables, there are a great many people who feel that the production payment method of support would be preferable. If not used within a short period after harvest, perishable farm commodities must be destroyed or stored at a very heavy expense. Provision has already been made by law to use as much as possible of such commodities in the school-lunch program, in public and private welfare agencies both in this country and abroad. Further provision should be made for emergency stockpiles of storable processed products in areas near urban centers. Yet Government-owned inventories of such products as potatoes, eggs, and milk products continue to pile up in expensive storage well beyond the need for a reasonable safety reserve.

The need for a farm price-support program grows out of the fact that the individual farm family is unable to protect itself from the fluctuations of the rest of the economy. Farmers make up the large majority of our free competitive enterprisers. In an economy where farmers are required to sell at the giving price in an unprotected market and buy at the asking price in a protected market they operate at a disadvantage. This disadvantage is measured in terms of lower farm incomes. These conditions may become particularly severe at times during periods of national mobilization.

PRICE CONTROL AND RATIONING ISSUES

Some of the major issues relating to price control and rationing of food products are:

First. How far should the price of food be allowed to rise before special efforts are made to prevent any further rise?

(a) There is a minority who say that the red tape and regimentation involved in price control and rationing are so great that we should have no price control and rationing no matter how high the prices of food become. These people say that, if food prices are allowed to rise, this will make farming more profitable, thus encouraging farmers to increase production. The increased production will in turn hold food prices lower than they might otherwise have been.

(b) Another point of view is that prices of food should be allowed to rise at least high enough to return parity prices to farmers before any special steps are taken to prevent further rise.

(c) Still other groups insist that food prices should be rolled back to some level below parity.

Second. A second issue revolves around whether rationing of food is a necessary procedure to accompany the control of food prices. If the total supply of food is smaller than the amount that people would be willing to buy at ceiling prices, is there a danger large quantities of food will find their way into illegal channels of distribution if no rationing system is in effect?

Third. A third series of problems arises when the farmers' cost of producing food commodities in the quantity needed exceeds the established ceiling price. If a condition arises where farmers cannot afford to increase production at the ceiling price, how shall the increased production be secured? Two different methods are available.

(a) The ceiling price can be raised, thus meeting farmers' increased production costs by requiring the consumer to pay higher prices.

(b) Farmers' increased production costs can be met through a system of consumer subsidies, in the form of direct payments to farmers who agree to increase their production of scarce commodities. Under this system the grocery-store ceiling price to consumers would not need to be raised; funds needed to make the consumer subsidy payments to farmers would come out of the general revenues of the Government just as would the remainder of the defense expenditures.

A Day in Congress

OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a new documentary film—16-millimeter, black and white with sound—all original photography, portraying Congress in action.

Starring Members of Congress and the page boys whose daily chores keep the wheels turning on Capitol Hill, this film interprets by the documentary media the processes of legislation in the representative two-party Congress freely elected by secret ballot by the citizens of our Republic

It presents a realistic picture of the environment in which the Congress of the United States carries on its work: Members of Congress at work in their offices and conferring with their constituents, committee sessions, the American free press in action, page boys on the job and at classes in their school, and the President speaking before a joint session of both Houses, are all portrayed in this intimate, personalized story of a day in Congress.

Designed to further understanding at home and abroad of the processes of representative government, this film will fill a need in the current struggle between the totalitarian concept of foreign one-party dictatorship and the American free democracy which it typifies.

Produced by Hullinger Productions, Washington, D. C., and released by Instructional Films, Inc., New York City, a Day in Congress is intended primarily for exhibition in television and in the schools of the Nation. It is an ideal film for private and civic groups to use in their efforts to promote widespread appreciation of the American form of government and the freedom enjoyed by all citizens living under it.

The Atom Bomb and the Fire Fighter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the Volunteer Firemen of Central Pennsylvania are now in the midst of their fifty-eighth annual convention, which is being held this week at Bellefonte, Pa.

These men come from all walks of life and serve their respective communities voluntarily. It is impossible to fully evaluate the great contribution they make to the community, State, and Nation in the saving of life and the protection of property.

I was highly honored by being given the opportunity of addressing the opening session, August 23, 1950, on the subject, The Atom Bomb and the Fire Fighter.

My address follows:

THE ATOM BOMB AND THE FIRE FIGHTER

(Speech delivered by Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Member of Congress, Twenty-second District of Pennsylvania, at the fifty-eighth annual convention of the Central District Volunteer Firemen's Association, August 23, 1950, Bellefonte, Pa.)

Mr. Chairman and delegates, it is a happy privilege for me to make a hurried trip from Washington to Bellefonte for the purpose of discussing a subject of mutual interest and one that has caused the peoples of the world to focus their eyes on the United States of America.

When I have concluded my discussion on the subject of atomic energy, I hope to fly back to Washington, as a plane is waiting for me at the Bellefonte airport. We have important legislation on the floor of the House of Representatives this afternoon and for that reason it is impossible for me to stay and visit with you.

I have brought with me a sound, technicolored film entitled "Operation Crossroads" which will give you some idea of the power of the atomic bomb and the valuable lessons we learned from those tests far out in the Pacific at Bikini Primarily, we wanted to know what an A-bomb would do to warships So, one was exploded over the Bikini lagoon where a fleet was anchored. The other set off under the water.

The experts say that for general use, the most efficient way to use an A-bomb is to set it off about 2,000 feet above the target. It seems reasonable to expect, then, that if atomic warfare ever came to us here in central Pennsylvania, an enemy would aim at an air burst. This action would be directed at targets such as Pittsburgh, Altoona, State College, Bellefonte, DuBois, Johnstown, Lewistown, and many other communities.

Being faced with the possibility of an atomic war, I want to discuss briefly three aspects of defense against atomic warfare:

1. What can one do to protect himself?
2. What special problems will face the firefighter?
3. What can all of us do to assist in defense preparations The more we know and understand, the less danger there is of blind fear and panic.

Let me assure you that I am not posing as an expert in these matters. But as a Member of Congress and likewise a member of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy and the House Committee on Armed Services, I have lived with the subject of atomic energy since my return to Congress from World War II. Therefore, I can truthfully say that I have first-hand knowledge of the subject.

I am sure you have heard over the radio or read in your newspapers about this book I have in my hand here. It is called Effects of Atomic Weapons and has just been published by the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Department of Defense.

It is not a popular book intended for general reading. It is filled with graphs, equations, and charts that only a person with some technical knowledge could understand.

Since the Atomic Energy Commission serves the Office of Civilian Defense as a technical adviser, this volume presents for the civil-defense people all that can be told about atom bombs without giving valuable information to our enemies. It tells what makes up the bomb, something about how it works, the kinds of damage it does, and some things that can be done to help cut down the toll of destruction and human casualties should it be used against us.

Perhaps most of you know that, at the instant of explosion, three kinds of waves shoot out from an atom bomb. They travel at terrific speeds, varying between that of sound and light. The kind that do the most damage are the shock waves. These produce the blast that in the bomb used over Japan was equal to the explosion of 20,000 tons of TNT. By comparison, it was estimated that all the bombs dropped by the 100 B 29 bombers in the saturation of an area on the Naktong front in Korea last week was equal to only one-twentieth of an "old-fashioned" atom bomb.

The second kind of death-dealing waves are heat. They start out with temperature approaching that of the sun itself but cool rapidly. However, with the blast, these two types of waves account for a major portion of the damage and injuries.

The third type of waves are the nuclear radiations, namely, the neutron, beta and gamma rays. We have heard so much about these that it may come as a surprise to many to learn that radiation alone caused only between 15 and 20 percent of the deaths at Nagasaki and Hiroshima.

In the area right under the bomb burst, which is called the lost zone, death and damage will be fearfully high. But—and please take note of this—it is possible to survive, especially if some warning is available and if there are adequate shelters.

One expert estimates that a person lying on his side in a 4-foot-deep slit trench probably would survive even in the lost zone.

That zone—for the early model bombs—is an area within about a half mile of the target point.

We have increased the efficiency of the bomb since 1945, but if you have a bomb twice as powerful as the Hiroshima weapon, it does not mean that the lost area is twice as great.

The experts figure this first zone—the area of almost total destruction—would increase only from one-half mile to eight-tenths of a mile from the spot directly under the bomb burst. That spot is called the zero point.

Then comes successive zones where the damage decreases as the distance from the zero point increases. I will not attempt here to define each of these areas. They will doubtless be figured out for each community as local defense plans are made.

At the instant of a bomb burst, none of us is going to be able to figure out in the first second or two how far he is from that zero or target point.

Well, then, what should we do? Some answers that may save your life and mine are given in this Atomic Energy Commission book titled "Effects of Atomic Weapons."

There was an excellent summary written by Wade Jones of the NEA Syndicate which appeared in many papers. You may have read it, but I think it is worth repeating here. And I am quoting:

"A plan of action for the first second after an atom bomb explodes near you could save your life.

"A blinding light will signal an explosion. But don't look toward it. It could destroy your sight, if only for a few hours or days.

"If you are in the open, drop to the ground. Curl up and try to shield the exposed parts of your body, such as hands, neck and face. Lie with your back to the blast, pull your coat collar up around your neck and fold your hands over your stomach. All this will help reduce flash burns and injury from the blast.

"Stay in your curled-up position for at least 10 seconds. By then, the immediate danger is over and it's safe to stand up.

"If you are outside and within a step or two of some protection such as a doorway, a tree or corner of a building, get behind it quick. If the shelter is more than a few steps away, don't try to make it. Just drop and curl up as described above, facing away from the bright light.

"After 10 seconds, stand up and try to get under something which will give protection from flying glass and falling objects.

"If you are at home, or in your office, drop to the floor, back to windows. Better yet, get under a table, desk or counter. The safest places inside a building are alongside interior partitions.

"Remember, do what you're going to do—fast. You'll only have 1 or 2 seconds."

This concludes the advice given by Wade Jones in his syndicated article.

Now that business of standing up in 10 seconds may make you wonder:

1. What about those terrible radiations—those neutrons, gamma and other kinds of death-dealing rays?

I told you the answer earlier—that deaths due solely to these rays are only a small portion of the total casualties. In an air burst, most of the radiation danger passes quickly.

We also know that prompt treatment—especially to prevent infection of wounds or getting these rays inside your body—will go a long way toward reducing the deaths from radiation sickness.

There is a great deal more about this phase of atomic defense in the weapons effects book that I do not have time to discuss here today. Much depends on the over-all defensive and recovery measures that are put into effect immediately.

And that brings us to the emergency services of the many kinds of units that will be called into action if an atomic attack hits us. You men will be most interested in the problems faced by the firefighter.

Let me say first that the experts tell us that there are no special aspects of fires resulting from an A-bomb explosion. They say, and I quote:

"In principle, as regards fire and blast, the same result might be achieved by the use of conventional high explosives and incendiary bombs."
